Apart from coercive control by rulers, the only other means through which society can conduct its common enterprise is by voluntary submission to the rules of the game. In the free society, each generation must be systematically trained and acculturated into the ideals, the obligations and the taboos which enable people to live together amicably and productively. This culturally induced voluntary acceptance of the norms of civil conduct is the virtue which Montesquieu recognized as the sine qua non of liberty.

REQUIREMENTS OF LIBERTY

Imagine, for a moment, what would happen if a free society, forgetful of the requirements of liberty, failed to instill in its people a decent regard for their neighbors. Terrible things might happen. Crime, for instance, could increase to the point that everyone would need to have an electronic alarm system for his home. Citizens might exploit the judicial system for personal advantage, with lawsuits proliferating, even to the point that one could not buy enough liability or malpractice insurance to protect himself. The situation could even degenerate to the point that an individual might campaign for public office on a platform of promising to his voters rights and benefits and privileges that he knows he can't deliver.

By contrast, let us remind ourselves of what freedom meant to those who earned it for us. The fifty-six men who signed the Declaration of Independence pledged "their lives, their fortunes and their sacred honor" in support of that Declaration. Concludes a book, Greatness to Spare, by T. R. Fehrenbach:

"Nine signers (of the Declaration of Independence) died of wounds or hardships during the Revolutionary War. Five were captured or imprisoned, in some cases, with brutal treatment. The wives, sons and daughters of others were killed, jailed, mistreated, persecuted or left penniless. One was driven from his wife's deathbed, and lost all his children. The houses of twelve signers were burned to the ground. Seventeen lost everything they owned.

"Every signer was proscribed as a traitor: every one was hunted. Most were driven into flight; most were at one time or another barred from their families or their homes. Most were offered immunity, freedom, rewards, their property and release of loved ones to break their pledged word . . . (and) take the King's protection. Their fortunes were forfeit, but their honor was not. No signer defected or changed his stand throughout the darkest hour."

Consider, now, justice, like freedom, another of America's cardinal values. In earlier times, it was believed that a just political system was one in which all citizens were guaranteed fair and equal treatment under the laws of the nation. America's performance according to that definition, even granting the now appalling exclusion of slaves and women, was so remarkable that justice and liberty were pole stars that guided millions of immigrants to this land.

With the rise of socialism as a political force in America, and with the powerful reenforcement of the social gospel as articulated by Walter Rauschenbusch and others early in this century, the concept of political justice was gradually transformed from the limited scope of fair treatment by the courts to include governmental responsibility for delivering equality in the conditions of life. Once that Pandora's Box was opened, the principles of virtuous self-discipline and self-reliance slowly gave way to the principles of infinitely expandable rights, and this new notion of justice became the rallying cry for every conceivable interest and ambition.

JUSTICE AND RIGHTS

Because the Bill of Rights is a cornerstone of the edifice of our freedom, and properly so, the term, rights, stands high on our scale of values. The mere assertion of a right captures the high ground for the asserter, and commands a certain amount of unthinking allegiance. Once a group has formulated its goals as a right, it is then free to redefine justice to serve its purposes. This is a very difficult strategy to counteract except by meeting fire with fire, and proclaiming a contrary right. Today we are awash in a sea of contention about innumerable rights with the result that justice as a value has been debased to the point that many people simply tune it out as tiresome, scarcely a value in our time that will inspire the citizens to rally to freedom's flag.

This thumbnail history of the attenuation and adulteration of the values of freedom and justice is a tale of damage self-inflicted by negligence and intellectual inadequacy. That, however, is not the whole story.

However dunderheaded the Soviets and other Marxist-Leninist regimes are about economics and productivity, they have, with dire clarity, understood the McMichael equation and have supported and orchestrated with increasing skill through agents and fellow travelers, a massive campaign of ideological warfare against the value system of free nations. Indeed, they have no choice in the matter. It is forced upon them. Under their system of government, they are obliged to stifle the individual judgments and individual responsibilites which are the essence of freedom.

One aspect of the Soviet's ideological warfare is to mask the gross inhumanity of their own political system. The illusion must be sustained and reenforced in the outer world that Soviet Russia is the champion of oppressed people everywhere and the one true advocate of peace. Their peace song is played to different tunes for different folks. In the nations where democratic capitalism prevails, the Soviets trumpet only their incessant initiatives to prevent war and the unwillingness of free governments to respond. In the developing nations, it is a song of ultimate peace after the Soviets have triumphed over capitalism, an evil system, they say, that drains the resources of lesser economies and dooms them to poverty, famine, and sickness. Dare one, in today's climate, say theirs is a "peace" which passeth all understanding?

DEMEANING HUMAN WORTH

By definition, Marxist-Leninism relegates the individual human being to insignificance. Any person who stands in the way of the government's ideological objectives must be neutralized by intimidation, brainwashing, or more severe treatment. Human worth, human dignity, human rights are non-concepts under that system. Thus, religion is the arch-enemy of Marxism. There is only one channel of obligations for the Soviet citizens, and that leads directly to the state. God is not permitted any "Shalts" and "Shalt nots." In the same manner, only the official view of reality is permitted. Thus, there is no free press, and concealed facts lies, half-truths and deceptions are woven into the entire operation of the system, both in dealing with their own people and with outsiders.

Each of these features is so totally foreign to the beliefs, the values, and the expectations of free citizens that the mind simply cannot take it in, the brain's computer has no programming to precess the principles of such a system, and rejects the evidence; the hope that it is not so prevails over the revealed reality. We read of the report just issued by he United Nations Commission on Human Rights, documenting the atrocities of Soviet troops in Afghanistan adding booby-trapped children's toys to the run-of-the-mill cases of torture, rape, mutilation and so on.

We are shocked by the eradication of a straying Korean airplane loaded with innocent passengers; we listen in astonishment to the broadcast of a Russian military expert solemnly pronouncing an immediately refutable lie that the silhouette of the Korean airliner is identical with a U.S. miliary intelligence plane; we read the account of the Gulag Archipelago; we have the certain knowledge of Soviet support for international terrorism; but the mind boggles. We cannot comprehend that these are not isolated instances of waywardness, by the day to day operations of a system that flatly rejects the worth of a human life and all the other values which are treasured by free people.

Nor do we understand much better the extents to which Soviet Russia, supporting and working through sympathetic or unsuspecting American organizations, has had a hand in the debilitation of our value system, although Arnaud de Borchgrave, Rael and Jean Isaac, Jeane Kirkpatrick and numerous other responsible and knowledgable authors have given us chapters of that history.

SOURCES OF DEBILITATION

Consider two major phenomena, one from two decades ago and one of today. If you examine the issues of the Berkeley Barb, the Black Panther and some of the lesser known Marxist underground publications of the 1960's, you discover that the student protest movement was not a spontaneous eruption of idealistic youth; but, to a certain extent, the manipulation of a generation according to a skillfully designed strategy. The encouragement to resist the military draft and to take up the use of marijuana were openly acknowledged in these publications as tactics to alienate young people from their society.

By exploiting both the disinclination to go to war and the attractiveness of forbidden fruit, innumerable students were drawn into the status of lawbreakers. In that position, they were vulnerable to the assertion that it was an unjust war and it was an unjust legal system that allowed their parents to drink booze but prevented them from using pot. For those who have enlisted in activities on the far side of the law, it is a short step to the next level of radicalism, the conviction that America is an unjust society. This was the core theme of the Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), which had 100,000 members when it self-destructed over the question of the continued use of violence in pursuing its goals.

ATTACKING THE MECHANISM

Another aspect of the student radical plan was to attack the mechanism by which a free society fairly adjudicates conflicts of interest and conflicts of judgment. Rather than presenting a case for their views on an issue with facts and logic so that it could be judiciously weighed against the case made by the other view, they mobilized public fear and scorn and hostility against those who disagreed with them. Facts and reasons were overwhelmed by street theater. Later we saw this strategy deployed with devastating effect against the development of nuclear energy in America, and today the outcome of all too many issues seems to depend more on the decibel level than on mature, informed judgment.

The contemporary twisting of the value of justice I wish to cite is the strange singling out of the South African Government as the one nation in the world where we must rally all our forces to impose human rights. By any objective standard, the human rights shortcomings of that government, as grave as they are, are substantially less grievous in mature, in magnitude and in rigidity than is the case with numerous other governments including the Soviet Union, Iran, Libya and Ethiopia.

Let us look back eight years. The headline of the May, 1978 issue of the The Guardian reads, "Africa: The Cutting Edge, A Continent In Struggle Against Imperialism." The Guardian which calls itself an "independent radical newsweekly," is a Marxist publication which predated the Institute for Policy Studies and the SDS, but has had a close association with the Institute and has enlisted as editors and writers numerous SDS alumni. The May 24th issue is the radical left manifesto calling for the overthrow of the governments of Rhodesia and South Africa. Of the twenty-five articles listed in the Table of Contents, all but three are focused on the revolutionary struggles in Rhodesia, South Africa, and Angola, including such titles as "U.S. Bank Loans Bolster South Africa Economy," "Angola Gains Build Base for Socialism," and "Women Fight To Free South Africa."

"SUPPORT GROUPS"

The centerfold provides a listing of 112 American organizations and their addresses, some of them with chapters throughout the country, designated as "support groups" working in one way or another toward "Southern Africa liberation against the white settler regimes of South Africa and Rhodesia." The same page lists fifty-four allied "African Resources," which are think tanks, publishing houses, film centers, periodicals and liberation movements.

The full-page editorial declares, "As this movement grows—and it will—the necessity for information and propaganda clearly targetting the U.S. role in Africa will likewise increase as will the actions, demonstrations and mass protests of every kind. This newspaper will redouble its efforts to make the truth about the struggle in Southern Africa known in the U.S. . . . We call upon our readers, supporters and all progressive, anti-imperialists and communists individuals and organizations to do the same." The people reaped quite a harvest.

Where does all this leave us? Are we stuck with the unthinkable option of war with Soviet Russia or peace at any price? No, I think not. President Nixon answered that question in a recent speech. "Reagan and Gorbachev understand each other," he said, "but they do not want the same thing. Gorbachev wants to defend the extend communism. Reagans wants to extend and defend freedom. The United States and the Soviet Union have irreconcilable differences. They have only one common interest, to avoid nuclear war over those differences. But even in this respect, our goals are different. Reagan wants peace as an end in itself. Gorbachev wants victory without war.

Have we the will to make the sacrifices necessary to deny him that victory? Fifteen years ago in the response to the Nobel Prize which Solzhenitsyn prepared, but was not permitted to deliver, he summed up the circumstances which would be the cause of our failure to prevail, if we should fail. "The spirit of Munich is in no sense a thing of the past, for that was no flash in the pan. I would go so far as to say that the spirit of Munich is the dominant one of the twentieth century. The civilized world quailed at the onslaught of snarling barbarism, suddenly revitalized; the civilized world found nothing with which to oppose it, save concesssions and smiles. The Spirit of Munich is an illness of the willpower of the well-to-do, it is the usual state of those who have surrendered to materialism as the main aim of life on earth. Such people—and how many there are in the world today—choose passivity and retreat just so that normality can last a bit longer and the onset of brutishness be put off another day (when) the price of cowardice will be all the higher."

AN AGENDA

Finally, what is our agenda? We must relearn and refurbish and impart to new generations of Americans the values which define and unite the free society. We must rediscover Montesquieu, de Tocqueville, Edmund Burke, George Washington and countless other teachers of those values. And I think we could be well advised to become the student of the refugees from tyranny, not just an Alexander Solzhenitsyn, but the countless Cubans and Poles and Laotions and others among us who can teach us with passion to appreciate our great good fortune in living in a free land.

The Sandinista government closed down the Catholic radio station in Nicaragua for two days because Cardinal Obando y Bravo used in a broadcast sermon a sentence that had been forbidden by the Sandinista censor. What was the sentence? "Liberty is the most precious blessing that God gave to mankind."●

JOSEPH H. KANTER JOGGING AND FITNESS FACILITY

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, one of Florida's leading businessmen is also an ardent fitness enthusiast. Joseph H. Kanter has donated to the people of the United States a new jogging and fitness facility on the Mall. On April 23, at 11 a.m., this new facility, located at Fourth Street and Independence Avenue SW., will be dedicated.

All of my colleagues and their staffs are invited to attend the dedication and use the exercise equipment. I hope to see them there.

Joe Kanter, a prominent banker and movie producer, has been jogging for over 40 years—long before the sport gained its current popularity. His commitment to the promotion of exercise and his commitment to philanthropy have been genuine and enduring over the years.

I know that the new facility will be used and appreciated by all.●

MAKING BETTER USE OF THE SCC

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency [ACDA] recently released yet another "half-compliance" report on Soviet treaty violations. I say "half-compliance" because the administration has yet to give us a true compliance report: One where alleged violations and ambiguities are set alongside Soviet observance of the treaties in question. But even Mr. Adelman's ACDA, not noted for its commitment to arms control, feels compelled to state that "the Soviets have adhered to many, if not most, provisions of the treaties to which they are a Party."

There are several good reasons for the Soviets to adhere to most treaty provisions, and one of the best is the Standing Consultative Commission [SCC]. The Commission composed of United States and U.S.S.R. representatives. The SCC was set up in the ABM [Anti-Ballistic Missile] Treaty of SALT I in order to raise questions about ambiguous events and resolve differences between the two parties.

Its record before 1981 was excellent, in large part because both Moscow and Washington had enough political will to allow the SCC to function smoothly. All major questions were settled to both sides' satisfaction.

Since 1981, with one exception, the SCC has been sorely hampered by an administration ill-disposed toward arms control. That exception occurred last year, when an agreement was reached on what constitutes concurrent testing of surface-to-air missile radars and strategic ABM radars. In this instance, the requisite will was there to make some headway prior to the Geneva summit. But now we are back to the familiar Reagan administration neglect of the SCC, at times bordering on hostility, as the Geneva talks bog down and as public accusations once again force reasoned and quiet diplomacy off center stage.

The SCC has now become a forum for the United States to recite our grievances, demand Soviet action to remove our concerns, and reject out of hand Soviet concerns. By all accounts, it has become a monolog. Our Ambassador to the SCC, retired Gen. Richard Ellis, is in a tough spot. A former commander of the Strategic Air Command, Ellis is no pushover. But the U.S. representation to the SCC must answer to an interagency working group dominated by the Defense Department's hardliners. Much greater progress can occur if we give Ambassador Ellis the leeway he needs to negotiate.

One example of our refusal to use the SCC to our benefit is the current controversy over the SALT-accountable strategic nuclear delivery vehicles, or launchers. Moscow says that 30 Bison heavy bombers have been converted to aerial tankers. We will not accept these conversions as legitimate under SALT rules. Why not?

We will not accept them because the procedures for conversion have not yet been worked out. They have not been worked out because we refuse to negotiate the necessary procedures. If we work out the procedures, then it might be apparent that the Soviets are within the launcher limit set by SALT I. That would be one less compliance issue the Richard Perles in this administration can use to torpedo U.S. commitments to SALT I and II.

The SCC reconvened on March 4. No progress has been made to date, and as of today, none is expected in the near future. This is unfortunate, because solutions to vexing problems are easier to reach in the quiet forum of the SCC. Progress there can lead to progress in the summit talks. We need to make better use of this negotiating tool, and Congress needs to be more aware of its activities and results. A good place to start would be periodic SCC reports to Congress highlighting each negotiating session.

This is one idea advocated by Sidney Graybeal and Michael Krepon in an article published in the fall 1985 edition of "International Security." I commend this article to my colleagues and ask that it be printed in full in the RECORD.

MAKING BETTER USE OF THE STANDING CONSULTATIVE COMMISSION

(By Sidney N. Graybeal and Michael Krepon)

Unresolved compliance problems have accumulated to the point where they have become a major impediment to the maintenance of existing agreements and the negotiation of new accords. While progress in compliance diplomacy has recently been made, major problems, such as the construction of the Krasnoyarsk radar, have not been satisfactorily resolved in the forum created by the strategic arms limitation talks (SALT) to address SALT compliance questions—the Standing Consultative Commission (SCC).

Like other negotiating bodies, the SCC has no powers of enforcement and it cannot impose sanctions; it can succeed only when the political leadership in the Soviet Union and the United States seek mutually satisfactory solutions. The SCC is a tool for Moscow and Washington to use as each sees fit. Its utility depends on effective use by both governments. Given proper instructions, high-level political support, problem-solving tactics, and sound bilateral relations, the Soviet and U.S Commissioners can work together quite effectively. However, even the most efficacious tactics in the SCC will not bear fruit if either Commissioner is operating under unhelpful instructions, if the superpowers question each other's intentions toward past agreements, and they do not wish to maintain the viability of those agreements.

It should therefore come as no surprise that, during the past five years, the SCC has fared no better than the general state of U.S.-Soviet relations. Nevertheless, both governments have taken care to keep the SCC channel open during periods of harsh public exchanges. Useful discussions on sensitive military subjects continued even after the Soviet Union walked out of negotiations on strategic and intermediate-range nuclear forces in 1983.

Despite its importance, very little is known about the SCC, and many misconceptions have arisen about its activities. The object of this essay is to explain the nature of the SCC and to suggest steps to improve the utility and effectiveness of its operations.

THE SCC'S MANDATE AND OPERATIONS

No arms control agreement can be written so carefully and so clearly as to prevent ambiguities and compliance questions from arising. In some instances, parties to an agreement may not wish or may not be able to arrive at precise treaty language. They may have different interpretations of their obligations under an agreement, or new military technologies may create circumstances that were not anticipated during negotiations.

Early in the SALT I negotiations, both sides recognized the need for a private forum to implement treaty provisions and to deal with ambiguities and compliance questions. As a result, there were few difficulties in drafting Article XIII of the ABM Treaty creating the SCC. The ABM Treaty, and thus the SCC, are of indefinite duration. A Memorandum of Understanding formally establishing the SCC in December 1972 extended its jurisdiction to include the Accidents Measures Agreement signed the previous year, and regulations governing the SCC's operations were drawn up the following May.

The SCC's charter, as spelled out in both the ABM and SALT II treaties, is quite broad. It empowers representatives of the U.S. and the Soviet Union to consider, among other topics, treaty compliance questions and "related situations," questions involving interference with national technical means of verification, "possible changes in the strategic situation which have a bearing" on treaty provisions, additional measures to increase the viability of existing agreements including amendments to treaty provisions, and proposals for "further limiting strategic arms." In addition, the SCC Commissioners are authorized to exchange relevant information and to draw up procedures for dismantling or destroying offensive and defensive weapon systems.[1]

The Memorandum of Understanding establishing the SCC clarifies basic organizational matters while leaving considerable discretion to the two delegations on how the SCC shall actually operate. Each side is represented by a Commissioner, a Deputy Commissioner, an Executive Officer, and members of the delegation. Commission meetings are held no less than two times per year, and may also be convened "as soon as possible, following reasonable notice, at the request of either Commissioner." The SCC makes its own regulations, and may amend them "as it deems appropriate." [2]

In current practice, the U.S. Commissioner is chosen by the unanimous recommendation of the President's National Security Adviser, the Secretaries of State and Defense, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Director of Central Intelligence, and Director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency. Since the Commissioner is granted the title of ambassador, the Senate also passes judgment on the nomination. Sessions are usually held in Geneva during the spring and fall, each session generally lasting two months in length. Special sessions can be held at any time.

While the charter of the SCC enables it to conduct negotiations and arrive at new arms control agreements, to date neither side has chosen to operate in this fashion. New areas of negotiation generate their own negotiating teams and acronyms. Nor have the two sides used the SCC to amend agreements under its jurisdiction. The SCC has concerned itself primarily with implementation and compliance questions for the SALT accords.

Implementation, of course, can be a form of negotiation, but the SCC delegations usually operate within a narrower framework than their colleagues who actually draft treaty provisions. The primary responsibility of the SCC delegations is to make sure that basic objectives and purposes of existing agreements within their jurisdiction are being met properly. The SCC delegations are not free agents in carrying out these responsibilities. Like other negotiating agents, SCC Commissioners are on a tight rein from their capitals. Neither side is empowered to establish government policy or to go off and solve problems on its own. SCC delegations, no less than delegations negotiating new agreements, operate under carefully drafted instructions coordinated—sometimes with considerable dispute—among the relevant government agencies.

When friction within the executive branch is pronounced, instructions tend to become increasingly rigid. If, for example, government agencies can not agree on a proposed course of action, the U.S. Commissioner at the SCC is not free to suggest one to his Soviet counterpart. What flexibility the U.S. Commissioner has relates to his choice of tactics to implement negotiating instructions.

THE SOVIET PERSPECTIVE

The Kremlin views the SCC as an important channel of government-to-government communication. Its high level of regard for the SCC has been reflected by the quality of representation on the Soviet delegation. The Soviet Union has had two Commissioners during the entire existence of the SCC, both military officers from the General Staff—General-Majors G.I. Ustinov and Viktor P. Starodubov. Neither man has been accorded the rank of Ambassador (perhaps because of their military backgrounds) although both made it clear that they were spokesmen for the U.S.S.R., like other representatives of the Soviet goverment abroad.

Starodubov, the Commisisoner since 1979, is an adept and highly accomplished negotiator who has also served on Soviet delegations in the SALT, START, and prior SCC negotiations. The Deputy Commissioner has always come from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The head of the Soviet delegation in the current Geneva talks, Viktor P. Karpov, served as Deputy Commissioner for six years, followed by Vadim S. Chulitsky in 1979. The Kremlin expects issues that fall within the purview of the SCC to be raised in this forum and not elsewhere. It clearly prefers to work within the confines of the SCC rather than to engage officials with higher rank who are less suited to the tasks at hand. The Soviet Commissioner must, of course, receive authorization to proceed from Moscow, but once authorization is received, the Soviet delegation has demonstrated its willingness to have constructive exchanges and to resolve compliance questions expeditiously.

AMERICAN PERSPECTIVES ON SOVIET COMPLIANCE AND THE SCC

In contrast to the official Soviet view, American attitudes toward the SCC vary greatly, usually according to one's view of the value of arms control agreements with the Soviet Union. With experts so sharply divided on this fundamental question and with the SCC operating as a closed shop, it is difficult for even interested citizens to reach an informed judgment on the SCC's effectiveness or utility. Subjective judgments come into play on both sides of these issues, with the SCC caught in the cross fire.

The Nixon, Ford, and Carter administrations were supportive of the SCC's activities and did not denigrate its effectiveness. All three Presidents declined to assert Soviet violations in their assessments of issues reviewed in the SCC during their tenure.

For example, Secretary of Defense James Schlesinger testified before the Senate Armed Services Committee in March 1975 that "We believe that the Soviet Union has been, and today is, in compliance with the terms of the SALT agreements." Schlesinger characterized problems then the subject of considerable controversy as "ambiguities which needed to be resolved," not as violations.[3] President Gerald Ford affirmed this judgment in a June 25, 1975 press conference.[4] The Carter Administration's report—issued in the context of defending the SALT II Tready—asserted that "in every case [of a questionable practice raised by the U.S. in the SCC] the activity has ceased, or subsequent information has clarified the situation and allayed our concern."[5] SALT critics, such as Assistant Secretary of Defense Richard N. Perle, have taken a diametrically opposed view:

"I have put emphasis on the failure of the SCC to resolve compliance concerns because previous Administrations, in efforts to sell unverifiable arms control agreements to Congress, have created a virtual mythology about it. The fact of the matter is that serious compliance problems have generally not been resolved by the SCC or in any other manner."[6]

Confusion about the role of the SCC is compounded by widely varying lists of Soviet "violations and circumventions" of past agreements. For example, the State Department's 1978 assessment of compliance questions and the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency's 1984 General Advisory Committee (GAC) Report cover four common SALT compliance issues, arriving at different judgments on every one of them. By the GAC's definition of what constitutes "material breaches" of binding arms control obligations, the Soviets cheated, and the SCC failed to resolve these problems. By the State Department's assessment in 1978, no material breaches took place, and the SCC played a positive role.[7]

A SALT I compliance question relating to what constituted permissible modernization of existing ICBM launchers provides a case study of how compliance judgments vary. During the SALT I negotiations, the U.S. attempted to constrain new Soviet "heavy" ICBMs by suggesting limits on missile throw-weight and volume to which the Soviet Union would not agree. Both sides eventually agreed to an imprecise formula on silo dimensions, which the U.S. hoped to strengthen by means of a unilateral statement using a volume constraint to distinguish between "light" and "heavy" ICBMs. The Soviets proceeded to disregard this interpretation by replacing SS-11 missiles with larger and far more capable SS-19s—as they had indicated they would do in the course of negotiations.

The Ford Administration did not characterize this Soviet activity as cheating. As Secretary of Defense Schlesinger testified, "If one reads the words of the agreement, the Soviets are doing something that is not precluded. It is inconsistent, quite clearly, I think, with our understanding of our own unilateral statement. But the Soviets do not feel bound by that unilateral statement."[8] The Carter Administration provided a similar explanation in its 1978 report. The GAC, however, cited the deployment of SS-19s as a "circumvention defeating the stated U.S. object and purpose of limiting the throw-weight of Soviet ICBMs."[9] According to the GAC's analysis, the U.S. intention behind the disputed provision was clear—to limit the growth of ICBM throw-weight—as was the Soviet circumvention.

THE RESULTS OF THE SCC'S WORK

The detailed records of SCC sessions remain closed to all but those with the proper clearances and the "need to know." These sensitive deliberations, along with other arms control negotiations, have been quite properly fenced off from public view. No American President, including Woodrow Wilson, has seen fit to pursue open covenants publicly arrived at. Unlike arms control negotiations, however, the principle of privacy also extends to the products of the SCC's deliberations.

A primary responsibility of the SCC has been to establish procedures for the destruction or dismantlement of certain strategic forces. Two Protocols on Procedures were agreed upon in the SCC in June 1974 governing the SALT I Interim Agreement and the ABM Treaty. A third Protocol was agreed upon in October 1976, relating to the ABM Treaty's Protocol that reduced permitted ABM sites from two to one per side.

For the most part, these classified procedures have not generated criticism, although the Reagan Administration's February 1985 noncompliance report expresses concern that the Soviets may not comply with the Interim Agreement's implementing procedures in the future.[10] In the past, these procedures prompted a compliance flap over the dismantlement of Soviet land-based missile launchers to compensate for the introduction of new sea-based launchers. In 1976, it became clear to American analysts that the Soviet Union was not going to meet this requirement. According to the 1984 GAC Report, this constituted a violation of the SALT I Interim Agreement: "Upon U.S. inquiry, the Soviets admitted this excess, but failed to accelerate their dimantling activities." The GAC concluded that "the violation was probably not inadvertent, but rather was part of a deliberate Soviet effort to challenge U.S. arms control verification capabilities."[11]

In contrast, the 1978 State Department Report on SALT I compliance issues found that Soviet actions did not warrant the GAC's conclusions:

". . . the United States decided to raise this question with the Soviets, but before we could do so, . . . the Soviet side in the SCC acknowledged that the dismantling of 41 older ICBM launchers had not been completed in the required time period. The Soviet side explained the situation and predicted that all the dismantling actions would be completed by June 1, 1976, and agreed to the U.S. demand that no more submarines with replacement SLBM launchers begin sea trials before such completion. Both conditions were met.[11] [12]

A fourth classified protocol worked out in the SCC implements the Accident Measures Agreement. This understanding, which was updated and expanded in June 1985, facilites and speeds the transmission of information by means of pre-positioned messages.

Another product of SCC deliberations is known as the Agreed Statement of 1987. It was prompted by a controverial Soviet practice that may have involved testing of a Soviet air-defense system radar in an ABM mode. The ABM Treaty stipulates that parties to the agreement are not to give radars other than ABM radars the capability to counter strategic ballistic missiles or their elements in flight trajectory and not to test them in an ABM mode. However, the U.S. delegation issued a unilateral statement in the SALT I negotiations that radars used for range safety or instrumentation would be permitted.

Intermittent Soviet tests of an SA-5 radar during 1973 and 1974 eventually prompted the United States to raise this issue in the SCC in February 1975. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger explained the time lapse as due partly to the necessary to protest sources and methods of intelligence but primarily to the need to have a clear picture of Soviet practices:

"The first information about any event is usually extraodinarily illusive and ambiguous, and one part of the process of the government is to refine the information until we reach a point at which senior officials can make a reasonable decision. I believe it is a good working hypothesis to assume that government is not run by conspiracy but by serious people trying to come to serious conclusions about difficult topics, especially when the charge of a violation of a formal agreement is not a minor matter to be introduced into the diplomatic discourse." [13]

According to Kissinger, seventeen days after the U.S. raised the issue of the SCC, this activity stopped and was not resumed.[14] The SCC's 1978 Agreed Statement clarified treaty obligations regarding the use of radars in an ABM mode as well as for range safety and instrumentation purposes.[15] These obligations were further clarified in June 1985.

Supported of the SCC cite the SA-5 radar case and the 1978 Agreed Statement as an example of the Commission's working effectively to maintain the viability of the ABM Treaty and to clarify the meaning of its provisions. Presidents Ford and Carter did not consider Soviet SA-5 radar tests to be a violation of the ABM Treaty. Nor did the GAC Report include this episode in its bill of particulars listing seventeen "material breaches." In contrast, a number of severe critics of the ABM Treaty have concluded that Soviet SA-5 radar tests constituted a clear-cut violation of the ABM Treaty. In Richard Perle's view, "I don't think you have to be a genius to conclude they were cheating. The Standing Consultative Commission never came to that conclusion and they never would have because of their desire not to face the realities." [16]

SCC PERFORMANCE STANDARDS

The purpose of this essay is not to arbitrate the validity of contending judgments of Soviet noncompliance, but to suggest ways in which compliance questions can be handled more effectively. For those most skeptical of arms control agreements and Soviet intentions toward them, the SCC's ineffectiveness is beyond repair. For those who are more positive about the role of arms control agreements and the SCC to advance national security, there are at least two important standards to apply when gauging the SCC's effectiveness. First, the proper functioning of the SCC should result in common interpretations of binding obligations where there are none or where both sides interpret these obligations differently.

An arms control agreement, like the American Constitution, is a living document. It requires constant interpretation in order to remain vailable under unforeseen circumstances or to meet unanticipated events. This is particularly true with respect to agreements governing weapon systems in fields, of rapid technological advance. The Soviet Union compounds these problems by exploiting grey areas when opportunities arise.

Both sides should be playing by the same ground rules; otherwise, existing agreements and support for them in the United States will continually be undermined. If both sides wish to reaffirm their obligations under existing agreements and if both use the SCC properly, there is every reason to expect the Commissioners to be able to hammer out agreements that resolve questionable activities and establish ground rules under which both sides may operate.

Second, the public has a right to expect that common understandings reached in the SCC should clearly affirm the basic objectives and purposes of the agreement in question. In practical terms, these remedies will vary depending on the circumstances in each case. In some instances, a return to the status quo ante might be called for; in others, a complete cessation of the practice in question might be necessary; in still others, the imposition of new barriers—such as verifiable limitations on developmental and operational test practices—might preclude military advantages deriving from troubling Soviet behavior.

In the much discussed case of the SA-5 radar, for example, as soon as the evidence suggested the need for action, the SCC succeeded in bounding the problem by prompting the cessation of concurrent testing, and later by securing common understandings on permissible uses of radars in conjuction with ABM tests and for range safety and instrumentation purposes. Critics have argued that, in the time it took to raise this issue in the SCC, the Soviets could have gained the knowledge needed to give the SA-5 system an ABM capability.

This critique overlooks two important considerations. First, whatever the Soviets may have accomplished with the SA-5 radar in question, there have been no reports in the press that the SA-5 system (i.e., its radar, interceptor missile, and launcher) has been tested against any target in an ABM mode. Second, if there had been serious concern about an upgraded SA-5 system possessing a significant ABM capability, one would wonder why more resources were not devoted at the time to penetration aids for U.S. strategic ballistic missiles.

As in the case of the SA-5 radar, damage assessments and proposed SCC remedies for Soviet testing at the margins will undoubtedly vary from one observer to the next. Thus, the professional judgment of senior military officers and national security officials will be critical to an administration's selection of appropriate countermeasures, within the SCC and elsewhere.

IMPROVING THE SCC

Improvements in the SCC's operations do not require changes in the Commission's charter and regulations. These provisions are broadly drawn to provide both sides the latitude to work constructively. Since the Commission's modus operandi will always vary somewhat due to the style and personality of its Commissioners, there is no single correct way to proceed in the SCC. Numerous roads can lead to success when both parties wish to maintain the viability of existing agreements. Conversely, when each side questions the other's intentions, even brilliant tactical decisions are unlikely to produce satisfactory results.

One way to improve the utility and effectiveness of the SCC is to clarify to whom the U.S. Commissioner reports in Washington. The SCC is a bureaucratic oddity: it was created by a treaty, not by an Act of Congress. The Commissioner's role was established by the SCC's charter. He is nominated by the unanimous consent of many different bureaucracies; therefore, he has no single patron. The nature of his responsibilities as well as the interagency character of his appointment suggests that the Commissioner report directly to the President's National Security Adviser. If other responsibilities do not require the U.S. Commissioner's presence elsewhere, his office should be located with the National Security Council (NCS) staff.

The NSC's authority is critical to minimize the lengthy delays and confusion that invariably result from deep or enduring interagency disputes over the Commissioner's instructions. A direct link to the NSC would also ensure better coordination between the SCC's work and ongoing negotiations. Interested agencies would continue, as at present, to play a central role in SCC activities by participating in the formulation of the Commissioner's instructions and by being represented on the SCC delegation.

In addition, the utility and effectiveness of the SCC can be further advanced by the following list of "do's" and "don'ts."

Stay in the SCC channel; look for reinforcement, not escalation

Compliance questions should be raised first at the SCC, not at higher levels or in other forums. The SCC is best suited to address SALT compliance questions, and the Soviets can work constructively in this arena. The U.S. does not need to raise issues in back channels in order for the Kremlin to see that the U.S. government attaches extraordinary importance to those issues, since the Soviet government already attaches considerable importance to the SCC's operations. Nor would the U.S. wish to imply that issues raised first in the SCC channel are relatively unimportant.

A different set of problems can arise if issues first raised at the SCC are escalated to higher levels for resolution. These tactics can undermine the effectiveness of the SCC, occupy officials who have less time and technical expertise than the SCC staff, and result in a hardening of positions, making ultimate resolution more difficult. The flexibility of the SCC to resolve these issues is then impaired if and when de-escalation occurs.

A far better approach for the U.S. is to look for reinforcement at higher levels if problems or delays are encountered in the SCC. Private interventions by cabinet-level officials or even by the President should underline the importance the U.S. places on a satisfactory resolution, while keeping the problem within the channel best suited to resolve it.

Whenever possible, the Soviet Commissioner should be advised by his counterpart in advance of the session when a new compliance question will be raised. There is little to be granted by "surprising" the Soviets and monitoring their reactions since the Soviet delegation will have to report back to Moscow anyway and then wait for instructions. Advance notification can save time and facilitate constructive exchanges.

Avoid using the SCC as a dumping ground for problems that can not be resolved in negotiations

Compliance questions will arise even when treaty partners are acting on their best behavior. Unforeseen events and technological change will generate these questions even if the practice of Soviet crowding at the margins does not. In other words, the SCC will have enough to do without becoming the depository of disputes that could not be solved in the course of treaty negotiations. Treaty texts should be as precise as possible. Where agreement can not be reached, the American Congress and public should be so advised, and Soviet deviations from the preferred U.S. interpretation should not be characterized as violations.

Whenever possible, use the U.S. SCC delegation's expertise to help avoid treaty language that can generate compliance questions

The Soviet delegation in strategic arms control negotiations usually includes either its SCC Commissioner or his Deputy. In contrast, the American SCC delegation does not normally have the opportunity to comment on the drafting of treaty texts. The Soviet practice makes far more sense than the American system of not utilizing the expertise the U.S. has at its disposal.

The SCC Commissioner can review draft treaty texts from a unique perspective. Unlike other members of the U.S. delegation, he has had operational experience in compliance controversies that ensue from various treaty formulations. As such, the U.S. Commissioner is in a position to provide helpful suggestions to avoid potential ambiguities and compliance problems.

Avoid raising issues in the SCC until the United States has its facts straight, and avoid characterizing problems as violations until the SCC channel has been thoroughly explored

Sometimes the collection of adequate evidence requires a maddening length of time. Once enough facts are known and can be utilized without jeopardizing sensitive intelligence "sources and methods," the issue should be raised promptly and pursued vigorously in the SCC channel. The Soviets, like the U.S., will respond one way to the presentation of questions concerning compliance and another to the receipt of a bill of particulars asserting noncompliance or "violations." Once the U.S. government frames an issue as a possible, potential, or clear violation, the Kremlin will be reluctant to take positive steps that might be construed as affirmation of these charges. On the other hand, the Kremlin has had little difficulty explaining whatever action it takes to its own people. The choices Kremlin leaders make will hinge on their calculation of the benefits derived from the activity in question and the risks of not taking positive steps to respond to U.S. concerns. These calculations will in turn bear directly on Soviet assessments of U.S. intentions toward existing agreements and motives for raising the issue in a particular manner.

Precisely for these reasons, the context of public assessments by government authorities on Soviet noncompliance is of central importance. As will be discussed below, official reports of SCC-related activities are at this point inescapable; they can also be helpful, but only if they meet far more stringent standards than those applied by individuals with political axes to grind.

The content of noncompliance reports will have much to do with Soviet reactions in the SCC and elsewhere. The Kremlin will read into premature or overstated reports an intent to set the stage for eventual withdrawal from existing agreements, rather than to contain domestic political damage and to shore up the erosion of previous agreements.

Categorize compliance questions within the SCC as to their degree of importance

Some compliance questions will always raise more serious concerns than others, and thus merit focused attention. Every compliance question, regardless of its military significance, should be raised in the SCC, but the Soviet side should be made aware of the relative importance the U.S. attaches to various isues. The SCC regulations expressly permit the establishment of working groups. This device can enable the Commissioners to concentrate on issues of greater importance while allowing groups to address subsidiary questions. If technical questions can not be resolved at the working group level, they can be addressed by the Commissioners in the usual fashion, and reinforced by higher authorities as deemed appropriate.

Avoid linking the resolution of unrelated compliance questions

As former SCC Commissioner Robert W. Buchheim and Dan Caldwell have noted, "horse-trading" is a common practice in negotiating new agreements. It may also be a useful device for amending agreements. But in implementing existing agreements, very little horse-trading is desirable.[17] Sometimes linking unrelated issues may work out satisfactorily, but other times it may not. A far better approach is to address each compliance question on its merits. By adopting this standard, each side will better serve its self-interest, and the SCC will work more effectively as a result.

[17] Robert W. Buchheim and Dan Caldwell, "The US-USSR Standing Consultative Commission: Description and Appraisal," Working Paper No. 2 (Providence, R.I.: The Center for Foreign Policy Development, Brown University, May 1983), p 7.

For the same reason, the Soviets work against themselves when they adopt a "scorecard" approach to compliance questions: whenever the U.S. raises a compliance issue, they raise a comparable issue. In private exchanges in the SCC, this tactic has little bearing on the outcome of deliberations since both sides can usually distinguish between real and cosmetic concerns. In public accusations of noncompliance, this Soviet tactic obfuscates somewhat the Reagan Administration's charges, but it also devalues the Kremlin's position on those issues about which it feels strongly.

U.S. and Soviet compliance concerns may usefully be linked when they relate to the same objective or purpose of an agreement

When comparable Soviet allegations of U.S. noncompliance reflect serious concerns on their part, it makes sense to link the resolution of them with U.S. concerns. It will not be possible to isolate common problems in any event.

For example, both sides have raised ABM Treaty compliance issues relating to the construction of modern large phased-array radars. Each side has a common concern that these radars can undermine the objective and purpose of Article I prohibiting the parties from providing a base for a territorial defense.

Each side has also expressed concerns about the other's development of futuristic technologies that might be applicable for ballistic missile defense. Article V of the ABM Treaty prohibits each party from developing or testing ABM systems or components that are sea-based, air-based, space-based, or mobile land-based (i.e., all mobile systems). This prohibition applies to both conventional and future ABM systems or components (i.e., systems based on other physical principles). Agreed Statement D requires amendments to the treaty to accommodate the deployment of ABM systems or components based on other physical principles. However, both sides can pursue these objectives while stipulating that their development and test programs constitute less than a complete substitute for traditional ABM components—thereby making them permissible under the treaty. Test practices of this sort can raise continuous compliance questions. Unless ground rules are established governing these tests, they could undermine the objective and purpose of Article V.

In these and similar cases, common problems relating to the same treaty provisions might usefully be addressed together in the SCC. If both sides wish to reverse the erosion of the ABM Treaty, new common understandings and agreements will become necessary governing the development and testing of certain advanced technologies with direct ABM applications. Common understandings and agreements will also be necessary for modern large phased-array radars.

Release more information about the SCC's activities and products

The regulations establishing the SCC contain the stipulation that the Commission's proceedings shall be conducted in private and should not be made public "except with the express consent of both Commissioners." This provision has been adhered to by both sides, and is still valid today. SCC deliberations must remain confidential if this forum is to produce diplomatic remedies. American Commissioners have repeatedly stressed, however, that neither the U.S. nor Soviet Commissioner has a veto power over his government. In a democratic society, American Presidents have a responsibility to inform the public and the Congress of the SCC's activities in some way. While the proceedings have remained private, limited summaries of certain SCC deliberations have been released in the past.

At the start of the SCC's operations, a strict policy of secrecy was probably wise. The Soviets were unsure of the utility of this forum and wary of confidential exchanges on sensitive subjects. At this point, however, popular misconceptions about the role and record of the SCC as well as public concern over unresolved compliance problems have reached the point at which constructive factual public reports would be useful.

Reports would be constructive if they are offered in the context of problem-solving efforts in the SCC and serious negotiations to conclude new agreements. If government reports follow thorough efforts to resolve satisfactorily compliance questions in the SCC—including the use of reinforcements when necessary—and if those reports characterize compliance problems judiciously, their publication need not impair the SCC's activities. If, on the other hand, government verdicts of noncompliance are premature or based on ambiguous evidence, U.S. intentions will be widely questioned, cases where evidence is strong of Soviet misconduct will be devalued, and the SCC's ability to resolve issues will be impaired.

At this point in time, annual government reports summarizing the Soviet record of compliance should be released to the public, after the U.S. advises the Soviet Union of its intention to do so. More detailed classified versions should be transmitted to the relevant Congressional committees. These reports should indicate where the record of Soviet compliance has been good as well as where it has been problematic. The relative significance of issues raised in the SCC should be noted, and summaries of the SCC's handling of each issue should be provided. The proceedings of SCC sessions should remain classified, thus maintaining the principle of confidentiality. These reports should be prepared and transmitted to the Congress by the President's National Security Adviser, with the assistance of the U.S. Commissioner and coordination by the usual interagency process. Annual reports of this kind could defuse speculation over the purposes behind public disclosure and substitute for ad hoc compliance reporting requirements levied by the Congress.

In some cases, the public release of new SCC common understandings or agreed statements would be unwise. The products of SCC deliberations that involve sensitive weapon system characteristics, operations, and performance—such as approved dismantling or destruction procedures—should remain classified since they could raise security problems and impair fruitful private communication on other sensitive issues. However, unclassified summaries of these understandings that do not divulge sensitive information could be released. The contents of pre-positioned messages associated with the Accident Measures Agreement should also remain secret since they could be misused and pose security problems.

On the other hand, the fruits of the SCC's labors clarifying the objectives and purposes of existing agreements should be unclassified. For example, the 1978 Agreed Statement apparently does not involve any sensitive information and provides essential meaning to ABM Treaty provisions governing tests "in an ABM mode" and the uses of air-defense radars at test ranges. Anyone attempting to interpret properly treaty obligations in these areas should have access to the SCC's 1978 Agreed Statement. Similar clarifications worked out in the future should be available in their entirety to the Congress and the public.

CONCLUSION

The Standing Consultative Commission is an indispensable channel of communication between the superpowers over SALT implementation and compliance. Other channels could be used for these purposes, but none would be as ideally suited, unencumbered, or specifically authorized to do so. If something like the SCC did not exist, it would have to be created; if it falls into disrepair, existing strategic arms control agreements with the Soviet Union will be jeopardized.

Public reports of the SCC's activities and the other suggestions offered here can help the SCC delegations carry out their responsibilities for existing agreements. No suggestions will be of much value, however, if the U.S. and the Soviet Union are ambivalent about affirming the objectives and purposes of past agreements. During periods of strained political relations, negotiations over new agreements rarely proceed smoothly. While the SCC is somewhat more insulated from the ups and downs of superpower relations, it has not been immune from them. But when political relations between negotiating partners deteriorate to the point where intentions toward existing treaty obligations are called into question, the SCC cannot be an effective, problem-solving forum. If and when bilateral relations improve and both superpowers clearly signal their desire to reaffirm existing SALT commitments, the SCC can again resolve difficult compliance problems.●

THE IMPORTANCE OF GENERAL REVENUE SHARING TO RURAL AMERICA

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, we are faced today with two crises—an agricultural crisis which cuts across rural America and a budget deficit crisis. They intersect in ways not commonly recognized. As the Senate begins consideration of the budget resolution for fiscal year 1987, among the recommendations that will be considered is a substantial cutback in general revenue sharing [GRS] funds.

Too often, in our efforts to meet budget targets, we look only at the numbers as if tallying up a score in a card game. But the stakes are much higher; they involve people and they do not affect all people or all places equally.

An important consideration that often gets overlooked is the effect of budget cuts on rural communities. America's heartland is now in the midst of a severe financial crisis which is felt deeply by farmers and their families and the local businesses and governments that serve them. We must be certain that in our attempts to solve the budget crisis we do not exacerbate the agricultural crisis. Eliminating or severely cutting general revenue sharing would do just that.

The value of GRS to urban communities has received widespread attention in the press and on Capitol Hill. But GRS funds are even more important to rural communities. For farm communities experiencing a decline in property tax revenues and decreased Federal and State aid, GRS has truly served as a lifeline. GRS funds have enabled rural governments to continue to provide basic, public services such as police and fire protection, road and street maintenance, services for the elderly and handicapped, and public health.

In fact, as the chart below illustrates, communities where the greatest source of income is derived from agriculture rely on GRS to a much greater extent than nonfarm communities. For example, in Minnesota, GRS comprises 42 percent of all Federal aid to agriculturally dependent communities but only 22 percent to nonagricultural communities.

For many rural communities, GRS is the only form of direct Federal assistance they receive. We rely on rural governments to provide the same services as their more urban counterparts, yet they are not eligible for a larger portion of intergovernmental aid. UDAG, CDBG and mass transit subsidies by and large benefit urban America. The elimination of GRS, as many have proposed, would have an immediate and devastating impact on the ability of rural governments to provide basic public services.

Moreover, the proposed elimination or curtailment of GRS comes at a time when the importance of GRS to rural communities is increasing. I know that many of you are familiar with the bleak facts confronting rural America today: Real net farm income declined from $14.9 billion in 1979 to just $5.4 billion in 1983; farmland values have plummeted by as much as 44 percent in some States over the past 5 years; by 1985, total farm debt had soared to $212 billion. The list goes on and on, but these numbers only tell part of the story. The farm crisis is more than a personal tragedy for thousands of farmers and small town businesses. It is a growing crisis of rural governments as well.

The Senate Subcommittee on Intergovernmental Relations is conducting a major study on the public impact of the farm crisis in rural America. Although it is not yet complete, it is already clear that there is another, growing dimension of the farm crisis which is little known and virturally unexplored—and that is its impact on rural governments.

As farmland values decline, assessed property tax valuations—the cornerstone of the local tax base—will also decline. And with property taxes comprising up to 48 percent of local own source revenues in some farm States, this devaluation places a severe strain on local governments' capacity to raise sufficient revenues to fund very basic public services like education, public safety and health.

The loss in revenues is compounded by the sharp rise in property tax delinquencies as farmers are unable to come up with the cash to pay their local property taxes. In some States, delinquency rates have increased fivefold.

On Main Street, in towns across rural America, a similar erosion is occurring. Without a healthy farm economy to support them, local businesses are forced to close, jobs are lost, and commercial property values decline.

At the same time local revenues are being squeezed, service demands are increasing. The governmental aspect of the farm crisis is a two-edged sword. More and more farmers and their families are requiring stress and financial counseling from public and private social service agencies. Rising unemployment in many States, including Minnesota, has meant a growing number of individuals seeking AFDC and State and local general assistance programs. And while demand for services increases, the revenue squeeze is forcing cuts in governmental employment, State aid and public services.

At the national level, we have expressed concern about the rural crisis but our budget actions have not been sympathetic. Between 1982 and 1984, total Federal aid to general purpose governments, not including general revenue sharing, rose 0.1 percent nationwide in current dollars. However, among the 85 agriculturally dependent counties examined by my subcommittee, Federal aid declined 18 percent during the same period.

Now, we are proposing to cut GRS funds down to $1.8 billion—leaving only a skeleton of a program. While I would like to see GRS funded at $4.6 billion, the current authorization level, I know that this is not very likely. And I agree with those of you who feel that the Federal Government cannot even pay its own bills, much less share its revenues with wealthy cities and counties. But I also strongly believe that the Federal Government has a continuing responsibility to help those communities so burdened by Federal aid cuts, new responsibilities and economic decline that they are unable to provide a minimum level of basic public services.

To assist these communities, I have introduced a bill to create a program called Targeted Fiscal Assistance [TFA] which will assure that all communities can provide their citizens with a minimum level of basic services such as police and fire protection, street and bridge maintenance, public health and services for the elderly. My proposal retains the heart of GRS and applies it to today's economic realities. Under the Targeted Fiscal Assistance Program, local governments will continue to receive general purpose grants that they can use to meet their own funding priorities. But my program will better target the funds to those communities that need it most; communities that face above average service demands and do not have the resources to meet these needs on their own.

The Targeted Fiscal Assistance Program will provide a fiscal safety net for needy rural and urban communities and it will do so in a more cost efficient and budget conscious manner. Even with a funding level of $2.28 billion—a 50-percent reduction from the current GRS authorization—this program will go further in reducing fiscal disparities among communities.

TFA has neither a rural nor an urban bias—its only bias is need. However, as the chart below demonstrates, TFA is more responsive than GRS to rural communities that are experiencing fiscal stress due to the farm crisis.

WORLD HERITAGE DAY 1986

● Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to recognize today as World Heritage Day 1986 and to commend the National Park Service and the U.S. Committee of the International Council on Monuments and Sites [US/ICOMOS] for their outstanding leadership in implementing the World Heritage Convention.

World Heritage Day was first celebrated in 1984 to provide nations and communities around the world an opportunity to share in their celebration of the world's most revered natural and cultural resources. The World Heritage concept was initiated by the United States and presented to the community of nations at the Stockholm Conference in 1972. In 1973, the United States became the first country to ratify the World Heritage Convention, which has now been signed by 89 countries.

As a result of this treaty, 216 cultural and natural sites of outstanding value are protected by the support pledged by these member countries. The United States now has 14 World Heritage sites. I am most proud to say that my home State of Tennessee, along with our neighboring State of North Carolina, contains one of the most popular of these sites, the Great Smoky Mountain National Park.

Each one of these sites has been found to have "outstanding universal value to mankind." The Smokies set a record last year of over 9.3 million visitors who came to experience its high elevation ecosystem, 70 miles of Appalachian Trail, and early Southern history. The park, with over 500,000 acres, also has the distinction of being designated an international biosphere reserve.

Next year, the 8th ICOMOS general assembly will be held October 7-15 in Washington, DC. It will be cohosted by the National Park Service and the National Trust for Historic Preservation. Held every 3 years in different locations around the world, the general assembly serves as a common meeting ground for the 600 delegates that represent ICOMOS's national committees.

Under next year's conference theme, "Old Cultures in New Worlds," delegates will study methods to identify, preserve, maintain, and interpret their countries' national heritage. This is the first time that the general assembly has been held outside of Europe, and plans are being made to schedule tours to nearby historic areas and to several World Heritage sites. For many of the delegates, this will provide the first and perhaps only opportunity for them to visit our country.

Mr. President, in these difficult times of international conflict, it is encouraging to know that the nations of the world still desire to join together to recognize and preserve the world's historic monuments, buildings, and sites of international significance. This spirit of cooperation is surely one of the most promising keys to world peace and understanding.●

THE INSTITUTE OF POLITICAL ECONOMY

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, one of the most exciting developments of the 1980's has been the growth of independent "think tanks," those hotbeds of new ideas and techniques which have helped us in Washington make the Government work better and cheaper. As you well know, Mr. President, I have been critical, during my tenure in this body, of the efficiency of our Government, but I think all of us have an obligation to make it work better, and to the extent that these think tanks can help us, I believe we should use them.

I bring this matter up because of the announcement of a new organization in my home State of Utah, an organization that can, I think, help us to focus on the problems of the public lands States, and help us to examine the situation in these States in light of the best economic and political analysis.

I refer to the Institute of Political Economy at Utah State University. As a graduate of the University of Utah, I have never been one to wonder whether anything good can come out of Logan; the contribution of the fine institution located there has already improved immeasurably the way we consider land-use problems in the West. This new institute promises more of the same.

The director of the institute, Associate Professor Randy Simmons, is well-known to us here in Washington already. For 2 years he was an assistant to the Director of Policy Analysis at the Department of the Interior, where many of us and our staffs worked with him extensively. Professor Simmons was educated at Utah State himself, and then at the University of Oregon. He has also been associated with the Political Economy Research Center in Bozeman, MT. I do not agree with every idea that comes out of PERC, but I have always found their analysis fascinating, thoughtful, and thought-provoking. In any event, it is clear that Professor Simmons is superbly and uniquely qualified to bring to bear the best economic analysis on the problems of development and land management in the Western States.

I wish Professor Simmons and his associates well, Mr. President, and predict that we will hear much, much more from them as time goes on. In order that my colleagues might begin to become acquainted with the Institute of Political Economy, I ask that a short description of the institute and its projected plans be inserted at this point in the RECORD.

The material follows:

USU INSTITUTE OF POLITICAL ECONOMY

POLITICAL ECONOMY AT USU

Political economy is the application of economic analysis to political processes as well as the study of the interaction of markets and politics. Two hundred years ago political economy included the subject matter of economics, political science, and part of sociology. The concepts underlying the United States Constitution were developed by political economists. A new generation of political economists is developing a discipline that is not modern economics nor modern political science but is both. They use the concepts developed by the classical political economists and apply them to the modern political economy.

The USU Political Science Department has established the USU Institute of Political Economy to promote the use of political economy in basic policy related research, to refine and review the results of that research, and to disseminate the results. There is a core of USU political economists involved in Institute programs. But there are not nearly enough to carry out the program envisioned for the Institute. Thus, political economists from the nation's universities will be involved. For example, at the recent conference on the International Political Economy of Food Scarcity two of the 15 participants were from the USU faculty. The others were the nation's and in some cases the world's experts on the subject matter.

Political economy provides a focused methodology, USU's faculty provides a core of researchers, and the nation's most accomplished scholars participate in the Institute programs. This combination provides the Institute and the University with visibility and credibility reaching far beyond the state and region.

USU INSTITUTE OF POLITICAL ECONOMY—MISSION STATEMENT

The focus of the Bureau of Government and Opinion Research in the Political Science Department at Utah State University has evolved over the past several years to include more than simply public opinion research. To better identify the research activities, the Department has reorganized the Bureau to form the USU Institute of Political Economy. The Institute is designed to be much like the vertically integrated firm which discovers and mines raw materials, refines them, and markets the resulting products. We develop ideas through basic research, exchange and refine them through various forums, and disseminate them to policy makers and to the public.

The Institute programs—research, seminars, conferences, internships, and special lectures—emphasize the analysis of government policies using "equity," "efficiency, and "freedom of choice" as measures for policy effectiveness. We apply, and encourage policy makers to apply, basic economic principles to the study of public policies and processes.

The Institute programs reflect more than theoretical interests and involve more than university educators and administrators. The concerns, recommendations, and research results that evolve out of the programs made possible by the Institute facilitate the ultimate mission: to apply the tools of political economy to policy research in order to make research results available and understandable to policy makers and to improve future policy formulation through discovering, refining, and disseminating ideas.

THE INSTITUTE PROGRAMS

Discovering ideas through research

Through the research activities of the Institute we gather and formulate ideas on how to increase equity, efficiency, and freedom of choice in the application of government policy. The Institute provides funds to support research directly and seed money to develop outside research funding. Specifically, we:

Conduct Basic Research on specific policies, especially those we anticipate being on the policy agenda in the near future.

Investigate Results of existing policies to determine how equitable and efficient they are and how they effect the range of people's choices.

Test Economic and Political Theories in small group experiments to test various economic and political theories about how people will respond to different policies.

Conduct Public Opinion Surveys and analyze reactions to issues and questions.

Refining ideas through conferences, seminars, and lectures

Students, citizens, faculty, and distinguished social and natural scientists are brought together to review and refine the ideas that arise from Institute sponsored research. The specific forums supporting the refinement of ideas include:

Conferences: Some are for general audiences such as students, citizens, and faculty. Others are for specific audiences such as agency administrators or Congressional staff. Working conferences provide an environment where experts meet to work over their ideas in order to produce a book, briefing papers, or articles. Some conferences are on campus, others at hotel conference facilities, and others on location such as organized float trips. Planned conferences for 1986 include one on the public trust doctrine as applied to water and wildlife and one on the lessons from 200 years of living with the American Constitution. Another conference under consideration is one on the political economy of natural resources for journalists from the nation's leading newspapers and magazines.

Seminars and Lectures: Noted policy professionals and academics organize conferences, conduct seminars and research, deliver special lectures and teach in collaboration with Utah State University faculty.

Disseminating ideas

Many scientists and researchers research policy questions, propose exciting new ideas, and publish them in academic journals. However, few involved in really making policy read academic journals. The result is that important ideas and analysis go unheard and are not available to be considered by policy makers and implementers.

We believe that ideas have consequences, if they are heard. Therefore, we want to make the ideas fostered and refined through the Institute programs heard and considered by the general public, by the policy professionals, and by the academic community. We take the following actions:

Publish books and articles designed to be understood by the interested lay person, as well as by academics.

Publish editorials and columns in the nation's leading newspapers: These articles summarize research results making them available for general consumption. An article appearing on the op-ed page of the Wall Street Journal will have far more impact on opinion and policy than it would in The Policy Studies Journal.

Publish a readable, concrete newsletter informing interested people about Institute proposals, activities and accomplishments. (We plan to begin publishing the newsletter during 1986.)

Prepare briefing papers and testimony for agency and legislative hearings and staff; allowing us to place research results and proposals directly into the hands of those making policy decisions.

Provide well trained student interns for legislators and members of Congress, lobby groups, and political candidates. This gives them opportunities to apply classroom skills to read world situations. Recently, about half of our 25+ interns per year have entered careers in government, lobbying, or campaign consulting immediately upon graduation. Most of the rest have gone on to law or other graduate school. The interns provide continual access for Institute ideas to policy makers.

PROGRAM HISTORY

For several years the Political Science Department has been developing an extensive program of research programs, conferences, seminars, visiting professors, and student internships in addition to the public opinion surveys conducted through the Bureau of Government and Opinion Research. These programs have provided visibility and an identity for the Department as a place with an exciting intellectual atmosphere, where serious questions of political economy are addressed, and where students are well instructed in the classroom and have opportunities to apply their classroom skills in real world situations. Conferences have been held on foreign policy, national security policy, the political economy of the international food crisis, the potential of privatizing public lands, energy development in the West and its effects on the environment, the United States Constitution, political party realignment, and food security and the international political economy. The programs have attracted noted social scientists and policy professionals.

PERSONNEL

The Institute Director is Randy T. Simmons, a political economist and Associate Professor in the Department of Political Science. He recently returned to USU after spending two years as the assistant to the Director of the Office of Policy Analysis in the U.S. Department of the Interior.

Professor Simmons is assisted by Cindy Nielsen, a staff assistant with fifteen years experience at Utah State University. She manages the Institute budget, handles all administrative details for conferences, supervises clerical workers and graduate students doing work for the Institute, and coordinates the Institute's fund raising activities.

Internships are directed by Michael Lyons and lectures and seminars are cooridnated by Peter Galderisi, both Assistant Professors in the Department of Political Science. In addition to directing Internships, they are regular participants in conferences and seminars sponsored by the Institute.

Several other faculty members from Utah State University are involved in Institute programs. In addition, researchers at other universities, in think tanks, and in government are involved.●

U.S. INDUSTRIAL COMPETITIVENESS

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, almost 3 years ago President Reagan established a Commission on Industrial Competitiveness to assess America's competitive position in rapidly changing world markets.

Members of the Commission were 30 top leaders of American business, labor, government, and academia. The Commission was broadly based. Members had direct experience with different industries. They came from various parts of the country. And they came with different philosophies.

After more than a year of study, the President's Commission reached unanimous agreement. All 30 members agreed that vigorous foreign industries are directly challenging many of the largest and most successful sectors of our economy. They agreed that America's ability to compete in world markets is inadequate and eroding. They agreed that continued deterioration threatens U.S. world leadership, our standard of living, our national security and our ability to fund important domestic programs. They even agreed on a total of 91 action items to strengthen America's competitive performance.

The breadth of the agreement was remarkable. So was its intensity. The Commission called on Americans to "take on the challenge of competitiveness as the economic agenda for the next decade."

A year has passed since the Commission made this challenge. It is therefore appropriate now for the administration to provide the American people with a progress report on the vital agenda set forth by the President's own Commission and on future plans to implement the Commission's recommendations.

The President's Commission put its finger on no abstract problem. Its hard reality is felt in the personal experiences of America businessmen and workers in all types of industries. Many of them have come to me and to many of my colleagues with alarming evidence of the stiff, new form of economic challenge that is coming from overseas.

The Commission's great contribution was to show how American industry's ability to compete in that new environment has seriously weakened over a 15-year period and across many industries. Six striking facts stood out as I read the Commission's report.

First, real wages of American workers have stagnated since 1973 and, even with the recovery, they still remain below their 1977 level. By comparison, real compensation had been rising steadily at a 2.6 percent annual rate in the decade prior to 1973. The stagnation of real wages means that millions of American families will be frustrated in their hopes for a rising standard of living.

Second, the U.S. merchandise trade balance turned negative in 1971 after having been positive since 1893. Except for 1973 and 1975, the U.S. trade balance has been declining for the last 15 years. That problem began well before the dollar appreciated. In fact, during the 1970's, the U.S. trade deficit was growing despite a 15 percent depreciation in the dollar.

Third, between 1965 and 1980, U.S. exports lost world market share in 7 out of 10 high tech or "sunrise" industries: engines and turbines, professional and scientific instruments, electrical equipment and components, optical and medical instruments, drugs and medicine, plastic and synthetic materials, and industrial chemicals.

We held our share in aircraft and parts. We gained export market share only in office, computing and accounting machines and in agricultural chemicals.

Fourth, the main weight of U.S. trade has shifted dramatically from Europe to the Pacific basin. U.S. imports of manufactured goods from Western Europe dropped from 46 percent in 1962 to 24 percent in 1983. Over the same period, Japan's share of our manufactured imports rose from 16 to 25 percent. Pacific rim countries—such as Taiwan, South Korea, Singapore, Hong Kong, and Malaysia—went from a 5 percent share in 1962 to 19 percent in 1980. By 1990 at that rate of growth, our manufactured imports from the Pacific rim will be two times the amount imported from Europe.

Fifth, in recent years the U.S. bilateral trade deficit with Japan has been even larger in electronics, $21.3 billion in 1984, than in automobiles, $20.0 billion.

And finally, the United States has lagged behind other nations in training of engineers. Japan has been graduating more engineers than the United States—more than twice as many on a per capita basis. I ask that the following table be printed at this point in the RECORD.

LEVELS OF EDUCATION IN ENGINEERING

Country	First university degree (1982)		Doctoral degree (1981)
	Number	Per 100,000 persons	Number	Per 100,000 persons
Japan	73,600	62	1,250	1.1
West Germany	6,800	11	1,000	1.5
United Kingdom	10,300	18	NA	NA
United States	67,400	29	2,550	1.1
France	11,900	22	NA	NA

Mr. President, several months ago I initiated a factual monthly report called the Monthly Trade Alert. It has picked up an continued part of the valuable work of the Commission by regularly minitoring 17 key measures of our position in world trade, in labor productivity, in real wage growth and in unemployment, inflation and Federal pressure on the capital markets. The Monthly Trade Alert uses a framework outlined in the Commission's report. Taken together, those 17 measures give a realistic picture of where this country stands in the struggle for good jobs, economic security and a rising standard of living for our people.

In all these measures, the Commission found a very serious problem in January 1985. The evidence since then is reason for continuing concern, because some disturbing facts lie just below the surface of the seemingly rosey economic news we have been hearing recently.

MERCHANDISE TRADE DEFICIT

U.S. merchandise trade performance continues to erode. The trade deficit in 1985 rose to $148.5 billion, exceeding the 1984 level of $123 billion. The trade deficit for January and February 1986 stands at $28.9 billion—an increase of $7.4 billion from the same period in 1985.

NET INTERNATIONAL INVESTMENT POSITION

The U.S. net international investment position has deteriorated to a point where the United States is now one of the three largest debtor nations in the world. The debt for 1985 may reach $89 billion placing this country behind only Mexico and Brazil among the World's largest debtor nations. During the last quarter of 1985 alone, the debt increased by $36.6 billion.

VALUE OF THE DOLLAR

An important part of our trade deficit is with countries that tend to peg their currencies to the dollar. Although the value of the dollar has declined relative to 10 major foreign currencies by nearly 30 percent since February 1985, it has fallen by only 0.8 percent on a trade-weighted basis against Taiwan, Singapore, South Korea, and Hong Kong.

PRODUCTIVITY

Productivity has risen less in this recovery than in any other since World War II. U.S. output per hour has risen an average 1.4 percent in the current recovery compared to a 3.3 percent average for similar recovery periods since 1949. U.S. productivity rose 0.3 percent in 1985 compared to typical Japanese rates of over 7 percent and German rates of over 3.5 percent.

CAPITAL INVESTMENT

Nearly all capital spending went for vehicles, office machines, and computers and not for production equipment. Business investment in plant and equipment fell short of expectations by 1.3 percent in the third quarter of 1985. For 1986, the Department of Commerce expects it to decline in real terms by 4 percent in the manufacturing sector and 1 percent across all industries.

INTEREST RATES

While U.S. interest rates have fallen by about 16 percent since January 1985, those of our major competitors have also declined and remain well below ours. In January 1986, interest rates were 10.5 percent in the United States but only 6.7 percent in Japan, 7.1 percent in Germany, and 10.4 percent in Canada.

JOB CREATION

The service sectors have created the vast majority of new U.S. jobs in recent years. Manufacturing unemployment held to 7.2 percent in March 1986, and manufacturing employment remains 130,000 below the previous year's level as a result of the loss of 337,000 manufacturing jobs between January and September 1985. The Commerce Department recently reported that increased imports caused the loss of about 700,000 U.S. jobs in 1984.

REAL WAGES

The U.S. economy has not been able to support rising real incomes, a key sign of weakness in competitiveness. Real wages remained stagnant in the last half of 1985 and showed a 0.5-percent decline in the nonfarm business sector.

Mr. President, since the turn of the century several generations of Americans had reason to develop a belief that U.S. industry has unquestioned superiority in the world and that other countries would in time adopt our ways of doing things. Americans felt they did not have to worry about foreign competition. Administrations of both parties developed economic policy without sensing the need to have a national strategy for international competitiveness.

Since 1970 that has become a luxury we can no longer afford. Most notably Japan but also a large and growing number of other foreign countries have adopted national development strategies that are based on closing their home markets and exporting to the United States. Some of those foreign practices threaten the stability of the international trading system. Some of our trading partners are behaving like trade adversaries. Some of those foreign practices are just shrewder than our own. But all of them taken together pose an unprecedented challenge to American industrial strength and to our employment base.

This generation of American leaders—in industry, in labor, and in Government—must not turn away from that challenge. Unfortunately, we have already squandered valuable years with artificial debates over "big government intervention in the economy" versus "the magic of the market place." We have been diverted into theoretical arguments over "free trade" and "protectionism."

The President's Commission provided a fresh, new starting point for practical action to improve our productivity, to develop an effective trade strategy, to create and retain good jobs, and to maintain a rising standard of living.

The American people deserve to have U.S. competitiveness placed at the top of our national agenda. They deserve an open dialog on practical steps to meet the intense international challenge and to assure our long term economic security. They deserve accountability on competitiveness from their national leaders.

On April 17, Senator ROCKEFELLER introduced Senate Joint Resolution 327, which is a good step toward that accountability. That resolution calls for the President to report on steps that have been taken and are being planned to implement the recommendations of his own Commission on industrial competitiveness. The President's report would provide a valuable basis for bipartisan attention to this vital issue.

I was pleased to join a bipartisan group of 34 Senators in introducing this resolution.

I urge my colleagues to give this resolution their attention, to join us as cosponsors, and to pass it at an early date.●

PRESIDENT'S DECISION TO CONTINUE COMPLYING WITH SALT

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, the media has reported an apparent decision by President Reagan to uphold the SALT limits on MIRV'd missiles by dismantling two Poseidon submarines when our newest Trident submarine goes to sea next month. The details are not yet final or confirmed, but if the President has reaffirmed his no-undercut policy he has earned the thanks and praise of all Americans committed to military security and strategic arms control.

The reported decision by President Reagan to continue observing key SALT numerical limits is the right decision. It preserves treaty limits that serve American security. The President's decision upholds limits that the Soviets continue to honor, limits that are the only important surviving arms control accomplishments on which to build new, more restrictive arms limitation agreements.

Earlier this month I joined 51 of my Senate colleagues in writing a letter to President Reagan urging him to stick by his no-undercut policy. Others expressed the same sentiment in their own letters. The clear majority of the Senate that backs this policy applauds President Reagan's reaffirmation of his support for arms control limits that serve our vital interests.

Many critics of arms control have claimed that the limits contained in the two SALT treaties do not go far enough to restrain the strategic arms competition. Our objective remains deeper cuts, tighter restrictions. The first step towards that goal is to keep the limits we do have. The Soviets have to give up operational systems to stay within the limits, and so do we. That is where true arms control begins. The President's decision to dismantle two old submarines confirms that the United States can take positive steps that serve our security interests and preserve the chance for arms control breakthroughs.

The decision reportedly includes proportionate reponses that do not undercut the SALT limits. The two reponses are said to be pursuit of the small mobile ICBM, the Midgetman, and a possible acceleration of the advanced cruise missile program. The Midgetman, which will break the restriction on new land-based missiles when it is flight tested in a few years, is exactly proportionate to what I see as the most serious Soviet undercut of the SALT treaty, their SS-25 ICBM. The cruise missile program is consistent with SALT, and continues to tie down Soviet defense investment in defensive systems while capitalizing on our technological strengths.

These two proportionate responses meet the test that any response to Soviet violations must meet: They serve American security interests, and they avoid needlessly undercutting SALT limits that both the United States and the U.S.S.R. currently observe.

Last June the President said he was going the extra mile in continuing to observe the MIRV missile limits of SALT. It is an extra mile that I am glad to take, because we are not helping the Soviet Union, we are helping ourselves. We are preserving arms control limits that contain the buildup of the most dangerous weapons in the superpowers' bulging arsenals—multiple warhead missiles. We are preserving the groundwork for an agreement that achieves the President's stated arms control priority—a treaty that mandates real reductions in nuclear forces. If we are indeed walking an extra mile, it is an effort every bit as important to U.S. security and arms control strategy as the weapons we fund and build to maintain deterrence.●

TRIBUTE TO SAMUEL LOUIS BALLINGER

(By request of Mr. DOLE, the following statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:)

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I want to take this opportunity to congratulate an outstanding program in Miami that for the past 25 years has recognized young men for their achievements in scholastic and community endeavors.

The Egelloc Civic and Social Club will hold their "Men of Tomorrow" program on April 26. Started in 1941, The Egelloc Civic Club participates in community service projects by enlisting promising young men who display a special awareness to needs of the community.

One such young man is Samuel Louis Ballinger. Louis is an outstanding young men who excels in his academic work, as well as civil involvement. The city of Miami can be proud of Louis and all the young men who will be honored this year.●

S. 100, THE PRODUCT LIABILITY ACT

● Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, today the liability insurance crisis is a matter of national concern, but for a long time there have been Members of this body concerned about this problem and the underlying need for reform of our civil justice system—particularly in the area of product liability litigation. It was this concern that prompted them to become cosponsors of S. 100, the Product Liability Act, which I introduced in January of 1985.

After S. 100 became deadlocked in the Commerce Committee, we began efforts to formulate a product liability reform measure that incorporates elements of S. 100 with other reform proposals that promote alternatives to litigation. These efforts are continuing, but the names of those Senators who became a part of this process early on as cosponsors of S. 100 were inadvertently omitted from the RECORD.

As a consequence, I have asked unanimous consent that the names of the following seven Senators who became cosponsors of S. 100 early in 1985 be noted in the RECORD: Senator HELMS, February 5, Senator LUGAR, February 5, Senator ABNOR, February 25, Senator EAST, March 19, Senator PRESSLER, March 21, Senator GARN, March 25, and Senator QUAYLE, April 17.●

NAUM AND INNA MEIMAN: A CARING COUPLE

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, this morning I testified on behalf of the divided spouses at the hearing on Soviet and East bloc emigration policies. This hearing was before the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe which is an outgrowth of the Helsinki accords, signed in 1975.

At the hearing, I mentioned the case of Naum and Inna Meiman. Though not a case of divided spouses, they too are in a tragic situation caused by the Soviet Government. They are a warm, caring couple who wish to emigrate to Israel. The tragedy is that the Meimans are in poor physical health. As the Soviet Government continues to deny them the permission to emigrate, the Meimans chances to live in Israel dwindle.

The Meimans wish to emigrate in order for Inna to receive vital medical treatment available only in the West. The Soviets have continually denied the Meimans and many others their basic human rights. Naum's participation in the Helsinki watch group has resulted in 10 years of harassment. The Soviets have effectively disbanded the watch group.

I urge the Soviet authorities to allow the Meimans to go to Israel.●

SURVIVORS OF ABORTION: THE DREADED COMPLICATION

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, most American citizens are unaware of the magnitude of the problems connected with second- and third-term abortions. Few are even aware that such abortions are protected by the Roe versus Wade decision. Fewer still are aware that 300 to 400 children survive these abortions each year.

When tiny infants survive late-term abortions, they plunge doctors, nurses, hospital administrators, and, particularly, their mothers into a profoundly painful dilemma. There are few timeworn principles by which to establish procedures to govern such contingencies. And the appalling lack of treatment received by these defenseless newborns is unacceptable.

I request that my colleagues read the article I am submitting from the New York Times which attempts to outline the ethical problems raised by this scandal. If the medical profession is unable to formulate suitable guidelines for the protection of these new human lives, then the Congress will have to intervene. The article follows:

[From the New York Times, Feb. 15, 1984]

WHEN ABORTION BECOMES BIRTH: A DILEMMA OF MEDICAL ETHICS SHAKEN BY NEW ADVANCES

(By Dena Kleiman)

A woman went to Beth Israel Medical Center in Manhattan for an abortion. When it was done, the doctors told her she had just given birth to a daughter.

The child, though seriously brain-damaged, was saved by new techniques of caring for extremely premature infants, and the techniques get better every year. The number of children surviving abortions is still tiny, and their chances of leading healthy lives are still small, but they are posing extraordinarily troubling problems for doctors and hospital administrators.

In effect, medical technology has leaped beyond both the law on abortion and the assumptions of medical ethics. At many hospitals, policies have been thrown into turmoil.

Doctors are grappling with whether a child born as a result of an abortion should be given the same extraordinary care as one born of a miscarriage. Hospital ethics committees are confronting the question of whether late abortions should be moved out of operating rooms and into the obstetrical wings holding the latest life-saving equipment. Women requesting late abortions at some hospitals are being told that a fetus born alive will be given all chances to survive.

ONE OF OUR MOST DIFFICULT AREAS

"The area of late abortions is one of our most difficult areas," said Dr. Alan Rosenfield, acting director of obstetrics and gynecology at Columbia-Presbyterian Medical Center. "There are no easy answers given our technology now."

In its landmark 1973 decision, the United States Supreme Court upheld a woman's right to abortion until the point of fetal viability and said that point was generally at about 28 weeks after conception. In New York State, the law allows abortions through the 24th week of pregnancy. But a decade of advances in medical science have made it possible to sustain the lives of infants earlier—as early as 23 weeks.

Live births after abortions are still extremely rare. Of the more than 160,000 abortions performed in 1982 in New York, there were 18 live births, according to statistics maintained by the State and City Health Departments. No statistics are maintained nationwide.

But the very possibility—a possibility most hospitals are reluctant to discuss openly—has stirred internal hospital discussions of when and how abortions are performed, whether late pregnancies should be screened for defects, and what specific procedures should be taken if a child is born live.

And there are difficult new legal issues. When an abortion becomes a birth, it is unclear who must decide what procedures are in the infant's best interest or who is financially responsible.

Because infants born of abortion are injured in the abortion process, legal scholars are asking whether it would be possible for such a seriously injured infant to make a claim of "wrongful life" against a hospital.

DIFFERING APPROACHES TO THE PROBLEM

Policies vary dramatically.

Some hospitals are now only performing elective abortions until the 20th week—a point where it is still impossible to sustain fetal life—except in cases where a fetus has been determined to suffer from major defects.

Others, refusing to make even that exception, are declining to perform amniocentesis, the genetic screening of the amniotic fluid surrounding the fetus. The test is generally recommended for women over the age of 35 and undergone by countless others to detect fetal abnormalities.

Some hospitals are switching to an abortion procedure that eliminates any possibility that a fetus might live.

WARNINGS TO THE FAMILIES

At still others, families are routinely being advised that an abortion may result in a live birth.

"We have to warn the families," said Dr. Hugh R. Barber, chief of obstetrics and gynecology at Lenox Hill Hospital in Manhattan, where abortions are performed until the legal limit of 24 weeks. "You have to tell them there is a slight possibility the fetus may live."

Dr. John Parente, director of obstetrics and gynecology at the Bronx-Lebanon Hospital Center, said that emniocentesis is not available there and that the hospital did not want to do late abortions.

"It's an emotional problem," he said. "We just don't want to do it."

"We decided to cut back to 20 weeks," said Dr. Fritz Fuchs, professor and former chairman of the department of obstetrics and gynecology at New York Hospital-Cornell Medical Center, where an exception is made for major defects. "In this manner, we have avoided getting into any difficulties with the law."

FEAR INSPIRES CAUTION

The subject is rife with emotion and debate. Much of the discussion is taking place behind closed doors for fear of publicity and lawsuits.

Told about the subject of this article, many doctors declined to return telephone calls. In one case, the director of obstetrics at a major New York hospital spoke in detail of an aborted infant's survival last year and the traumatic impact this event had on the hospital's staff. The next day, he called back to deny the incident had ever occurred.

The questions of when abortions should be performed, by what method, and what kinds of infants should be saved are answered differently by different physicians.

While publicly the great majority of hospitals agree that any infant who survives an abortion or miscarriage should be kept alive, doctors acknowledge privately that this practice varies widely from hospital to hospital.

CIRCUMSTANCES OF PROCEDURE

"It's necessary to remember that these days abortion is done on request and therefore not a procedure you undertake in the interest of the fetus," said Dr. Gordon W. Douglass, the chief of obstetrics and gynecology at New York University Medical Center, where abortions are performed only until the 20th week of preganancy except in cases of fetal abnormality.

"What most of us try to do is to try to remain within the law and not generate problems for anyone," Dr. Douglas said. "The hospital requires any live fetus to be given full supportive services and full resuscitation regardless of prognosis. But the delivery of a living fetus carries no guarantee of a surviving adult of any competence."

Complicating the problem for doctors at many hospitals are advances that have been made in detecting defects long before birth. Many of these procedures, including amniocentesis and sonography, cannot be performed until relatively late in the pregnancy, so often decisions about such abortions are made just at the edge of fetal viability.

WORKING AT CROSS PURPOSES

"It makes us all schizophrenic," said Dr. Richard Hausknecht, an associate clinical professor of obstetrics and gynecology at Mount Sinai Hospital who specializes in high risk pregnancies. "Nowadays we are asked to terminate a pregnancy that in two weeks doctors on the same floor are fighting to save."

Very premature infants, with low birth weight, suffer from myriad problems. Recent advances have helped prevent lung collapse in these tiny infants and have made it possible to nourish them with new formulas.

Nevertheless, serious handicaps persist. The cost of producing a survivor from a fetus of less than 28 weeks' gestation—whether it is a result of an abortion or of natural miscarriage—can run into the tens of thousands of dollars, not including medical costs from later complications of premature birth.

THREE METHODS OF ABORTION

Much debate concerns the method by which late abortions are performed. Generally, there are three methods.

Injecting saline into the amniotic sac to induce labor in the mother is still the most commonly used procedure in late abortions. While it generally results in fetal death, it has been associated with harmful side effects in women and doctors have increasingly turned to the use of prosteglandin in late abortions.

Prosteglandin is a substance that also induces labor, but it does not poison the fetus. Of all abortion methods, prosteglandin—while believed to be the safest for women by some doctors—is also the most likely to result in a live birth.

The third and most controversial of the methods is dilation and evacuation. Known as D and E, it involves dismembering the fetus while still in the womb, which eliminates any possibility of live birth. It is a relatively new procedure in late abortions, and is generally believed to be among the safest for women and the least psychologically painful. However, it is also generally considered the most traumatic for doctors and staff.

The suction and curettage method, in which the cervix is dilated and the fetus is extracted through a suction tube, is generally applicable only in the early stages of pregnancy.

NEW PROCEDURE IS GAINING

According to the Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta, the use of dilation and evacuation in second-trimester abortions has increased greatly in recent years, as more physicians have learned to perform the procedure and it has gained in acceptance.

Division abounds among gynecologists about who is willing to perform late abortions and by what method.

"I think every obstetrician struggles with this and makes his mind up what his threshold is," said Dr. David Grimes, a gynecologist with the division of reproductive health at the center in Atlanta. "Some do it until 12 weeks. Some will do it until 24."

"It would not be worth it to me to take even a small risk to the mother's life to avoid possibility of a live birth," said Dr. Bruce Young, director of maternal-fetal medicine at New York University Medical Center, where the policy also is to perform abortions until the 20th week of pregnancy except in cases of fetal deformities. The method of choice at New York University Medical Center is the use of prosteglandin.

"A woman comes to me for a late abortion and I do it the best way I know how," said Dr. E. Wyman Garrett, an obstetrician in Newark who is among a growing number of physicians who have developed expertise in performing D and E's through the 24th week of pregnancy.

He said he prefers this method because it is safer for the woman and because it avoids the agonizing decision of what to do when a child is born alive—a situation he confronted only last year.

In that instance, Dr. Garrett performed a saline abortion on a young woman at University Hospital in Newark. The infant that emerged weighed about 1 pound 10 ounces and was alive. It was born Jan. 13 and died April 29 after developing meningitis.

"I do D and E's because I think it is safer," said Dr. William Rashbaum, a gynecologist affiliated with Beth Israel who also specializes in this method. "It is a horrible procedure. Staff burnout is a major problem. But are you functioning in the interests of taking care of your staff or taking care of your patients?"

THEORIES FOUNDER ON REALITY

A serious problem physicians confront in performing late abortions is the gap between abstract theories on fetal viability and the realities of medical practice.

In the case of the fetus born alive during an abortion at Beth Israel, for example, the infant was believed to have been only 22 weeks in gestation, but it was in fact 25 or 26 weeks, according to one doctor.

"The baby turned out to be older than we thought," the doctor said. Beth Israel officials said that the infant suffered extensive brain damage but would not discuss the incident further.

Pregnancy due dates, dates of conception and fetal viability are still uncertain areas. They depend on the skills of the doctor, the technical currentness of the hospital and individual development of the child.

METHOD OF DETERMINING AGE

When a woman in the second trimester of pregnancy approaches a physican for an abortion, she is asked to undergo a sonogram, which produces an image of the fetus. It is the best—though still far from perfect—way for doctors to determine gestational age, since recollections about last menstrual periods are highly imprecise.

The age is estimated by measuring the diameter between two points on the fetus's skull. In theory, the wider the diameter, the older the fetus. But accuracy depends on the machinery used and on the skill of the technician using it. Congenitally small children make estimations of fetal age even more difficult.

"Sonograms are very subjective," said Jeffrey Karaban, a sonographer at one of the largest abortion clinics in New York City, the Eastern Women's Center in Manhattan, where 8,000 abortions are performed a year. "Certainly there are a lot of bad sonograms done. We have patients come from seemingly reputable places and yet their sonograms don't jibe with what we see."

Viability is even more difficult to assess. Once a highly premature infant is born—either as a result of abortion or of miscarriage—its gestational age is determined by how much it weighs and a number of other physical characteristics: the condition of its eyes, the state of its skin, how much cartilage it has developed in its ears. This, too, is highly subjective.

CHARACTERISTICS OF FETUS

A 24-week fetus physically appears to resemble a child, but its lungs and brain are still not fully developed, nor are its eyelids open.

If a decision has been made to resuscitate the baby, a mask may be placed over its mouth and nose and a needle placed through its navel to measure blood pressure and body chemistry. The baby is then weighed and further examined to determine whether to continue treatment.

Some doctors do not believe an infant is "viable," and thus a subject for the most advanced and agressive treatment, if it is seriously deformed or has been determined to have less than a 20 percent chance of survival. Other doctors will try to save any infant with a heart beat.

"I have never been called to deal with such a case, but if I were I would vigorously treat that baby," said Dr. John Driscoll, director of the neonatal intensive care unit at Columbia-Presbyterian. "If the baby was anomalous, there would be a whole other set of dilemmas. If I were asked about a Down's syndrome baby, I believe everything should be done. I differ with some people's thoughts about quality-of-life issues."

The underlying question that many doctors ask in confronting these difficult medical problems is why late abortions are still necessary, given the availability of contraceptives and the comparative ease with which abortions can now be obtained.

Indeed, over the past 10 years, elective abortions have been performed at progressively earlier stages of pregnancy nationwide, and the great majority are now carried out within the first trimester.

Of the 1.6 million abortions performed in the United States in 1980—the last available figure from the Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta—more than 90 percent were done within the first 12 weeks. Only about 13,000—less than 1 percent of all abortions performed nationwide—were performed on women pregnant more than 21 weeks.

According to statistics compiled by the Centers for Disease Control, the largest group of these women is between the ages of 15 and 19.

Many of these are believed to be unwed teen-agers who do not know they are pregnant until they feel the baby kick. Quickening—as fetal movement is called—usually first occurs between the 17th and 20th weeks of pregnancy. About 10 percent of all second-trimester abortions—less than 1 percent overall—are performed on women who have discovered they are carrying infants with serious defects.

Amniocentesis is usually performed during the 14th through 16th weeks of pregnancy. Results take at least three to four weeks, so that a woman choosing to abort a fetus with birth defects may not be able to do so until the 17th or as late as the 20th week of pregnancy. If there are problems with culturing the fluid, it may have to be performed even later.

In an article to be published by the Georgetown University Law Journal next June, Nancy K. Rhoden, assistant professor of law at Ohio State University in Columbus, points out that advances in neonatology may have made the Supreme Court's Roe v. Wade decision obsolete.

NEW CUTOFF POINT SUGGESTED

Miss Rhoden suggests an arbitrary cutoff point of 20 weeks or the halfway mark of pregnancy as a new limit for abortions, with exceptions to be made for women who have found through amniocentesis that their offspring have serious defects.

But as legal scholars, ethicists and others continue to dissect this complicated subject, hospitals and physicians are trying to cope with the human drama of what is appropriate and what is not, whether abortions should now be carried out in the obstetrical wings of hospitals where fetuses can be monitored or whether neonatologists should be present at abortions where a live birth is a possibility.

"Social policy makes the late abortion issue worse," said Dr. Phillip Stubblefield, chief of obstetrics and gynecology at Mount Auburn Hospital in Cambridge, Mass., and an associate professor at Harvard Medical School. "Doing an abortion at 28 weeks is indefensible. I would draw a line at 24." The only exception he would make would be to save the life of the mother.

"But there should be a middle ground," he added. "Some abortions are necessary. What we should do is try to streamline the system so that help can be gotten earlier."

"What are the chances of a 24-week fetus to have a normal life?" asked Dr. William Caspe, the director of pediatrics at Bronx-Lebanon Hospital. "Probably small. Can they survive in terms of their heart and lungs? Yes. In terms of brain survival we are not there. And so a number of us have great qualms about what to do to a teeny tiny baby. For medical and legal reasons, we need to resuscitate. Some feel comfortable at that. Some don't.

"As a society, you shouldn't want us to do that. But as society, you give us no choice."●

COLORADO FEDERATION OF NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF RETIRED FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

● Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, in a few days, the Colorado Federation of the National Association of Retired Federal Employees [NARFE] will hold their annual convention in Sterling, CO. This convention will officially end the second and final year of leadership of Colorado NARFE's president, John D'Arcangelis.

John recently informed my office of the tremendous contribution of volunteer services given to their communities by Colorado's Federal retirees in 1985. According to figures compiled by Colorado NARFE, more than 403,000 total hours of volunteer community services were performed by members. The more than 5,200 NARFE members in 29 Colorado chapters participated in charity drives, counseling services, hospital volunteer work, and many other worthy community pursuits.

But perhaps even more important is the spirit of involvement and cooperation with those of us in public office that has been fostered over the past couple of years under John's leadership.

Since John assumed the Colorado NARFE presidency in April 1984, a very healthy give and take of views has occurred between my office and the NARFE organization. There is no organization or individual with which an elected official will always agree, but John has seen to it that no issue of direct concern to Federal retirees has risen that the Colorado NARFE position was not clearly and forcefully made to my office.

One of the most clearly defined areas of agreement John and I shared was our mutual concern over the perceived public image of Federal employees and retirees. John and the Colorado NARFE asked me to assist them in communicating the positive, real story to the public.

I have always been familiar with the Federal employee dedication and commitment to serving the U.S. Government and ultimately the American people, but I had to reluctantly agree that the overall public image of Federal employees and retirees was a bit tarnished for many unfair reasons.

In view of that I was pleased to assist in focusing public attention on the national and Colorado NARFE efforts on behalf of the Alzheimer's Association in counseling and assisting families of victims of Alzheimer's disease. This NARFE effort is unprecedented and in my opinion is a real turning point in educating the public about this horrible disease which robs many of our retired citizens of their golden years.

I look forward to working with John's successor as president, who will be selected at the Sterling convention, in finding ways to communicate the real story to the public of Federal employees' and retirees' efforts in their jobs and communities.●

ORDERS FOR WEDNESDAY

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that once the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until the hour of 10 a.m., on Wednesday, April 23, 1986.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS

Mr. DOLE. I further ask unanimous consent that following the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order there be special orders in favor of the following Senators for not to exceed 5 minutes: Senators HAWKINS, BIDEN, CRANSTON, and PROXMIRE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. I ask unanimous consent that Senator CRANSTON follow Senator HAWKINS, and then Senator BIDEN will be No. 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period after the special orders for transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 10:30 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for not more than 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. DOLE. As indicated, at that time—which will be approximately 10:30 a.m.—we will resume consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 120, the budget resolution.

I think it is fair to say that there will be votes. By prior agreement and understanding there will be no votes, if any votes are ordered, after 4 p.m. They will be delayed until the following day.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished majority leader yield? Would the distinguished majority leader change that time from 4 o'clock to 3:30 p.m.? We can charge enough against the budget resolution. But if he would, I am certain Senators would appreciate it.

Mr. DOLE. We have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the majority leader put that in the form of a unanimous-consent request?

NO ROLLCALL VOTES AFTER 3:30 P.M. TOMORROW

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that any rollcall votes ordered after 3:30 p.m. be postponed until Thursday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(Later the following occurred:)

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, earlier we had indicated that there would be no votes after 3:30 tomorrow, and any votes ordered would be postponed until Thursday. I want to make the RECORD clear that I refer only to votes on S. 120, the budget resolution.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader. I think that was the intention and understanding on this side as well.

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, there being no further business to come before the Senate, I move, in accordance with the previous order, that the Senate stand in recess until 10 a.m., on Wednesday, April 23, 1986.

The motion was agreed to, and at 6:35 p.m., the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Wednesday, April 23, 1986, at 10 a.m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate April 22, 1986:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

Ronald Frank Lehman II, of Virginia, for the rank of Ambassador during his tenure of service as U.S. Negotiator for Strategic Nuclear Arms, vice John Goodwin Tower.

THE JUDICIARY

Alan E. Norris, of Ohio, to be U.S. circuit judge for the sixth circuit vice Leroy J. Conti, Jr., retired.

John G. Davies, of California, to be U.S. district judge for the central district of California vice Cynthia Holcomb Hall, elevated.

Douglas P. Woodlock, of Massachusetts, to be U.S. district judge for the district of Massachusetts vice W. Arthur Garrity Jr., retired.

David Hittner, of Texas, to be U.S. district judge for the southern district of Texas, vice George E. Cire, deceased.

IN THE ARMY

The following-named officer to be placed on the retired list in grade indicated under the provisions of title 10, United States Code, section 1370:

To be lieutenant general

Lt. Gen. John D. Bruen, [redacted] age 55, U.S. Army.

The following-named officer under the provisions of title 10, United States Code, section 601, to be assigned to a position of importance and responsibility designated by the President under title 10, United States Code, section 601:

To be lieutenant general

Maj. Gen. Kenneth E. Lewis, [redacted] U.S. Army.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Tuesday, April 22, 1986

The House met at 12 noon.

The Reverend Eleanore W. Drury, assistant minister, The Black Church at Yale, New Haven, CT, offered the following prayer:

Will you join me in prayer?

O Almighty God, we pause here to give You thanks for Your great gifts of plenty, freedom, and peace, to us and to our Nation. Grant that we may use them well; that of our plenty, we may share; that in our freedom, we may work for the freedom of all; that in guarding our precious peace, we not create war in other lands.

O God, we are not gods. You know that at the moment we are most content, we are most in danger. Forgive the wrongs which we commit in the name of right, our false logic, our proud grip on power, the fears which spring to mind when we are pressed by those whose ways are different from our own. Though we are called to lead, O Lord, You know we are just humans. Grant us ears to hear Your voice, for unless you guide us, we may lead Your world astray. And though we may fail Your vision, let not the vision fail. Give us faith that our times, though filled with dangers, are not the end of history. Give us tough minds, open hearts, and strong wills for the works of peace and justice.

And to this end, O Lord, direct and bless us. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

THE REVEREND ELEANORE W. DRURY

(Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. MORRISION of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure today to welcome the Reverend Eleanore W. Drury as our guest chaplain and to thank her for her thoughtful and most appropriate prayer. I am very proud to have her, both as a constituent and as a friend.

Reverend Drury has had a distinguished career in a wide variety of service-related fields. She has served as a trainer and clinician with the Connecticut Self-Help Support Network and with the Hamden Mental Health Service.

In both instances, she developed innovative programs to significantly aid people in a variety of ways.

The Reverend Drury was selected to be the counselor to students and the first woman chaplain at Choate Rosemary Hall School in Wallingford, CT, and served as an effective counselor and teacher.

She is a graduate of the University of Arizona, the University of Connecticut's School of Social Work, and the Yale University Divinity School. She is also the mother of 5 children and she presently serves as assistant pastor of the Black Church at Yale.

In addition to her relationship to me and my district, Reverend Drury is also the sister-in-law of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLINGER] and I yield to him for a moment.

Mr. CLINGER. I thank the gentleman very much for yielding.

I would just like to join with the gentleman from Connecticut in welcoming our guest chaplain this morning. As the gentleman indicated, she is my sister-in-law and I would hope that everybody could have a sister-in-law as caring and as friendly as my sister-in-law is. She has made very valuable contributions to every community in which she has served, as the gentleman has indicated. She has helped countless people through her work as a counselor, and beyond that, she knows the lyrics to more old songs than anybody I know, with the possible exception of her sister.

I am delighted to welcome her here today and join with the gentleman in welcoming her.

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

AMENDING THE RULES OF THE HOUSE TO INCREASE AMOUNT OF OUTSIDE EARNED INCOME WHICH A MEMBER MAY ACCEPT

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 427) amending the Rules of the House of Representatives to increase the amount of outside earned income which a Member may accept, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 427

Resolved, That clause 1 of rule XLVII of the Rules of the House of Representatives is amended by striking out "which is in excess" and all that follows in both paragraph (a) and paragraph (b) and inserting in lieu thereof in each instance "in excess of the percentage of the aggregate salary as a Member, paid to the Member during such calendar year, to which such outside earned income is limited by law.".

SEC. 2. The amendments made by the first section of this resolution shall take effect on January 1, 1986.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HILER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, could we be enlightened as to what the gentleman's resolution is about?

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, this has been cleared by the leadership on both sides. It just changes the rules to bring them into closer compliance with the Senate rules.

The intent of this amendment to the House rule is to change the current 30-percent limitation to 40 percent.

Mr. HILER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROVIDING FOR APPOINTMENT TO SERVICE ACADEMIES OF CHILDREN OF MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES KILLED IN MILITARY ACTION AGAINST LIBYA

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Armed Services be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 604) providing for appointment to the service academies of children of members of the Armed Forces killed in the military action against Libya on April 15, 1986, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall not object, but I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY] to explain the reason for his request.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution recognizes the dedicated professionalism of our armed forces in the recent military action over Libya and expresses our profound gratitude for the supreme sacrifice made by the two airmen killed in that action. The resolution would make it possible for the children of service members killed in that action to attend one of the service academies should they become qualified to do so.

If the gentleman will yield further, this resolution is introduced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT], the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL], and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT].

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT].

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY] a member of the Committee on Armed Services, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HILLIS].

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this resolution and I ask that House Joint Resolution 604, which I have joined with my colleagues—the distinguished minority leader, the majority leader, and the majority whip—in sponsoring, may be considered today by this body. The measure proposes to provide for the appointment to the service academies of children of members of the Armed Forces killed in the military action against Libya on April 15, 1986. By enacting this legislation, the Congress recognizes the dedicated professionalism of members of the Armed Forces in recent military action to combat state-sponsored terrorism and particularly expresses its profound gratitude for the brave service of Capt. Fernando Ribas-Dominicci and Capt. Paul F. Lorence of the U.S. Air Force, who made the supreme sacrifice for their country in action against Libya on April 15, 1986.

Captain Ribas-Dominicci, the pilot, was born in June of 1952 and was, therefore, 33 years of age when he died a hero's death in the air attack against Libya. Captain Ribas-Dominicci was married to Blanca and had one son, Fernandito, who is 4½ years old. Hailing from Mayagüez, Puerto Rico, Captain Ribas-Dominicci was the recipient of a bachelor's degree in civil engineering and a master's degree in aero science. With over 1,800 flying hours, Captain Ribas-Dominicci was highly experienced in flying F-111's. Stationed at Lakenheith Royal Air Force Air Base in England since March of 1983, Captain Ribas-Dominicci previously was stationed at Cannon Air Force Base in New Mexico.

Capt. Paul Lorence, the navigation weapons system officer, was 31 years of age when he died serving his country. Born in February of 1955, Captain Lorence received his navigational training in California after being awarded a bachelor's degree in history. Married to Diana, Captain Lorence had one son, Peter, who was less than a year old when his father died. Also stationed at Lakenheith since August 1981, Captain Lorence had been flying F-111's for 4½ years. Participating in the attack on Libya was his first operational duty assignment.

Mr. Speaker, these two officers died serving their country last week, and all of America is proud of their brave, heroic deed. With their families, friends, and all the people of this Nation, I bow in sorrow at their passing, but I am humbly grateful for their undying courage and the magnificent patriotism with which they lived.

I hope my colleagues will join me in expeditiously passing this measure on behalf of these two brave men.

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Speaker, the resolution before us today—cosponsored by the bipartisan leadership of the House—fulfills the request made to the President by Mrs. Fernando Ribas-Dominicci, the widow of the pilot of the F-111 bomber lost in last week's military action against Libya. When President Reagan asked Mrs. Ribas-Dominicci if he could do anything for her, she asked only that her young son, Fernando, be able to attend the Air Force Academy. House Joint Resolution 604 accomplishes that goal.

We are deeply thankful that all the other American aircraft returned safely from this decisive and successful strike against a nation whose principal export is terrorism and death. I join with my colleagues in extending sincere sympathy to the families of the two crewmembers who did not return. The resolution before the House today is a small token to express the Nation's gratitude for their sacrifice. Captains Ribas-Dominicci and Lorence—and all the members of the Armed Forces who participated in the Libyan raid—represent the professionalism of our Nation's Armed Forces at its finest.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 604

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. RECOGNITION OF MEMBERS OF THE ARMED FORCES.

The Congress recognizes the dedicated professionalism of members of the Armed Forces in recent military action to combat state-sponsored terrorism and particularly expresses its profound gratitude for the brave service of Captain Fernando Ribas-Dominicci and Captain Paul F. Lorence of the United States Air Force, who made the supreme sacrifice for their country in action against Libya on April 15, 1986.

SEC. 2. SERVICE ACADEMY APPOINTMENTS FOR CHILDREN OF CERTAIN MEMBERS.

(a) APPOINTMENT.—At such time as a qualifying child satisfies the age and other requirements for admission to a service academy of such child's choice, the President (or the Secretary empowered to make appointments to the United States Coast Guard Academy or the United States Merchant Marine Academy) in office at such time is requested to appoint the child to that academy.

(b) QUALIFYING CHILD DEFINED.—For purposes of this Act, the term "qualifying child" means a child of a member of the Armed Forces killed in the military action against Libya on April 15, 1986.

(c) SERVICE ACADEMY DEFINED.—For purposes of this Act, the term "service academy" means each of the following:

(1) The United States Military Academy.

(2) The United States Naval Academy.

(3) The United States Air Force Academy.

(4) The United States Coast Guard Academy.

(5) The United States Merchant Marine Academy.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the joint resolution just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON BANKING, FINANCE AND URBAN AFFAIRS TO SIT TODAY DURING PROCEEDINGS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs be permitted to sit during proceedings of the House today to mark up H.R. 4574, International Debt, Trade, and Financial Stabilization Act; H.R. 4510, Export-Import Bank Authorization; and H.R. 2373, Council on Industrial Competitiveness Act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BOULTER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard. The Chair will state that it requires 10 Members to object.

The Chair counts an insufficient number of Members standing.

The gentleman's request is agreed to.

RESIGNATION AS MEMBER AND APPOINTMENT AS MEMBER OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON CHILDREN, YOUTH, AND FAMILIES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resignation as a member of the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, April 21, 1986.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, H204, The U.S. Capitol, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I have served as a member of the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families since coming to Congress. I have enjoyed serving on the Select Committee, but time wouldn't allow me to continue. I hereby resign my appointment to this Select Committee effective this date.

Sincerely,

DAN BURTON,
Member of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation is accepted.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the provisions of section 3 of House Resolution 25, 99th Congress, the Chair appoints the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COBEY] as a member of the Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families to fill the existing vacancy thereon.

LIBYAN RAID AND ENERGY POLICIES

(Mrs. LLOYD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that the oil dependence of our NATO allies is a major reason the United States was unable to obtain widespread support for its antiterrorist raid on Libya.

Clearly, allies such as Germany and France are held hostage to their dependence on unstable Middle East oil supplies such that they cannot afford to disrupt their energy supply.

I have, for years, consistently maintained the importance of energy independence for our national security. We should derive little comfort from short-term low oil prices and the so-called world glut from a national security standpoint. The United States and its allies should put some premium on assuring stability in the Middle East.

The Libyan turmoil and the protracted Iran-Iraq war combined with regional zealotry, suggests things may get worse before they get better in terms of that political stability. Nevertheless, it would be most prudent for the United States and its NATO allies to begin now to devise a comprehensive strategy for dealing with security issues in that region, including the critical oil supply issue.

CENTRAL AMERICAN LEADERS GIVE PUBLIC SUPPORT FOR AID, TO THE CONTRAS

(Mr. LAGOMARSINO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, during the many hours of debate on aid to the Contras both in March and last week, we constantly heard that government leaders in the region opposed military aid to the Contras. There were references that leaders privately supported the aid but could not say so publicly. Critics of that aid gave the impression that they did not believe there was even private support for military aid to the Contras.

Earlier, Salvadoran President Duarte had given public support for aid to the Contras, and now there is another Central American leader who has had the courage to publicly give his views. When two European newspaper reporters asked Honduran President Jose Azcona last week whether he favored the $100 million for the Contras, President Azcona replied, "I think that it is more advisable for Honduras that the $100 million be approved."

President Azcona has now said publicly what many of us have known all along. There are Central American leaders who believe the United States should be giving military assistance to the Contras whether they say so in public or not.

BIG BANKS DISPLAY GREED IN CREDIT CARD OPERATIONS

(Mr. BIAGGI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, there is an old saying that the rich get richer. Events of the past several days seem to confirm this.

On Friday the Federal Reserve Board announced a cut in the discount rate to 6.5 percent. That is the interest rate banks pay when they borrow from the Fed.

Yesterday, banks across the Nation announced they were lowering the prime rate to 8.5 percent. This is the rate banks charge their preferred customers for borrowing.

Once again, the 100 million credit card consumers of our Nation await the modern-day version of the trickle-down theory to occur. Where is the announcement by these same banks of a cut in the credit card interest rates they charge?

I would guess it is not likely to come soon. Consider in 1981, the discount rate was 14 percent. It is now 6.5 percent. What happened to credit card interest rates? They shot up from 17.7 percent to 19.8 percent.

It is both indefensible and arrogant for major banks not to share their substantial cost savings with the American consumer through lower credit card interest rates. Yesterday, I released a study by Spencer Nilson, a respected credit card newsletter author, who disclosed that major credit card issuing banks amassed profits of $3.6 billion in 1985. What greed. The discount rate has already been cut twice this year. Those profits will surely go up.

It is time credit card consumers got a break. I urge passage of my bill H.R. 1197, which would cap credit card interest rates at 11.5 percent; a full 8 percentage points below present rates.

It seems the banks have a friend in the Fed. It is time Congress became the friend of the credit card consumer.

LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE MORE ACCESSIBLE HEALTH CARE TO VETERANS

(Mr. LEWIS of Florida asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEWIS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation requiring the VA to enter into health care contracts with non-VA medical facilities where current VA facilities are inadequate or not available.

Currently veterans nationwide must make round trips in excess of several hundred or even 1,000 miles to receive treatment at a VA hospital, and they must travel this distance when there is an available non-VA facility within a few miles of their residence.

Palm Beach County, FL, is anticipating a 1993 completion of a VA hospital and nursing home to serve approximately 160,000 area veterans.

We have to face the fact until Congress passes a budget that complies with the Gramm-Rudman ceilings, delays could occur in the completion of VA hospitals and clinics across the United States.

My bill provides immediate relief for veterans by providing accessible health care through private contracts until a local VA health care facility is available. Enactment of my legislation ensures that the special health care needs of our veterans are not ignored.

Our veterans deserve no less.

ELECTRIC CONSUMERS PROTECTION ACT

(Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my concern about the preference section of H.R. 44, the Electric Consumers Protection Act, which was passed yesterday by the House.

This bill would eliminate the current preference given to public entities in the relicensing of Federal hydroelectric projects.

As a strong supporter of public power, I support the concept that preference should be granted to public power authorities not only in the initial licensing of Federal hydroelectric facilities, but also in their relicensing.

Removing all preference in relicensing and establishing competitive procedures is, I suppose, an acceptable compromise. But I would strongly urge my colleagues who will be conferees with the other body on this bill to oppose any proposal that would weaken the preference given public power any further.

Nebraska is the only State that is completely dependent on public power. In my State, the low-cost electricity provided to public entities through preference rates and licensing has been crucial to the economic survival of small towns, rural electric cooperatives, and especially to our agricultural industry. Losing public preference would be a disaster for us.

CONGRESS MUST ACT NOW ON YOUTH SUICIDE PREVENTION

(Mr. ACKERMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, last spring, Congressman TOM LANTOS introduced the Youth Suicide Prevention Act, and I introduced a similar bill, the Teenage Suicide Prevention Act.

Since that time, since the 99th Congress convened last January, another 5,000 youngsters have taken their own lives—5,000 young Americans, Mr. Speaker: How many scientists, how many athletes, how many world leaders have we lost? Five thousand young Americans and still the Congress is silent.

The true tragedy, Mr. Speaker, is that we have found ways to begin to stop this horror. Given a chance, our schools and our communities can recognize the silent cries of a troubled teenager before it is too late; but, sadly, we have failed to give our educators the tools they need to stop this madness.

Today, Congressman TOM LANTOS and I are introducing the Youth Suicide Prevention Act of 1986. We must stop this killing. We are demanding that the United States turn its attention, its energy and its money to this horrifying tragedy so that we may end this scourge forever.

Our bill authorizes $10 million a year for the next 3 years for small grants to local schools and nonprofit organizations to establish suicide prevention and education problems.

As a former public school teacher, I fully realize how difficult a task this is, but I strongly believe that our schools can be used and must be used to save lives. We must not allow this crisis that is destroying our most promising youngsters to continue.

I invite all of my colleagues to join Congressman LANTOS and myself by sponsoring this urgent legislation.

LIABILITY—MAKING THE RISKS PREDICTABLE

(Mr. PORTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, the liability explosion is upon us, creating chaos and obtaining coverage and pushing up insurance premiums for every business, every physician and other professional, including lawyers, and every municipality, school district, township, park and fire protection district across the country.

Misguided cries are heard to have the antitrust exemption for insurance companies lifted under the McCarron-Ferguson Act so that they can no longer share risk information. To have the Federal Government heavily and directly regulate the insurance industry, or to have the Federal Government go into the reinsurance business.

These, Mr. Speaker, are all nonsolutions to the problem. If it was only insurance premiums rising, I might suspect collusion and exorbitant profits by insurance companies. However, insurance companies are refusing to provide coverage and leaving the market, because the risks they are asked to cover have become completely unpredictable.

Making these risks once again predictable is the essence of the reforms that are needed. More tomorrow.

THE FRENCH TURNAROUND

(Mr. GEKAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, most Americans were bitterly disappointed at the attitude and action of the French Government in refusing air rights over their country during the recent Libyan action. This seemed to be a further indication of some of the loose alliance that we have with our friends in Europe. Yet, there is good news emerging from this bad news.

A poll taken among French citizens indicated that by a margin of 2 to 1, overwhelmingly, the French people supported the American action and, conversely, condemned their own government's refusal to accord air flight rights.

So we feel better today than we did at that time about the attitude of at least the French people. Moreover, since then the European countries and the European parliament have imposed certain sanctions on Libyan citizens, certain passport restrictions, and have expelled people from their embassies and from their countries on the basis of a final recognition that indeed Libya is the breeding ground of terrorism. So, we have come a long way ever since all the condemnation have occurred since the Libyan action.

SUPPORT URGED FOR CURRENT PROVISIONS RELATED TO COMBINED FEDERAL CAMPAIGN

(Mr. GARCIA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise an extend his remarks.)

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, today, we will be voting on the urgent supplemental appropriations for fiscal year 1986. One of the items included in the bill is the Combined Federal Campaign [CFC], a fund raising drive which has proven over the years to be highly effective in collecting large amounts of contributions from Federal workers for charitable organizations.

I rise in support of the current provisions related to the Combined Federal Campaign. These provisions ensure that the charitable organizations that have participated in the past will continue to participate in 1986 in spite of the new regulations proposed by the Office of Personnel Management [OPM] and that OPM will remain neutral in administering the CFC Program.

The Office of Personnel Management has proposed new regulations to eliminate public advocacy groups from the 1986 campaign and even prohibit write-ins by the Federal workers of their favorite charities' names. Thousands of local and national charities would be cut off as a result of the regulations thus restricting Federal workers options to give to the charities of their choice. The OPM's proposed regulations are pending review in a Federal district court. Because the case is pending, it is important that the status quo of the regulations be maintained.

I urge my colleagues to vote against the Bliley amendment today and allow the Combined Federal Campaign to operate under existing regulations, which have proven to be successful.

Again, I urge my colleagues to vote against the Bliley amendment.

ANCIENT IDOLS IN MODERN DISGUISE

(Mr. DANNEMEYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, economists advocating irredeemable currency like to flatter themselves that they are the pioneers of a modern theory, unaware that they are but worshipping ancient idols in modern disguise. According to the Cincinnati Daily Gazette of January 3, 1879, Gen. (later President) James A. Garfield stated in an address in Chicago, to celebrate R-day (Resumption day, January 2, 1879):

> We shall still hear echoes of the old conflict, such as the "barbarism and cowardice of gold" and the "virtues of fiat money," but the theories which gave them birth will linger among us like belated ghosts, and soon find rest in the political grave of dead issues * * *.

General Garfield evidently respected the wisdom of our people too much to expect that a later generation, such as the present one, would not permit the theories advocating the "virtues" of fiat money to "rest in the political grave of dead issues." What General Garfield called a "periodical craze" swept over this country in 1971 and thereafter with a force apparently never before experienced by our people. The end of this great disease is not yet in sight. If past experience provides any worthwhile lessons, the ultimate consequences of our failure to stop this craze promise to be extremely painful. Conversely, if we rise to the challenge and put an end to this craze now, we shall solve the major part of the economic problems of our Nation, including the problems of runaway debt and runaway deficits. And we shall solve it in a painless, not to say pleasurable way.

LET'S NOT GIVE DEADLY STINGER WEAPONS TO TERRORISTS

(Mr. DURBIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, in the past week we have become acutely aware of the risks of terrorist attacks against American citizens at home and abroad. We are evacuating Americans from the Sudan, stepping up security at our airports, Embassies, and military bases. But at the same time, other actions of our Government could be placing Americans at even greater risk. In recent weeks the administration has begun sending guerrilla groups one of the most dangerous weapons on the market, the Stinger antiaircraft missile.

The Stingers have already gone to guerrillas involved in covert operations in Angola and Afghanistan as part of a new United States policy to offer more sophisticated weapons to the United States-supported guerrilla groups. The Stingers are on their way. But we have absolutely no control over their ultimate fate. The administration has no guarantee that these weapons will not be sold or stolen or transferred into the hands of terrorists seeking to retaliate against the United States. Imagine this weapon in the hands of a Mu'ammar Qadhafi. The state-of-the-art Stinger is deadly accurate, easy to hide and operate, and can shoot down not only military aircraft but a commercial airliner.

How can we be sure these weapons, though shipped to guerrilla groups we might support, will not end up surreptitiously in the hands of Qadhafi and his allies, people who would like nothing better than a sophisticated and spectacular means of retaliation against the United States?

Screening devices and searches would pale into insignificance next to the very real threat that a terrorist could stand hundreds of yards from a runway and strike, kill hundreds of innocent people.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join in the fight against giving deadly weapons to terrorists by sponsoring the resolution I have introduced with the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. AUCOIN] to ban the transfer of Stingers to guerrilla and paramilitary groups.

U.N. MAJORITY USES DOUBLE STANDARD IN JUDGING UNITED STATES AND LIBYAN ACTIONS

(Mr. PARRIS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I take the floor today frustrated, but not really surprised, by the requirement of the United States, Britain, and France to veto a resolution considered by the United Nations' Security Council yesterday to condemn the recent United States action against Libyan terrorists.

The resolution, did not mention events leading up to the United States action and instead mention Libya only as a victim of an armed attack by the United States.

This is simply another case in which the U.N. majority is using a double standard in practicing selective indignation over alleged abuses by the United States and other Western nations while so often overlooking outrages committed by Socialist and Communist countries.

Voting in favor of the resolution were such well-recognized nonaligned nations as Bulgaria, Congo, Ghana, Madagascar, United Arab Emirates, and the Soviet Union.

Calling this group nonaligned is like being called ugly by a frog.

STINGER: THE TERRORISTS' DELIGHT

(Mr. AUCOIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Speaker, as we do our daily mile of trotting between the House Chamber and our offices, pause for a moment and look south. There you'll see passenger airliners climbing out from National Airport.

If a terrorist were standing beside you with a stinger antiaircraft missile on his shoulder, he could shoot any of those airplanes down. He could do it from more than 10 square miles of the Washington area, or from a comparable area in most of the world's major cities.

If terrorists get these missiles, every air traveler in the world will be at their mercy.

Terrorists don't have these missiles today. But tomorrow they could, with the administration's decision to give them to paramilitary forces in Afganistan and Angola. Whatever the virtures of these groups, airtight control of their weapons isn't among them.

Transfer of Stingers to paramilitary forces is a terrorist's dream. It is dangerous and dumb. I invite you to join Mr. DURBIN and me in cosponsoring legislation to prohibit this transfer. If we don't stop it now, the time will come when we'll wish we had.

THERE IS A "STINGER" IN THE HOUSE

(Mr. WALKER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, a couple of Members were speaking of Stingers here a few minutes ago. Well, a few minutes ago before that the American people just got stung. We had a resolution pass this House by unanimous consent that has the effect of increasing the outside earnings that Members of Congress are allowed to make by $7,500.

There was an end run around the committee process, an end run done around the procedure supposedly established on this floor for unanimous consent resolutions, to the floor. Supposedly, the rule that says that the minority leader has to be consulted, the minority whip has to be consulted, the majority leader has to be consulted, the majority whip, that the chairmen of the committees have to be consulted and the ranking member.

I understand those procedures were not followed, that in fact we have a resolution that passed this House that has the effect of increasing the earnings of the Members of this Congress substantially, passed here by unanimous consent and was done so by an end run.

REQUEST TO VACATE CERTAIN PROCEEDINGS

Mr. WALKER. So therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would ask unanimous consent that the proceedings by which House Resolution 427 was approved be vacated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MONTGOMERY). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER]?

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman from New York has objected, so therefore the gentleman from New York stands in favor of raising the outside earnings, with an end run, by $7,500 for every Member of Congress.

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARCIA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Frankly, I am hearing this for the first time. And until such time as the proper authorities on both sides of the aisle can have an opportunity to talk about it, I will continue to object.

Mr. WALKER. That is the procedure under which we supposedly operate here, that we do get things cleared. They were not cleared.

So the gentleman has, in effect, helped to raise the outside earnings of Members of Congress by $7,500. You will have to live with that.

EXPLANATION OF OBJECTION

(Mr. WEISS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I would yield at this time to my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. GARCIA].

Mr. GARCIA. Well, I do not want to get into a quarrel with my colleague from Pennsylvania. But this is something that has come up very suddenly. I think people have made decisions. I am not necessarily saying I agree or disagree. What I am saying is that to make a unanimous-consent request when the Chamber is empty, before the principals have an opportunity to talk about this, I would continue to object.

I would ask my colleague from Pennsylvania that he talk to the leadership on his side, have the leadership on his side discuss it with the leadership on our side and let us see if we can resolve it.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

WORLD FOOD DAY

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 296) to designate October 16, 1986, as "World Food Day," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object because I have no problem with the resolution, but I do think an explanation is in order. The gentleman is protecting the process that he says should not bring up a unanimous-consent resolution in a Chamber that is empty. When I asked unanimous consent to vacate the proceedings and allow the Members an additional $7,500 in outside earnings, that is precisely the procedure that was used here a few minutes ago in order to pass the resolution. An empty Chamber was used, and nonconsultation with the appropriate people was used, and we had this thing passed without the appropriate clearances having been made.

And now what the gentleman is suggesting is, having done this end-run around the House, a chance to vacate that and get us back to neutral ground is in fact wrong. That is my problem. Precisely the situation that the gentleman protests is what was used to pass the resolution that is in fact, I think, a wrongful resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I would hope that what the gentleman would allow is to do is by unanimous consent to get us back to ground zero, and then bring the resolution up, as the gentleman has suggested, when there are people in the House and we can look at this thing.

There is no earthly reason why we should allow $7,500 of increased earnings by Members of Congress to pass this body by unanimous consent, and yet that is what was allowed here just a few moments ago.

Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I have no response. I will just say what I said before. There are leaders on the gentleman's side of the aisle who were elected by the people on the gentleman's side and leaders on this side. I believe that that leadership, which I might add is excellent leadership for both sides, should have the opportunity to discuss it. I am certain that they can come back and do the same thing that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is trying to do here, and I would have no objection.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman is absolutely right. But those leaders were not consulted with. That is the problem. The procedures that the Speaker has laid out for unanimous-consent resolutions to be brought forward were in fact violated.

I have here a copy of it, and it says, frankly, that the unanimous consent can only be brought up when assured that the majority and minority leadership, the committee and subcommittee chairmen and the ranking minority members have no objection. That procedure, it is my understanding, was not followed here. That is the objection. The only way that we can get back to ground zero is to vacate the proceedings that violated that particular order, and then consult with the leadership and make certain that everybody gets consulted with. That is all I am trying to achieve. It is the gentleman's objection that is standing in the way of achieving getting back to a relatively neutral position on this and so that the discussion can take place.

Mr. Speaker, do I understand the gentleman will still object?

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I still object.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object, but I simply would like to inform the House the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, under my reservation, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN], who is the chief sponsor of House Journal Resolution 595, to designate October 16, 1986, as "World Food Day."

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA], and the ranking minority member, the gentleman from Utah [Mr. HANSEN], for bringing this measure up at an early date in order to enable the administration, the Members of Congress, and our entire Nation to gather together in tribute and pay proper respects to World Food Day.

Mr. Speaker, events such as the "Live Aid" concert and the U.S.A. for Africa production of "We are the world" only in part document the incredible contribution thousands of Americans are making toward ending world hunger.

Since 1979, the National Committee for World Food Day, under the leadership of its chairwoman, Patricia Young, and the auspices of the World Food and Agriculture Organization [FAO] has undertaken hundreds of projects and programs related to the world's hunger problem. Without world food day and the organizations involved with its celebration, the ground swell needed that made the massive media events possible would never have existed.

Yet, despite this outpouring of support, the problem of world hunger persists. A recent world bank study states that "since 1980 one-third of the population of 87 developing countries, 730 million people, did not eat enough to lead active working lives." And half, 340 million, "subsisted on a Diet that stunts growth and severely jeopardizes health." UNICEF informs us that every 24 hours 42,000 children under the age of 5 die as a result of hunger and related diseases.

These grim statistics make a strong case for a continued commitment of private and Government funds to ending hunger. But emergency relief aid is not enough. A concerted effort must be made to improve the deteriorating conditions that result in tragedy after tragedy, the same conditions that allow famine and starvation to persist and remain a reality in a world with more than enough resources to feed its population. It is time to work to prevent disasters from occurring, to solve the problems which face Africa now.

To this end, I introduced H.R. 2782, legislation to prevent famine in Africa. H.R. 2782 responds to the root of the problem that faces a continent whose grain output per person has dropped since 1967 by nearly one-third.

Simply to maintain Africa's present per capita food consumption, agricultural output will have to grow 50 to 60 percent between the year 1980–2000. Considering the monumental suffering that exists with the present level of food consumption, it is clear that drastic measures must be taken to revive Africa's capacity to produce.

Reversing Africa's decline will involve immediate response to the crisis of the degradation of the natural resource base which results from overly intensive and exploitative use of land. 100 square miles of African land a day turns permanently into desert.

If this trend is not reversed, there will be no end to Africa's dependency on more developed countries for food and economic assistance.

One major cause of these current problems is the lack of a renewable energy supply. Firewood, the most widely used source of fuel, is becoming increasingly scarce due to the overharvesting of trees. Forests in coastal West Africa were being cleared at a rate of 5 percent per year in the early eighties; at that rate, in 13 years those forests will be half of their original size. The scarcity of trees also has implications for soil and crop quality. Trees help to prevent soil erosion caused by damaging winds and floods. Without any protection, soil ceases to be fertile enough to produce significant quantities of food.

In other instances at the behest of national governments and the support of multilateral development banks, cattle not native to the region have been introduced for the sole purpose of producing exports. These cattle require much more forage than do native producing exports. These cattle require much more forage than do native livestock. As a result they denude the land of vegetation. In addition because they are not used to the severe climate they are incapable of surviving prolonged droughts without drawing heavily on already limited water supplies.

The time has come to begin to turn back the tide of the degradation of Africa's agricultural resource base that should be providing food for that continent's people. The desertification and deforestation which have played a major role in causing the present catastrophe in Africa needs our immediate attention if we are to put an end to this cycle of famine.

Accordingly, I invite and urge my colleagues to join in this effort of focusing attention on the issue of world hunger.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA].

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I would just like to state to my colleague from New York [Mr. GILMAN] that both the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LELAND] have been pioneers and have worked very hard on the question of the world's food crises. I think it is a credit to them that they have taken the leadership role, and I think it is a credit to us that we have Members such as them in this body.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, once again this year I am pleased to join my colleagues as a cosponsor of a resolution commemorating World Food Day. World Food Day serves to remind us of one item that is essential to the survival of all beings on this Earth. This day is important, if for no other reason, because it raises our consciousness of the need by so many people in this world for food. In America, we too often take for granted the bread on our table. We forget that a shortage of adequate bread, or rice, or cereal is a daily fact of life for millions of people. The struggle for a meal is their No. 1 concern day in and day out. World Food Day is not only a time for Americans to be thankful for our agricultural abundance, but also a time to realize that we have a long way to go in seeing that everyone can share in that abundance.

I am thankful to say that we have seen some progress. Last year at this time, over 20 countries in sub-Saharan Africa faced food shortages. Due to drought, poor harvests, and ill-conceived agricultural policies, millions of Africans faced starvation and the debilitation of hunger related disease. The United States and other doner nations responded with an unprecedented relief effort. The United States alone sent over 3 million metric tons of food assistance to Africa valued at over $1 billion in 1985. This response undoubtedly saved hundreds of thousands, if not millions of lives. Today, the list of countries in dire need of food assistance is down to four. Renewed rainfall, combined with the use of new farm inputs have led to good harvests in many countries.

Still a great deal remains to be done in providing emergency assistance to thousands still in need, and we will continue to work in that regard. But it is also our goal to help these nations achieve greater self-sufficiency. We must not lose sight of our hope for long-term development in the most severely affected countries. The United States has traditionally supported development in sub-Saharan Africa through the transfer of agricultural technology. As we examine the needs for rehabilitation and recovery in much of Africa, we should look for opportunities to strengthen local infrastructure and research capability. We must also devote greater energy to the development of human capital. Proper education and training provide the underpinning of any successful agricultural system. Just as we have seen the benefits of the green revolution in Southeast Asia, so can we adapt known technologies and investment strategies to sub-Saharan Africa, even though the environment is quite different.

Our participation in the World Bank's International Development Association, the United Nation's World Food Programme and the International Fund for Agricultural Development has led to many successes. These programs remain crucial if the momentum of agricultural innovation is to continue. This must also include changes in developing country agricultural policy, so that more incentives are offered to local farmers and government pricing policies do not discourage production. This may involve greater leadership from multilateral organizations as envisioned in Treasury Secretary Baker's plan for resolving the debt problems of the poorest nations. We must be aware that burdensome external debt may hinder the growing efforts of poor countries to provide food for their people.

The United States is the world's foremost producer and trader of food commodities. Yet millions of people on this planet continue to suffer from malnutrition and starvation. Our humanitarian tradition has helped solve many short-term hunger problems in the past, and our leadership can help solve the chronic food shortages that many countries still face. World Food Day serves to remind us of the crises we've overcome and the hopes America has yet to fulfill. I urge all Members to think of this and to support adoption of this resolution designating October 16, 1986, as World Food Day.

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of House Joint Resolution 595, designating October 16, 1986, as World Food Day. This year will be the fifth anniversary of World Food Day. As chairman of the Select Committee on Hunger, I visited the famine-stricken people of Ethiopia. I witnessed first hand hunger and death from starvation in Africa. Television cameras and media attention have moved away from the refugee camps in Sudan and Ethiopia, but environmental degradation, increasing populations and declining food production continue to threaten the lives of millions of Africans. The Select Committee on Hunger has held hearings and is currently conducting an in depth investigation of food production needs in sub-Saharan Africa. We must continue our efforts to assist African farmers and pastoralists to achieve sustainable food security.

In the United States, a U.S. Conference of Mayors survey of 55 cities identified food as "the emergency service most in demand." We have here in the United States a network of food assistance programs but they are not working well. Federal food programs are not reaching all those in need and often benefits are inadequate. The Food Stamp Program augments the food budgets of poor Americans; however, the program serves only 20 million out of the 33 million eligible poor living in poverty.

The Food for Peace Program last year provided approximately $1.2 billion in emergency food assistance to African countries suffering from hunger and malnutrition. We must continue to support this program and initiate innovative ways to increase food security in chronic food deficit countries. Over the past 30 years, the Food for Peace Program has helped developing countries such as Taiwan and Thailand to achieve food self-sufficiency. U.S. emergency food assistance continues to be essential for sub-Saharan Africa. African recovery and economic growth is best served when United States food assistance is delivered through programs with a long-term developmental impact such as school feeding and food-for-work programs.

Mr. Speaker, October 16, World Food Day, serves as a symbol of our commitment to the alleviation of hunger and malnutrition in our world of plenty. I urge my colleagues to support House Joint Resolution 595.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 296

Whereas hunger and malnutrition remain daily facts of life, for hundreds of millions of people throughout the world;

Whereas the children of the world suffer the most serious effects of hunger and malnutrition, with millions of children dying each year from hunger-related illness and disease, and many others suffering permanent physical or mental impairment because of vitamin or protein deficiencies;

Whereas the United States and the American people have a long tradition of demonstrating humanitarian concern for the hungry and malnourished, recently manifested in their response to African famine;

Whereas the United States, as the world's largest producer and trader of food, has a key role to play in assisting countries and people to improve their ability to feed themselves;

Whereas efforts to resolve the world hunger problem are critical to the maintenance of world peace and, therefore, to the security of the United States;

Whereas although progress has been made in reducing the incidence of hunger and malnutrition in the United States, certain groups, notably Native Americans, migrant workers, the elderly, and children, remain vulnerable to malnutrition and related diseases;

Whereas there is growing recognition that improved agricultural policies, including farmer incentives, are necessary in many developing countries to increase food production and economic growth;

Whereas the United States has always supported the principle that the health of the nation depends on a strong agriculture based on private enterprise and the primacy of the independent family farmer;

Whereas national policies concerning food, farmland, and nutrition require continuing evaluation and should consider and strive for the well-being and protection of all residents of the United States and particularly those most at health risk;

Whereas there is widespread concern that the use and conservation of natural resources required for food production throughout the United States ensure care for the national patrimony we bequeath to future generations;

Whereas Congress is acutely aware of the paradox of immense farm surpluses and rising farm foreclosures in the United States despite the desperate need for food by hundreds of millions of people throughout the world;

Whereas participation by the private voluntary and business sectors, working with national governments and the international community, is essential to the search for solutions to food and hunger problems;

Whereas the member nations of the Food and Agricultural Organization of the United Nations unanimously designated October 16 of each year as World Food Day because of the need to increase public awareness of world hunger problems;

Whereas past observances of World Food Day have been supported by proclamations by the fifty States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and the territories and possessions of the United States, by resolution of Congress, by Presidential proclamations, by programs of the United States Department of Agriculture and other Government departments and agencies, and by the governments and peoples of many other nations; and

Whereas more than three hundred and fifty private and voluntary organizations and many thousands of community leaders are participating in the planning of World Food Day observances for 1986: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That October 16, 1986, is hereby designated as "World Food Day", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe that day with appropriate programs and activities.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read a third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL ARTS IN THE SCHOOLS WEEK

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 470) to designate the week of April 27, 1986, through May 3, 1986, as "National Arts in the Schools Week," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object but would simply like to inform the House that the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, under my reservation, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS], who is the chief sponsor of House Joint Resolution 470.

Mr. WEISS. I thank the distinguished ranking minority member for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, our Nation's schools are the ideal forum for introducing formal arts programs to all children. The discipline and practices learned in the study of the various disciplines of the arts can be applied to the study of more academic subjects. Furthermore, incorporating the arts into the teaching of other subjects enhances achievement levels and increases the motivation of both students and teachers. Additionally, arts education enables disabled children to demonstrate abilities and skills that may not be uncovered in academic studies and provides an important creative outlet for economically disadvantaged children.

The resolution before us today, designating the week of April 27, 1986, through May 3, 1986, as "National Arts in the Schools Week," fully recognizes the importance of all of the arts to a complete education. As an executive board member of the congressional arts caucus and representative of a district in which perhaps the greatest number of artists work and reside. I am pleased that so many of my colleagues have joined me in this important effort to promote the arts in our schools, and want to express my deepest appreciation to my friend and colleague, the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA], both for his cosponsorship of House Joint Resolution 470 and for his courtesy, and that of the distinguished ranking minority member, the gentleman from Utah [Mr. HANSEN], in bringing it to the floor so expeditiously.

Mr. Speaker, I urge adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 470

Whereas, even before formal education begins, children communicate their own experiences in a number of artistic ways, including singing, dancing, drawing, painting, sculpting, role playing, and storytelling; and

Whereas, these basic forms of expression must be encouraged through formal arts education; and

Whereas, schools are perhaps the ideal forum for introducing formal arts programs to children; and

Whereas, incorporating the arts into the teaching of other subjects has been very successful in enhancing achievement levels, and increasing motivation and attitude of both students and teachers; and

Whereas, school arts programs open the minds of children to creativity which can be applied to problem solving in other educational activities; and

Whereas, many of the same practices used in the study of the arts are used in the study of math and the sciences, including observing, describing, comparing, classifying, measuring, inferring, and drawing conclusions; and

Whereas, school arts programs promote a unique understanding and appreciation of history and culture; and

Whereas, the arts enable disabled children to demonstrate abilities and skills that may not be uncovered in the study of academic subjects; and

Whereas, school arts programs provide economically disadvantaged children with an important creative outlet; and

Whereas, practice and mastery of an artistic form builds self-confidence and pride; and

Whereas, the confidence gained through the arts by disabled and disadvantaged students can help them achieve in academic areas as well; and

Whereas, the Ninety-eighth Congress formally recognized the importance of the arts to a complete education; and

Whereas, the national arts competition, sponsored by the Congressional Arts Caucus, has recognized and promoted the outstanding artistic creativity of our Nation's youth and provides an example of the Federal Government's commitment to arts education; and

Whereas, the strong commitment of Federal, State, and local governments to strengthen and promote arts education must continue: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of April 27, 1986, through May 3, 1986, is designated as "National Arts in the Schools Week", and the President is requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate activities.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JEWISH HERITAGE WEEK

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 275) designating May 11 through May 17, 1986, as "Jewish Heritage Week," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object, but I would simply like to inform the House that the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, under my reservation of objection, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SCHEUER] who is a sponsor of House Joint Resolution 553.

Mr. SCHEUER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my distinguished colleague from New York, Mr. GARCIA, for bringing this resolution to the floor today.

As Americans, we can be proud of the diverse culture which we share.

The richness of our cultural heritage results from the traditions and ideals brought to our shores by people of many races, religions, and nationalities.

These immigrants, along with their descendants, have helped to make the United States a stronger and more heterogeneous nation.

Along with Christians and Moslems, the strong ethical, moral, and religious traditions of the Jewish people have helped to make our Nation more compassionate and they have made significant contributions to our society.

Members of the Jewish community have excelled in all walks of life—science, health and medicine, the arts, government, business, and entertainment.

Our Jewish citizens have fought and died for the principles of equality and justice upon which our Nation was founded.

The Jewish tradition and culture reach back to the very dawn of civilization.

The determination and perserverance of Jews throughout the ages demonstrate the strength and vitality of their beliefs.

Jewish Heritage Week presents a unique opportunity to foster greater understanding of and renewed appreciation for the culture, traditions, and history of Jewish community and the contributions of the Jewish people to our Nation and society.

I urge my colleagues to join me in support of Senate Joint Resolution 275.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me briefly?

Mr. HANSEN. Under my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONYERS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I want to go on record—and I have, unfortunately, not consulted with all the members of the Congressional Black Caucus—as strongly supporting on their behalf the observance of Jewish Heritage Week.

It is the sum of all of our great ethnic contributions that really make America great. I will not stand here and try to recall all of the great Jewish American contributors to art and science and psychiatry and mathematics, but I very strongly join in and commend the gentleman for bringing this measure forward.

Mr. SCHEUER. If the gentleman will yield further, I thank the gentleman from Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I recall a decade and a half ago when the gentleman and I were working together on a black culture occasion, and the same principle applies. So I very much appreciate his remarks.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN].

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 553, proclaiming this week as Jewish Heritage Week, and I thank the gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA] for his timely consideration of the bill. However, before proceeding further, I would like to note that this year's resolution was introduced by our late colleague from New York, Mr. ADDABBO, whose own commitment to and appreciation for the dates commemorated by Jewish Heritage Week was great indeed.

The measure before us is of significance to the Jewish people, as this commemorative week encompasses religious observances spanning the history of the Jewish people. This week the celebration of Passover begins, commemorating the exodus of the Jewish people as they were led out of slavery in Egypt.

Also being remembered this week is the uprising of the Warsaw ghetto, where the few remaining individuals refused to go quietly to the gas chambers of Auschwitz. They fought against Hitler's forces with a ferocity that only comes from the inner self, and were miraculously able to repel the Nazi troops for almost 3 weeks. In the end, the survivors of that ghetto were rounded up and either killed on the spot or sent to concentration camps, yet their spirit lives on with us as we recall their bravery.

Also celebrated at this time of year are other important dates in Jewish history—Israel Independence Day and Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry. The next few weeks require heightened awareness on the part of those who commemorate the deliverance from Egypt. For as we recall the events of thousands of years past, and even the recent tragedy of the Holocaust, we recognize the importance of remaining ever vigilant to persecutions and bigotry. Once again Jews are being harassed and persecuted by the Soviet Union. The lives of Soviet Jews are indeed precarious. It is our responsibility to speak out on their behalf.

The lesson that the world learned over 40 years ago bears a solemn message; yet, as painful as it is, we must listen, look, and absorb the Kafkaesque reality that was Hitler's Europe. In recent years, mindful that eyewitnesses were slowly leaving us, a renewed effort was made to establish various programs that could explore the many facets of the Holocaust. One of these Exemplary Programs has been established by Ernest Goldblum, a former constituent, whose desire to remember his own parents who died at Auschwitz endowed a Memorial Fund for a program at SUNY [State University of New York] Fredonia. Another similar, worthy educational program is in the process of being created in my 22d Congressional District in New York State, the Rockland County Holocaust Study Center at Spring Valley, NY. These and other such notable activities are needed if we are ever to have even a remote understanding of the motivations behind barbaric human actions.

Mr. Speaker, Jewish Heritage Week has much to teach us all; let us only hope that its message will be heard worldwide. I thank the gentleman for his sensitivity to this measure, and urge my colleagues to join in adopting it unanimously.

Mr. BONER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my House colleagues in support of the resolution designating the week of May 11, 1986, as "Jewish Heritage Week."

The United States prides itself on its diverse heritage. This rich and colorful heritage results from the values and ideals brought to our Nation by the people of many cultures, races, and religions.

Among these immigrants to our shores, the Jewish community contributed significantly to the cultural and spiritual growth of a new nation. Many members of the Jewish community have brought distinction and honor to virtually every field of endeavor, including the arts, humanities, and sciences. Our Jewish citizens have fought and died to preserve and protect the freedom for which the United States stands.

Indeed, our Judeo-Christian culture owes much to the Jewish community. The Jewish people cherish a tradition and culture which spans the course of many thousands of years. Their perseverance through the many tests of time has made the Jewish community vital members of our society.

Each spring, Jews throughout the United States and around the world observe a number of significant events. Beginning with the observances of Passover, which commemorates their passage from bondage to freedom, continuing with the observance of the anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, and concluding with Israeli Independence Day, American Jews rededicate themselves to the concepts of liberty, equality, and democracy.

In recognition of the told and untold contributions of Jews, I am proud to support this resolution and I look forward to commemorating "Jewish Heritage Week" with my Jewish friends and neighbors.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I offer this today in support of Senate Joint Resolution 275 establishing the week of May 11 through May 18, 1986 as Jewish Heritage Week.

Our Jewish heritage is longstanding and deep. The contributions made by the Jewish members of our society have been essential to our spiritual and economic growth, and to our position of leadership championing human rights and democracy.

It is essential that we do all we can to express our recognition of this fact, and to demonstrate our commitment to democracy and free expression.

Part of our responsibility and commitment is to ensure that the Holocaust not be forgotten. The memory of what happened now over 40 years ago must not fade, lest the human race risk repetition of that most horrible episode of our history.

Toward this end, there are efforts led by the Anti-Defamation League and by dedicated individuals to educate the public about the Holocaust and its social, economic, and political roots.

One such individual is Mr. Ernest Goldblum. His parents, Mariem and Elias Goldblum, perished in the Holocaust. He has established a Mariem and Elias Goldblum Memorial Fund in honor of his parents, both in Vienna, Austria and in several colleges in New York State, including the Suny College at Fredonia. The purpose of this fund is to encourage activities through which young people can learn about the Holocaust, its causes and its effects, and can resolve to combat the forces in people and societies that allow such things to happen.

I believe that such living memorials should be recognized, commended and encouraged. We speak so readingly of "massacres" and "genocide" today that we are in danger of forgetting what those terms really mean. The only way of not forgetting is to teach. Mr. Goldblum and others like him help propagate that teaching, and we are all in their debt.

Additionally, there are currently two bills introduced that would express the sense of Congress that study of the Holocaust and the causes of Naziism should be included in the history curricula of public schools.

Mr. Goldblum has set an example for us to follow. If individuals such as he can get the ball rolling, surely we as the lawmakers of this land can at least express our support.

The bills urging education of the terrible history of the Holocaust are a start. So, too, does the designation of Jewish Heritage Week serve to recognize and commend our Jewish community and further our commitment to democratic ideals and equality for all.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 275

Whereas the Congress recognizes that an understanding of the heritage of all American ethnic groups contributes to the unity of our country;

Whereas intergroup understanding can be further fostered through an appreciation of the culture, history, and traditions of the Jewish community and the contributions of Jews to our country and society; and

Whereas the months of March, April, and May contain events of major significance in the Jewish calendar—Passover, the anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, Israeli, Independence Day, Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry, and Jerusalem Day: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating May 11 through May 17, 1986, as "Jewish Heritage Week" and calling upon the people of the United States, State and local government agencies, and interested organizations to observe "Jewish Heritage Week" with appropriate ceremonies, programs, and activities.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXPRESSING SENSE OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES CONCERNING SOLIDARITY SUNDAY FOR SOVIET JEWRY

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the resolution (H. Res. 420) to express the sense of the House of Representatives concerning Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object, but I would simply like to inform the House that the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, under my reservation of objection, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN] who is the chief sponsor of the resolution.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and would like to take this opportunity to thank the gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA] and the gentleman from Utah [Mr. HANSEN] for their timely attention to House Resolution 420, which expresses congressional support for Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry.

Mr. Speaker, each year the Coalition to Free Soviet Jews sponsors a mass rally at Dag Hammarskjold Plaza, opposite the United Nations in New York City, to show the Soviet Union, as well as other nations of the world, that human rights cannot be denied unnoticed and unprotested. Each year, hundreds of thousands gather to express their solidarity of purpose with men and women whose only desire has been to practice their religious and cultural heritage freely. Unfortunately, each year the need for such a demonstration becomes more and more important. For a high point of more than 51,000 emigration permits having been granted in 1979, only 1,140 Soviet Jews were released last year. Emigration remains pitifully low, yet harassment and arrests continue to rise.

This past year has been one of joys as well as sorrows. With the impending summit meeting between President Reagan and Soviet General Secretary Mikhail Gorbachev last fall, there were some bright spots.

Some longstanding refuseniks and former prisoners of conscience were allowed to emigrate to Israel on an individual basis. One of these was Dr. Mark Nashpitz, a Soviet dentist with whom I corresponded for almost 15 years. I was gratified to be able to meet Dr. Nashpitz in Washington a few months after this release.

There was some progress on other fronts, including the release of the prominent Pentacostal leader Lydia Staskevich and the reunification of several Soviet-American couples. Unfortunately, however, we have yet to see a change in overall Soviet human rights policy as evidenced by increased emigration figures.

Yet, the most recent incident in memory, still fresh in our minds, has to be the release of Anatoly Shcharansky from prison after 9 long years on the false charge of treason. I am certain that Solidarity Sunday helped to focus attention on Anatoly's plight, and that the ongoing involvement of many of us in Congress helped in keeping pressure to bear. Those of us in attendance on May 11 this year will have the opportunity of hearing Anatoly himself speak to the gathering, which I anticipate will be momentous indeed.

Mr. Speaker, the denial of human rights is something that we in the United States find repugnant; we have attempted to build safeguards into our system to protect the civil and religious liberties of each individual. Yet Soviet Jews only know of these rights in a very peripherial manner, and they are persecuted and discriminated against by official sanction. Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry is an ongoing attempt to ensure that they too know of our support for their struggle, and accordingly, urge our colleagues to adopt House Resolution 420.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANSEN. Under my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEMP. I thank my colleague from Utah, as well as the gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA], and I also underscore the comments of my friend and colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN], in his support for House Resolution 420. I am a cosponsor of H.R. 420 as I believe very strongly that Solidarity Sunday, May 11, is an important day for all people to identify themselves with those freedom-loving men and women throughout the world, particularly those Jews in the Soviet Union, who want their basic human rights.

It is going to be a special day for all of us as Anatoly Shcharansky will be the main speaker on May 15, in New York, at Dag Hammarskjold Plaza. It is going to be a great day not only for the Shcharanskys, Anatoly and Avital, but it is a great day for all of those men and women around the world who recognize that human rights are universal, a principle on which this country should stand. I appreciate the efforts of both the gentleman from Utah and the gentleman from New York in bringing this to the floor of the House so that we can support it unanimously.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I join in the excellent remarks of the two gentlemen from New York.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I offer my support of the resolution before us which expresses congressional support for "Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry." We in the free world must never forget that there are human beings in the Soviet Union and elsewhere whose human rights are being violated on a daily basis. This resolution is the least we can do to tell the world about their plight.

I recently returned from a visit to the Soviet Union where DANTE FASCELL, chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee and I talked at length with General Secretary Gorbachev about human rights violations in that country. The ongoing persecution of the Soviet Jewish community is a real tragedy. We made it perfectly clear to the Soviet leader that making progress in human rights was a priority issue in improving relations between our two countries.

The persecution of the Jewish community in the Soviet Union is a tragedy of massive proportions. Thousands of Soviet Jews are being denied the right to emigrate from that country. Thousands of prisoners of conscience languish in Soviet jails and detention camps. Members of divided families have been denied the right to emigrate so that they can live together with their loved ones.

Many Soviet Jews are denied the right to practice their religious and cultural heritage freely. These are serious matters which must be raised with representatives from the highest levels of the Soviet Government. We cannot give up in our efforts to win the freedom of those who long for liberty.

This is why it is vital for all of us to remember those whose freedoms are routinely denied. Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry is an ongoing attempt to tell those who have been denied their liberties that we support their struggle for freedom.

I commend the efforts of Mr. GILMAN, the ranking Republican on the Europe and Middle East Subcommittee, who introduced this timely proposal. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting the resolution.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 420

Whereas on May 11, 1986, the constituent agencies of the Coalition to Free Soviet Jews will convene the fifteenth annual "Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry" in reaffirmation of the American people's resolve to secure freedom for Soviet Jews and beleaguered persons everywhere;

Whereas Americans of all faiths will join in myriad activities on the day in public expression of solidarity with the long suffering Jewish community in the Soviet Union;

Whereas the right to emigrate freely and to be reunited with one's family abroad is denied Jews and many others in the Soviet Union;

Whereas the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations, and the Helsinki Final Act explicitly assert guarantees of those rights;

Whereas the Government of the Soviet Union has nevertheless continued to restrict emigration, particularly in the last few months, when the number of Jews allowed to emigrate has declined to extremely low levels;

Whereas the Government of the Soviet Union is persecuting its Jewish citizens and denying them even those few rights and privileges accorded other recognized religions in the Soviet Union;

Whereas the Government of the Soviet Union discriminates against Jewish cultural activities by banning and suspending Hebrew and Jewish cultural classes, by arresting teachers of Hebrew, and by harassing those Soviet Jews who seek only to practice their religion;

Whereas a virulent anti-Semitic campaign continues unabated in the Soviet Union and Soviet Jews are increasingly deprived of occupational and educational opportunities;

Whereas thousands of innocent Jews and other persons, having applied to leave the Soviet Union, have been subjected to immediate induction into the armed forces, improper incarceration in mental institutions, expulsion from school, and constant surveillance and harassment;

Whereas the Government of the Soviet Union will not succeed in isolating Soviet Jews from their friends in the free world as long as those who cherish liberty continue to speak on behalf of beleaguered people everywhere;

Whereas "Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry" shall provide vigorous expression of American determination to secure freedom for Soviet Jewish prisoners of conscience incarcerated solely for their desire to emigrate; and

Whereas the Government of the Soviet Union refuses to permit the free exercise of religious beliefs and cultural expression and also refuses to remove all obstacles to the free emigration of its Jewish citizens and others who wish to leave and live in other countries: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives hereby expresses its full support for "Solidarity Sunday for Soviet Jewry", to be held on May 11, 1986, and encourages Americans to participate in the activities of that day.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL READING IS FUN WEEK

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 286) to designate the week of April 20, 1986, through April 26, 1986, as "National Reading Is Fun Week," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object, but I would simply like to inform the House that the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, under my reservation of objection, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE] who is the chief sponsor of House Joint Resolution 502.

Mr. CONTE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, as the author of this resolution in the House, I would like to thank my colleague, Chairman GARCIA, and the members of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee for bringing this bill to the floor today.

Mr. Speaker, reading is fun. That's a statement that those of us here today take for granted. Reading is a skill which is instrumental in our work and our everyday lives.

Unfortunately, millions of our fellow Americans can't experience the enjoyment and satisfaction which we derive from reading. An article in yesterday's New York Times reported that 13 percent of all adult Americans are illiterate. This astounding figure stands in stark contrast to a Bureau of the Census study in 1979 which estimated that the illiteracy rate was much lower.

In the wealthiest society in the world, where public education is available for all, illiteracy shouldn't exist at all. But it does, and it shows indications of continuing. This resolution, designating this week as "Reading Is Fun Week," tells all American citizens that reading is fun, and I urge the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 286

Whereas reading for pleasure contributes to the development of lifelong reading and learning skills;

Whereas the lack of those skills is a pervasive and destructive force in America, and millions of adults cannot read well enough to function in our society;

Whereas it is essential that the sixty-six million youngsters in America under the age of 18 grow up reading in order to become literate, informed adults; and

Whereas "National Reading Is Fun Week" will be a nationwide literacy effort encouraging millions of young people to read: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of April 20, 1986, through April 26, 1986, is designated as "National Reading Is Fun Week" and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon Federal, State, and local government agencies and the people of the United States to observe the week with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL BARRIER AWARENESS DAY

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 544) to designate May 7, 1986, as National Barrier Awareness Day, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object, but I would simply like to inform the House that the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, under my reservation of objection, I yield to the distinguished gentlewoman from Nevada [Mrs. VUCANOVICH] who is the chief sponsor of the joint resolution.

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I thank my colleagues for bringing this legislation to the floor.

Mr. Speaker, I am also pleased to have the opportunity to say a few words about House Joint Resolution 544, requesting the President to designate May 7, 1986, as "National Barrier Awareness Day."

The event is designated to promote and enhance positive, realistic images of individuals with disabilities, emphasizing their abilities, rather than their disabilities as they negotiate existing barriers.

The goals of National Barrier Awareness Day are to solicit participation from a cross-section of individuals in order to inform and educate the public about various types of disabilities and the social, cultural, physical, attitudinal, and architectural barriers that exist today.

It is through shared information between the disabled and nondisabled communities that we can highlight the needs of individuals with disabilities.

I commend the many individuals and organizations who have participated in this effort and I am pleased to be a part of such a worthy cause.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 544

Whereas 80 percent of Americans will experience some form of disability during their lives and there are currently 36,000,000 disabled Americans;

Whereas many of these disabilities are permanent;

Whereas most persons who are not disabled do not understand the full effect of living with a disability;

Whereas this lack of understanding creates stereotypes and cultural attitudes which can bar the disabled from mainstream life just as much as physical barriers;

Whereas every American should work toward eliminating all of the cultural, financial, and physical barriers that confront the disabled: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That May 7, 1986, is designated National Barrier Awareness Day. The President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe this day with appropriate programs and activities.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion of reconsider was laid on the table.

PROVIDING FOR CONTINUATION OF MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR., FEDERAL HOLDIAY COMMISSION UNTIL 1989

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill (S. 2319) to provide for the continuation of the Martin Luther King, Jr., Federal Holiday Commission until 1989, and for other purposes, and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object, but I would simply like to inform the House that the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, under my reservation of objection, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONYERS] who is the chief sponsor of H.R. 4528.

Mr. CONYERS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the bill, with all of the cosponsors of the Martin Luther King, Jr., Federal Holiday Commission legislation who are on the floor now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA], and the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEMP].

This is a proposal which provides for a 3-year extension of the Holiday Commission.

As you know, we witnessed the first celebration of the holiday celebrating Dr. King on January 20 of this year. It was magnificent. In the words of Coretta Scott King, we have come now from the observation that started in 1984 with 19 States, to 40 States and 4 territories observing official holidays in honor of Dr. King today.

Mr. Speaker, this increase reflects the work of the Federal Holiday Commission which has been promoting, organizing, and explaining in all areas of the country what the significance and importance of this holiday is to all Americans. There is one area of its work that I really should mention, because my office, perhaps like yours, was flooded with a number of calls in which people were saying, "I have got to go to work today, and I thought you passed the Martin Luther King, Jr., holiday."

It is important that we have this Commission to explain to our citizens that the collective bargaining agreement that determines whether they go to work is not suspended by the passage of a Federal holiday bill.

I am very happy to stand here to support the legislative process that has led to the Commission's continuance, and to be especially appreciative of the increase in the number of Commissioners. I hope that my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEMP], will agree to serve on the Commission after this legislation is passed.

I sincerely thank all of the Members of the House of Representatives who support this exceedingly important legislation. This is the first time in American history that we have set aside our differences to honor a great American whose color of skin happened to be black, but whose contribution was recognized by my colleagues on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANSEN. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEMP. I thank my colleague for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I join with my friend, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONYERS] in thanking the gentleman from Utah [Mr. HANSEN] as well my friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA] for helping to expedite this process so we could get this resolution to the floor to extend the important work of the Dr. King Holiday Commission. It has passed the Senate, as the gentleman from Michigan pointed out and simply extends the Commission for 3 years and provides for more Commissioners. I want to thank JOHN CONYERS for his suggestion that I serve on the King Commission and I would be honored to do so.

This resolution reaffirms or commitments as a legislative body and as a Nation to this King holiday. As the gentleman from Michigan pointed out, this is not a holiday just for a few; this is a holiday for all Americans. All Americans can take pride in the idea for which Martin Luther King stood. This is a recognition that the civil rights revolution in America was a confirmation of the American Revolution, guaranteeing to all people, irrespective of color, culture, or creed, their equal rights as Americans. We still have a distance to go, but all would agree that the civil rights revolution helped to validate the Jeffersonian dream of equal opportunity for all. I am pleased to have been a cosponsor of the original King holiday legislation along with the gentleman from Michigan, the former Representative from Indiana Katie Hall, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY] the gentleman from California [Mr. LUNGREN], and many others on both sides of the aisle.

I particularly believe that by extending the Commission we recognize not only its work but also the great tradition that this country celebrated January 20th of this year for the very first time, and the great debt of gratitude that we owe as Americans to Dr. King, and indeed the cause for which he stood.

I appreciate very much the comments that have been made by my colleague, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONYERS] and Mr. GARCIA, my friend from New York. I look forward to seeing this bill pass unanimously, and I appreciate the effort that has been made by Members on both sides of the aisle, Republican and Democrat alike, to recognize the contribution to America not only of Dr. King but also of the civil rights leaders in America who work so hard to confirm and validate our original revolution and to make it a reality for all Americans.

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, today we are considering Senate Joint Resolution 275, a resolution designating May 11 through 17, 1986, as "Jewish Heritage Week." I am pleased to bring this resolution to the House floor for consideration, but I feel that our late colleague, Congressman JOE ADDABBO would be even more delighted by its passage.

The commemoration of a Jewish Heritage Week was a dear event to our late colleague. For the past 6 years Congressman ADDABBO had introduced resolutions that fostered an appreciation of the culture, history, and traditions of the Jewish community and recognized the contributions of Jews to our society in particular and to civilization as a whole. I think that Congressman ADDABBO would have agreed that by promoting activities that increase our understanding of our different ethnic groups we can reconcile the differences that divide us and share the common characteristics that contribute to our unity as a nation.

This kind of intergroup understanding is crucial to cities like New York which are largely comprised of ethinic communities. It is the ultimate purpose of resolutions like the one Mr. ADDABBO introduced to foster cooperation rather than isolution among the different communities in our cities. I am certain that the people of New York are proud of Congressman ADDABBO's efforts to promote intergroup communication and that his presence will be missed by many.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

S. 2319

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. CONTINUATION OF COMMISSION.

(a) PURPOSE.—Section 3(1) of the Act of August 27, 1984 (98 Stat. 1473), is amended—

(1) by striking out "first"; and

(2) by inserting "first" before "occurs".

(b) ANNUAL REPORT.—Section 8 of the Act of August 27, 1984 (98 Stat. 1475), is amended by striking out ", 1986" and inserting in lieu thereof "of each year".

(c) TERMINATION.—Section 9 of the Act of August 27, 1984 (98 Stat. 1475), is amended by striking out "submitting its report under section 8" and inserting in lieu thereof "April 20, 1989".

SEC. 2. COMPOSITION OF COMMISSION.

Section 4(a)(6) of the Act of August 27, 1984 (98 Stat. 1473), is amended by striking out "fourteen" and inserting in lieu thereof "twenty-three".

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the Senate bill just passed and also on the several joint resolutions and the resolution just considered and adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR CONTROL OF PLAGUE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5, rule I, the unfinished business is the question of suspending the rules and passing the bill, H.R. 4392.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. WAXMAN] that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 4392, on which further proceedings were postponed on Monday, April 21, 1986, and on which the yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device and there were—yeas 246, nays 155, not voting 32, as follows;

BANK BRIBERY AMENDMENTS OF 1985

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 3511) to amend title 18, United States Code, with respect to certain bribery and related offenses, with the Senate amendments thereto, concur in the Senate amendments numbered 1 and 2, and concur in the Senate amendment numbered 3 with an amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments and the House amendment to Senate amendment No. 3.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments and the House amendment to Senate amendment No. 3, as follows:

Senate amendments:

Page 2, strike out lines 13, 14, and 15 and insert "person, intending to be influenced or rewarded in connection with any business or transaction of such institution;".

"(d) The Justice Department shall consult with the Federal regulatory agencies with responsibility for regulating financial institutions as defined in this Act in order to establish a unified set of guidelines for identifying conduct which is prohibited by this section. The Department and such regulatory agencies shall make such guidelines available to the public. Compliance or noncompliance with the standards contained in such Act shall be relevant but not dispositive in determining whether a violation of this section has occurred.".

House amendment of Senate amendment No. 3: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment numbered 3, insert the following:

"(d) The Department of Justice, after consulting with each Federal agency that regulates a financial institution, shall issue a uniform set of guidelines that describe conduct that the Department of Justice will prosecute under this section, and shall make such guidelines available to the public.".

Mr. CONYERS (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendments and the House amendment to Senate amendment No. 3 be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the initial request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and having reserved my right to object, I would like to ask the chairman of the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice of the Judiciary Committee to offer an explanation for the RECORD as to the provisions of this piece of legislation.

I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONYERS. I thank my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GEKAS], the ranking minority member on the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice, for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, the House unanimously passed H.R. 3511 last October to amend the bank bribery offense so that it does not sweep within its ambit otherwise legitimate conduct. The bank bribery offense presently makes it a crime for a person to offer or accept anything of value "for or in connection with" any business or transaction of a financial institution. This sweeping language makes it a crime, for example—

For a bank to pay interest on an employee's account (and for the employee to accept the interest);

For a company to donate free space to a credit union serving its employees; and

For an employee of a financial institution to accept a promotional ballpoint pen given away at a business or trade show.

H.R. 3511 would narrow the present offense by requiring proof that the offeror or recipient of the thing of value acted corruptly and with an intent to influence or reward, or to be influenced or rewarded. This approach is modeled upon 18 U.S.C. 201, which defines the offense of bribery of a public official.

The other both has agreed with this approach and has returned the bill to us with three numbered amendments. The gentleman from Pennsylvania and I have reviewed these amendments carefully and have consulted with the other body about them. The gentleman from Pennsylvania and I have drafted a proposal that we believe fairly and responsibly addresses the concerns raised by the other body. It is this proposal now being offered to the House.

Our proposal accepts the other body's amendment No. 1 without alteration. That amendment makes a salutary change in that part of the offense making it a crime for a bank official corruptly to solicit or accept anything of value. As passed by this House, the prosecution would have to show not only that the solicitor or acceptor of the thing of value acted corruptly, but also that the donor acted corruptly. Amendment No. 1 of the other body modifies this provision to focus solely upon the solicitor or acceptor. Thus, amendment No. 1 requires the prosecution to show that the solicitor or acceptor acted corruptly and with the intent "to be influenced or rewarded in connection with any business or transaction" of the financial institution. The language of this amendment is also modeled upon 18 U.S.C. 201.

Our proposal also accepts amendment No. 2 of the other body. That amendment makes a technical change necessary in order to accommodate the new language added by amendment No. 3.

The other body's amendment No. 3 makes a substantive addition to the bill, adding a requirement that the Justice Department, after consulting with the Federal bank regulatory agencies, "establish a unified set of guidelines for identifying conduct which is prohibited by this section." Moreover, "compliance with the standards contained in such guidelines shall be relevant but not dispositive in determining whether a violation of this section has occurred." This amendment was prompted by a concern, in the words of its sponsor, that "although the current bill is not so vague as to raise a constitutional problem, it would be more effective in deterring undesirable conduct if it were coupled with guidelines for identifying prohibited conduct." 132 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD S-944 (daily ed. February 4, 1986) (remarks of Senator METZENBAUM).

In my judgment—a judgment shared by the author of amendment No. 3—the provision as passed by the House provides adequate notice of the prohibited conduct. The public official bribery provision upon which the House-passed version is modeled seems to be working well without such guidelines, and I see no reason to treat bank officials and people who deal with bank officials differently from the way we treat public officials and people who deal with public officials.

I recognize, however, that amendment No. 3 represents a strongly-held conviction that further clarification of the offense is desirable. That concern is well-intentioned and I believe we ought to accommodate it. I propose, therefore, to modify the other body's amendment No. 3.

I believe that the modifications are necessary in order to avoid an interpretation that amendment No. 3 seeks to delegate legislative branch or judicial branch power to an executive branch agency. The sponsor of amendment No. 3 sought to reassure his colleagues on this point, but I am afraid that the language of his amendment—especially the phrase "guidelines for identifying conduct which is prohibited by this section"—is susceptible of such an interpretation. I have proposed language that will avoid this problem but will still serve the notice function desired by the sponsor of amendment No. 3. My proposal requires the Justice Department, after consulting with the Federal bank regulatory agencies, to issue guidelines "that describe conduct that the Department of Justice will prosecute under this section." These guidelines must be made available to the public.

My proposal does not mandate that the guidelines are relevant to every bank bribery case, as does amendment No. 3. I believe amendment No. 3 goes too far in that regard. The guidelines can only be relevant on the issue of whether the defendant acted corruptly. This is a subjective element, and it would violate due process to hold a defendant accountable under a guideline that the defendant was unaware of. Since the provisions of the bank bribery offense cover the activities of the members of the general public, as well as bank officials and employees, it would not be uncommon or unusual, it seems to me, for a defendant to be unaware of the guidelines.

By not directly addressing the issue in my proposal, however, I have not made the guidelines inadmissible. Whether a guideline is admissible in a given case will turn on the particular facts and circumstances of the case and the applicable principles of the Federal Rules of Evidence.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that this proposal is a reasonable and fair accommodation of the concerns of the other body. This proposal represents the joint and united efforts of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself, and I want to thank him for his important contribution to this proposal. I urge my colleagues to support what we have proposed.

Mr. GEKAS. I thank the gentleman from Michigan.

Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan has adequately set forth the provisions that we want to see adopted in this legislation.

Both he, the chairman, and I are a bit disappointed that the original version which we crafted on the House side has not been fully accepted by the other body. However, the changes made by way of amendment in the other body, to which we are now acceding in part and amending in part, will at least solve the grand problem, even though leaving some areas of it with which I am not perfectly satisfied.

But the main idea of the legislation will remain intact; namely, that bank officials, bank employees, will not be subjected to unwarranted prosecution for otherwise routine deeds on their part in the everyday business of the conduct of banking and other kinds of enterprises. That is what we sought here to cure. That is what is being accomplished, even though we are going to have to have further work through guidelines offered by the Attorney General of the United States.

Mr. CONYERS. If the gentleman will yield further, I want to say that the gentleman has described it quite succinctly. What we have done is take the bribery law and apply it in the real world of business transactions, where people do meet and have lunch with their banker, where you can get parking privileges without it being construed as the elements of the offense of bribery.

Mr. Speaker, I think we have made an important change in the bribery law to properly reflect the present business transactions that normally occur throughout our country.

Mr. GEKAS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the initial request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the matter just considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

WAIVING CERTAIN POINTS OF ORDER AGAINST CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 4515, URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1986

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 425 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 425

Resolved, That all points of order for failure to comply with the provisions of section 302(f) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as amended (Public Law 93-344, as amended by Public Law 99-177), and with the provisions of clause 2(l)(3)(B) of rule XI, are hereby waived against the consideration of the bill (H.R. 4515) making urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and for other purposes. During the consideration of the bill, all points of order against the bill for failure to comply with the provisions of clauses 2 and 6 of rule XXI are hereby waived. Amendments to strike out the following provisions in the bill shall be considered to have been adopted in the House and in the Committee of the Whole; beginning on page 5, lines 11 through 25; and beginning on page 28, line 19 through page 30, line 16. It shall be in order to consider the following amendments to the bill printed in the Congressional Record of April 21, 1986, by, and if offered by, the Members indicated; the amendment by Representative Hammerschmidt of Arkansas, and all points of order against said amendment for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 2 of rule XXI and section 302(f) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as amended, are hereby waived; an amendment by Representative Schroeder of Colorado, and all points of order against said amendment for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 2 of rule XXI are hereby waived; an amendment by Delegate Fauntroy of the District of Columbia, and all points of order against said amendment for failure to comply with the provisions of clauses 2 and 6 of rule XXI, and clause 7 of rule XVI, are hereby waived; an amendment by Representative Mica of Florida, and all points of order against said amendment for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 2 of rule XXI and clause 7 of rule XVI are hereby waived; an amendment by Representative Fazio of California, and all points of order against said amendment for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 2 of rule XXI are hereby waived; an amendment by Representative Rostenkowski of Illinois, and all points of order against said amendment for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 2 of rule XXI and clause 7 of rule XVI are hereby waived; an amendment by Representative Bosco of California, and all points of order against said amendment for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 2 of rule XXI and clause 7 of rule XVI are hereby waived; and an amendment by Representative Michel of Illinois, and all points of order against said amendment for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 2 of rule XXI and clause 7 of rule XVI are hereby waived. Debate under the five-minute rule on the amendment by Representative Schroeder made in order by this resolution, and on all amendments thereto, shall continue not to exceed two hours.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT], and pending that, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, my concern is: What is the point of having a Rules Committee and having rules on the books if we are going to constantly waive all of the points of order?

In the so-called Schroeder amendment that is going to be offered on this floor, there are five glaring errors in violation of the rules, yet the Rules Committee simply waives them so that we are not operating under the basic Rules of the House.

I cannot understand this situation. We have rules that suggest that you cannot undertake certain actions but then the Rules Committee simply waives them and then we cannot carry on the business of the House, as the rules were designed to do. We have, for example, in the Schroeder amendment, the proposal that she makes, if it is approved in the House, would go into permanent law when, in fact, it is not designed to go into permanent law.

I do not think that we can properly operate our committee, which has a good deal of responsibility in the field of nuclear weapons, if the Rules Committee is constantly going to waive every rule that every individual Member wants waived.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, if my distinguished friend will permit me, I have been on the Rules Committee now since 1965. It has been the custom of the committee throughout those years from time to time, case by case, to grant waivers of violations of the rules. They are considered to expedite, rather than delay legislation and it generally is felt by the members of the Rules Committee that it was in the public interest that those waivers should be granted.

For example, in a great deal of instances, the authorizing bill has not yet been passed by the time the appropriation bill comes to the floor, or is likely to come to the floor. Under the rule, without a waiver by the Rules Committee, it would not be possible for the Appropriations Committee to bring up the bill.

So, therefore, the Rules Committee feels that it is in the public interest, and in the interest of the well-being of the House, to grant the waiver to allow the process to go forward.

Mr. STRATTON. Does the distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee feel that it is in the interest of the House to permit a piece of legislation that has been referred to two committees—as the Schroeder amendment was earlier by the Parliamentarian referred to the Committee on Armed Services and also to the Subcommittee on Procurement and Military Nuclear Systems; and it was also referred to the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. Yet the Rules Committee now makes it in order to take that bill entirely away from both of the committees who are charged with the matters that are included in the Schroeder amendment.

Mr. PEPPER. It is rather exceptional for the Rules Committee to do that. The Rules Committee felt in this instance that they were justified in making the waiver that they made.

If the gentleman will allow me, I will proceed to the presentation of the rule.

Mr. STRATTON. I am not very happy with making this legislation in order because if it goes through, it is likely to eliminate 6,000 people who are involved with our National Laboratories for Nuclear Systems in Los Alamos and in Livermore. This is a devastating amendment and it ought never to have been considered with a waiver of rules.

Mr. PEPPER. I am very much aware that there are items in here about which there are differences of opinion. Obviously those differences of opinion will manifest themselves in the consideration of the rule and the legislation that follows from it.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 425 waives certain points of order against consideration of H.R. 4515, the Urgent Supplemental Appropriations Act for Fiscal Year 1986. As my colleagues know, last week we adopted a rule that provided for the consideration of this bill in conjunction with a joint resolution on Central America.

Under the provisions of that rule, the supplemental appropriations bill was to be considered after the disposition of the joint resolution relating to Central America. Because consideration of the joint resolution was not completed and further action on the joint resolution is not anticipated, the Rules Committee reported House Resolution 425, a rule providing solely for the consideration of H.R. 4515.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 425 contains waivers of points of order against the consideration of H.R. 4515, the supplemental appropriations bill. The rule waives section 302(f) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as amended, against consideration of the bill.

In compliance with section 302(b) of the Budget Act, the Appropriations Committee issued a report subdividing the budget authority allocated to the full committee among its subcommittees. While the budget authority contained in H.R. 4515 would not breach the Appropriation Committee's budget authority allocation, it does violate the allocation made to some of its subcommittees.

Section 302(f) of the Budget Act prohibits consideration of legislation if it violates the appropriate committee's subdivision and so the waiver is necessary in order for H.R. 4515 to be considered.

The rule also waives clause 2(l)(3)(b) of the rule 11 against comsideration of the bill. This provision of the House rules requires each committee to include in its report on any bill containing new budget authority a comparison of the spending levels in the bill to the subcommittee budget authority allocations.

The rule waives clauses 2 and 6 of rule XXI against the bill. Clause 2 of rule XXI prohibits the inclusion of legislation and unauthorized appropriations in the general appropriations bill. H.R. 4515 contains a number of such provisions which are outlined in the Appropriation Committee's report on the bill.

Clause 6 prohibits reappropriations in a general appropriations bill. H.R. 4515 includes transfers of previously appropriated funds.

The rule strikes out two provisions of the bill. The first provision pertains to modifications of the Farmland Conservation Reserve Program, established by the 1985 farm bill. The other provision stricken by the rule relates to standards and funds for congressional mailings.

The rule waives points of order to permit consideration of eight amendments. Each of these amendments must be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 21, 1986, by its author. The amendments specified in the rule are the same as those in the previous rule, with the addition of an amendment by Representative MICHEL of Illinois, relating to deferrals.

Finally, the rule states that debate during the 5-minute rule on the Schroeder amendment, and all amendments thereto, shall not exceed 2 hours.

Mr. Speaker, I want it to be clear that these are not the only amendments allowed during consideration of H.R. 4515. The rule specifically mentions eight amendments because waivers are necessary to allow for their consideration.

I want to add one word further in explanation of the inquiry that was made by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. STRATTON], my dear friend. Usually when the chairman of a subcommittee or chairman of an authorizing committee asks the Rules Committee not to grant a waiver in respect to a matter, we do not grant that waiver.

This time, the subject of the amendment moved the Rules Committee, in its wisdom and judgment, to go ahead and grant the waivers anyway. That is the reason that the waivers were granted in this case.

Any amendment to the bill and any amendment to the specified amendments contained in the rule are in order, provided that they conform to House rules. The Rules Committee considered many requests for amendments to make in order to the urgent supplemental appropriations bill.

I need not add to my colleagues that this bill has many, many matters of major interest. One, for example, is $10 million to be used against avian influenza. My State of Florida is particularly interested in funds provided in the bill for the eradication of citrus canker which has been so devastating to our citrus industry.

All through that bill, there are numerous provisions that are very meaningful to the various Members of the House.

The Rules Committee considered many requests for amendments to be made in order to the urgent supplemental appropriations bill. The committee felt that waiving points of order against the eight amendments specified in the rule will allow for timely consideration of matters of urgent concern to the Members.

You must remember, Mr. Speaker, that we are only facilitating the consideration of these amendments. It will be up to the House to determine whether they think the amendments are wise and wish to approve them or not.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 425 is nearly identical to section 2 of the rule adopted last week, House Resolution 415. That is, the rule waives certain points of order against the consideration of the urgent supplemental (H.R. 4515), against legislative and transfer provisions in that bill, and against certain amendments specified in the rule.

This rule does not, I repeat, does not, make in order any provisions regarding the situation in Nicaragua. That issue has been decoupled and shelved for the time being. But I do want to take this opportunity to announce to my colleagues that tomorrow I will file a discharge petition on House Resolution 419, a special rule on House Joint Resolution 283 introduced by Mr. MCCURDY. That rule will resurrect the issue of aid to the Contras and guarantee separate votes on substitutes by Congressmen HAMILTON, MCCURDY, and MICHEL, in that order, in a king-of-the-mountain approach. I urge my colleagues to sign that petition.

Mr. Speaker, the rule before us waives section 302(f) of the Budget Act against consideration of the bill. That section provides a point of order against bills which exceed a committee's section 302(b) suballocation of budget authority under the Budget Act. Chairman Whitten indicated that this is a technical violation since the Appropriations Committee is still within its overall section 302(a) allocation.

However, the committee could have remedied this violation itself by reporting new suballocations as authorized by the Budget Act, but it did not. The Budget Committee has polled its members and a majority do not object to the waiver. However, I would caution the Appropriations Committee against trying to use this technical violation argument as a precedent in the future. This is a central point of order under Gramm-Rudman, and the Rules Committee cannot and should not waive it lightly.

The rule also waives clause 2(l)(3)(B) of House Rule 11 against consideration of the bill. That clause requires certain budgetary information to be included in committee reports. Since the Appropriations Committee failed to include a comparison between the levels in the bill and its 302(b) suballocations, it is in violation of this budget information requirement. However, without the waiver in this rule, we could not even take up the bill. But I would caution the Appropriations Committee against overlooking this important requirement in the future.

Clauses 2 and 6 of House Rule 21 are waived against legislative and transfer provisions in the bill. As I mentioned in my remarks on the previous rule, such violations are legion, comprising about one-fourth of the bill. We also waive these clauses and some other rules against several amendments made in order by the rule. This bill has obviously become a popular vehicle on which to legislate and not just appropriate; and that just adds to the veto bait.

The amendments made in order which require special waiver protection had to be printed in yesterday's RECORD and are virtually the same as those specified in the last rule, with two modifications and one addition. The Schroeder amendment has been changed to prevent United States nuclear testing for the rest of this year and until the President certifies that the Soviets have conducted a nuclear test after April 17th of this year. The rule also limits the time for debate on the Schroeder amendment, and amendments thereto, to 2 hours.

The other amendments requiring waivers which are identical to those previously made in order include: the Hammerschmidt amendment on dairy indemnity; the Fauntroy amendment on aid to Haiti; the Mica amendment on Embassy security; the Fazio amendment on privatizing Federal power; the Rostenkowski amendment on hospital regulations; and the Bosco amendment on American-made offshore oil rigs.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce that the Rules Committee this time around has been gracious enough to allow an additional amendment by our distinguished Republican leader [Mr. MICHEL] as an alternative to section 201 in the bill which attempts to repeal part of the President's deferral authority. I say "attempts" to repeal that authority because, according to the American Law Division in the Library of Congress, the actual effect of the provision is to simply repeal the requirement that the President report deferrals. In any event, the provision was hastily and sloppily drawn and is a clear case of overkill. From fiscal 1975–85 about $121 billion in deferrals have been proposed, on which only around $21 billion, or 17 percent, have been rejected by Congress. The Appropriations Committee proposes to eliminate so-called policy deferrals which makeup about 40 percent of total deferrals each year. What this means is that if the appropriations language had been in effect from the outset, around $40 billion could not have been deferred over the last decade. Think of how that would have added to our deficit problems.

Rather than eliminating these policy deferrals, most of which have been noncontroversial over the years, the Michel amendment would simply cap these at $5 billion a year. I think this makes much better sense than throwing the baby out with the bathwater, and I hope my colleagues will vote for the Michel amendment when it is offered.

My preference would have been to excise section 201 in the rule, as we did the conservation reserve and congressional franking provisions. That way the Rules Committee and Government Operations Committee could consider deferral reform in a more deliberative manner. And it is my understanding the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARMEY] will first offer an amendment to simply strike section 201. I think that is the preferred way to go while we study the matter in our committees. But, failing that, the Michel amendment is the only sensible course available to us at this time.

Mr. Speaker, the Rules Committee has done a better job on what is still a bad rule and a bad bill.

□ 1355

Mr. YATES. Will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. LOTT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. YATES. Deferrals are not rescissions, obviously, and they are deferrals of spending. There is no money that is saved because the amount that is deferred is deferred to be spent at a later date. The gentleman may be confusing that with the rescission which the President——

Mr. LOTT. No, I certainly understand the difference between rescissions and deferrals, and I think that there is no question that the deferral process was intended by the Congress in the Budget and Impoundment Act, that when you do defer or postpone, you are saving money for that time, and particularly if it is money that cannot be well spent at that particular time.

That applies to the management side, for sure, but also the policy deferrals have been used by presidents of both parties and have served us well. Why change it?

Mr. YATES. If the gentleman will yield further, I will tell him why it has changed. It has been changed from the original congressional intention.

I have dealt with deferrals and rescissions, as has every other member of the Committee on Appropriations since passage of the budget law. Until the Chadha decision, until really this year's budget, it worked well because the Congress followed its original intention of providing for a one-house veto. Either the House could veto the bill or the Senate could veto the bill.

Now we have a situation where, because of the Chadha decision, we have what amounts to a single-item veto on the part of the President because in order to upset the deferral, the Congress must pass it by both Houses; and the President must in turn sign it.

So what we have is a reappropriation of the item that is the subject of the deferral. That is a total departure of what Congress intended; it is a total departure of what happened under the first 11 years of the operation of the Budget Act.

Mr. LOTT. Reclaiming my time, I would like to say to the gentleman, I think this is an area where we need to do some work. I acknowledge that there is some uncertainty with regard to deferrals and the Chadha decision.

My question is, though, should the Appropriations Committee do this? Should not this be done by the Committee on Rules and by the Committee on Government Operations? Should it not be done in a deliberative way?

Does your section 201 do what you would like for it to do? Should not we really look closer at the question of management deferral versus policy deferral?

My main objection here is that we are launching off into this, realizing there is a problem, without having really thought it through; and that is why I did think it was very important that the gentleman from Illinois be able to offer his amendment which is, by the way, a middle ground. He says that there should be some limit—in his amendment, of the policy deferrals, and would put a $5 billion cap on it; so he takes a middle ground.

Mr. YATES. The gentleman is speaking of the minority leader's amendment?

Mr. LOTT. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. YATES. If the gentleman will yield further.

Mr. LOTT. I will be glad to yield further.

Mr. YATES. Because I consider this to be such an important matter, I raised it. I took the matter very seriously. I do not lightly put legislation in an appropriations bill.

I put it into this bill because of the experiences which we were having in the Committee on Appropriations this year, where the administration was using the deferral process as a rescission process; not to delay an expenditure, but actually to wipe out an expenditure.

I had to pass on the question as to whether I should put my amendment in the appropriations bill. Before I did so, I appeared before the Committee on Government Operations and testified in favor of a change of the basic law; a legislative committee. When I was before the Committee on Rules, I said to that committee, "I bring this before the Rules Committee because you have jurisdiction over the Budget Act."

I said, "I have put this amendment in this bill. If you think that you want to take jurisdiction of it and consider it, bless you. You go ahead and you do it. If you think that for the time being, until you have a chance to do it, my amendment should receive the attention of the House, then give me the waiver."

Mr. LOTT. I certainly understand where the gentleman is coming from, Mr. Speaker, and why he would like to act, but I do feel like it is the responsibility of the Committee on Rules and the Committee on Government Operations; and we should have already been acting on it, as a matter of fact, and we certainly should be doing it now.

I still do not think it should be done in the appropriations urgent supplemental, and maybe we will have time anyway, because this urgent supplemental is going to take another 3 to 4 weeks, and maybe the President will wind up vetoing it, and we still will not have dealt with the deferral question.

So in the meantime, the Committee on Rules, I would hope, and would like to urge the distinguished leader and the leadership of the Committee on Rules that we take this issue up and deal with it, and let us work together. This should be a bipartisan solution, because it has been used in a bipartisan way.

The President has not abused his deferral authority. Previous Presidents have used it to a greater extent; and I have right here, President Carter, for instance 1 year, had a $7.3 billion deferral proposal. President Ford had a $21.6 billion deferral; and this deferral, this year, is below the one that President Ford had asked for.

Mr. YATES. If the gentleman will yield further, may I point out to the gentleman that the process, the procedure, under both Presidents Ford and Carter, was the one-House veto. We do not have that now; and what is happening is that we must—for example, take the case of the strategic petroleum reserve and the construction of storage capacity in Texas.

We passed that 2 years ago; the President sent down a deferral; the Congress overruled that last year. The President sent down another deferral this year, and we thought that—it was in our appropriations bill last year—he sent down another deferral this year. We have to go through the entire reappropriations process for the strategic petroleum reserve.

Mr. LOTT. I guess we will debate this later when we get to this section, because there will be, as I understand it, an amendment offered to simply strike section 201, and we will discuss that, and we do have, thanks to the Committee on Rules, the Michel amendment, which would be I think a medium ground.

Basically, though, we fundamentally disagree on the whole substance of the issue. Thank goodness we have Presidents that will try to have rescissions and deferrals, because it is obvious to me the Congress is not going to deal—we are trying to find ways to stop some of this spending when there are reasons to believe it should not go forward.

If I may conclude, let me say that I think the Committee on Rules has done a better job on this rule, but it is still basically a bad rule on a bad bill.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARMEY.]

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Speaker, I want to express my appreciation not only to the gentleman from Mississippi, but to the gentleman from Florida and other members of the committee; both the Committee on Appropriations and Rules, for the hard work they are doing.

□ 1405

But I hate to tell you gentlemen in all respect to the hard work you were doing and the sincerity of your efforts, I am very bitterly disappointed in this rule. This is a bad bill and a bad rule. I think some people who may appreciate this whole process someday might be the professors of America who might find this an excellent case, an example to use in a classroom of how the legislation and procedures by which legislation is developed and the rules by which it is allowed to the floor misses the point of so much work that went into our founding documents in this country to protect against the tyranny of the majority.

It is certainly evident in this effort here.

I have many problems with the bill, but the big problem is its name. Why we continue to call this an urgent supplemental bill is beyond me.

You know, another thing that we find in our curricula is supplemental appropriation bills are not dealt with in the universities and in the schools because we expect them to be rather perfunctory pieces of legislation designed to fill a few fiscal gaps and keep operations running.

Now we have one that makes major policy operations. It is completely out of control. I do not understand why, for example, I might not be allowed to offer an amendment that outlaws legal services, bans any further legal services. Yet another Member can come down and be granted a rule that allows them to legislate away any further nuclear testing. The whole question with regard to the deferral process is a bitter disappointment to me. It would seem to me a good rule would have about 90-percent public policy and about 10-percent politics. This rule clearly has about 10-percent public policy and 90-percent politics.

The President needs the deferral authority for reasons we will look at later. I intend to offer an amendment, as I found 70 percent of the Members of the House willing to sign a letter with me asking the Rules Committee to not grant these legislation waivers and to hold the bill to fiscally responsible guidelines.

We will be back on the floor making our best effort to keep those necessary provisions of the Budget Control and Impoundment Act in force. Also, if at all possible, to try to protect the integrity of the committees of jurisdiction which are being bypassed by these short-circuited legislative efforts that we find in this bill and in this rule.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARMEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. YATES. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I pointed out to the gentleman from Mississippi that I had testified before the Committee on Government Operations and before the Committee on Rules because they are the committees of jurisdiction, telling them this is a subject that ought to be acted on and that my amendment was solely for the purpose of presenting the question to them if they thought it was proper. I have the approval, for presenting my amendment in this bill, of the gentleman who is chairman of the Committee on Government Operations and the ranking member. Obviously, the Committee on Rules approved it because they gave it a rule.

Mr. ARMEY. If I can reclaim my time. I guess that may be one of the points that I am trying to make here. I do not think the extent to which a committee acts, gives approval or whatever, should rest only in the hands of the chairman of that committee. The sovereignty of committee chairmen in this body, I think, is a problem we ought to deal with. The fact of the matter is there are more Members on the committee who are not chairmen than there are who are chairmen. We all are equally competent to decide the Nation's business. I suppose that is why we were put on the committees.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DE LA GARZA].

Mr. DE LA GARZA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise to interject my comments at this point with some degree of sadness that this has to be done, but the supplemental appropriation bill has 12 items of basic Agriculture Committee jurisdiction to which the Rules Committee has provided a general waiver. I want to assure the membership that in most of the instances we have no basic argument with the content but rather with the way that it is being done because they are not basically of that emergency nature that cannot be handled by the appropriate committee of jurisdiction.

Further, and I say this with some degree of sadness out of my respect of the institution, that this erosion has been coming on for a considerable length of time, and unless we stop the erosion or unless some accommodation is made between the Appropriations Committee for whom I have the greatest respect, and this I assure you is not related to any of its Members, but unless we have accommodation or at least communication as to vital items that need to be addressed in an appropriations bill, with the respective committees of jurisdiction, then we would have eroded the rules, and we may have put im place a dismantling of orderly procedure, and we may wind up with some degree of confrontation that is not needed, should not be and none of us want.

Mr. Speaker, I have gone to the leadership, I have gone to everyone that would listen to us, that the orderly procedure under the rules must be followed explicitly. My friends of the Rules Committee, I thank them for all of the cooperation they have given us, but I assure you that granting waivers should be something that is not taken very lightly.

Again we offer our cooperation to all but that we do not erode the basic rules of the House.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the rule on H.R. 4515.

The coming of spring usually brings heavy rains and serious flooding in my part of the country. But this year we're seeing another type of flood in Arkansas. This flood is made of paper instead of water.

The county offices of the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service are drowning under a sea of forms, and the flood threatens to wash away this year's spring planting as surely as a tropical storm from the Gulf of Mexico.

Farmers in Arkansas and throughout the Nation are approaching the end of planting season, and they desperately need the money that ASCS owes them but hasn't released. The disbursement of commodity loans and deficiency payments is hopelessly backlogged, and farmers are without the seed money they need to begin this crop year.

The ASCS county offices simply need more people to process the paperwork. The supplemental before us would transfer $71 million from the Commodity Credit Corporation to the salaries and expenses account of ASCS so the county offices can pay the people to do the work that will get money to the farmer.

The week before last, Mr. Speaker, farmers in Poinsett County, AR, told me that the ASCS office there is so swamped that it has not even finished disbursing 1985 deficiency payments—much less advance deficiency payments for this year.

This transfer of funds is needed—not within several weeks or months—but within the next few days. Many of my farmers are desperate. The flood waters are at our door. We must move this provision through with the utmost speed so we can hire the people needed to process the paperwork and put the money in the hands of the people for whom Congress intended it.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I have no additional requests for time and I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the Rules Committee always has problems when these matters come up. Remember that we did not just get these amendments out of the thin air. These provisions that our friends are objecting to were proposed in a bill that came from the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives, and they presented to us what they thought and felt were provisions which should be protected in the bill.

They asked for a waiver because they knew they were subject to a technical point of order. Ordinarily, as I said a moment ago, when the chairman of a full committee of an authorizing committee or when the chairman of a subcommittee of an authorizing committee appears before the Rules Committee and asks us not to grant a waiver of a rule violation, we observe their request. But this time with respect to a whole list of things that pertain to agriculture which we all know is having a critical period in our time, the Appropriations Committee felt that these things for which they had provided should be allowed to go to a vote on the floor of the House of Representatives.

I am not in the citrus industry area of Florida. I live in Miami. The citrus industry suffered very badly from canker. But the Appropriations Committee had put in some funds to deal with the citrus canker, and we protected that provision as well as some others.

For example, there are some funds in here to deal with avian flu and the like. But as I say, I told my distinguished friend from Texas that we would very reluctantly go contrary to his request and that of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. STRATTON] in two instances. But after deliberating about the matter, considering the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations, we decided it would only be fair to give the House an opportunity to vote on these matters. And that is the reason we granted the waivers.

So I am sorry we could not oblige everybody. We conscientiously tried to do what we thought was the right thing and in the best interests of the country.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise again to express my deep admiration and respect for the chairman. I am certain that he had to bear the brunt of which decision to make. With that we have no quarrel. My concern, Mr. Chairman, is that I, more than no one, want to help the citrus industry in Florida and, more than no one, is interested in controlling the citrus canker, for example.

It could impact down to my area of Texas. But the citrus industry in Florida should realize and know that they come to the committee of jurisdiction first, and this is where I say the erosion is coming that we grant waivers. They will not know that they have to come to the committee of jurisdiction because they will get their money. This is my concern, that it should be done with communication. We do not know if hearings were held. We held no hearings. We know the problem in Florida. So it is a matter of having to join hands and communicate all around and perhaps we, I am sure in this case, would have been in agreement had the communication been made, had we seen the problems. We would have caused the chairman of the Rules Committee not to have to make this decision. This is what I am trying to get at, that we should not have to come and settle it or dump it on the backs of the Rules Committee or the back of the chairman of the Rules Committee. It should be done with communication, in good order, with cooperation, and with a friendly manner so that we do not have to come and be discussing this on the floor of the House.

I thank the distinguished chairman for yielding.

Mr. PEPPER. May I say to my distinguished friend he knows how reluctantly I am on the opposite side from him.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, the chairman is not on the opposite side on this because, I point out to you, the provision relating to canker is a transfer of appropriated money. The committee of jurisdiction is the Appropriations Committee for transfers, not the Agriculture Committee.

Mr. PEPPER. May I say that if we had made a mistake in allowing these provisions to come to a vote on the floor, I am sure the membership would be ably disposed to take care of the matter itself.

So all the criticisms that have been offered may be presented when the amendment comes up for consideration by the House.

May I add one more word here, Mr. Speaker? When we come to the debate on the floor on the Michel amendment, I will have more to say about it, but I just want to say now that the Rules Committee had a hearing a little while ago, consuming an afternoon, with an excellent and varied group of important witnesses on this whole matter that is brought out and emphasized by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. YATES].

As soon as the testimony from that hearing is printed and available to the members of the Rules Committee, we are going to proceed in an effort to try to bring the Congress together to determine what the Congress should do in dealing with this critical constitutional issue; to what extent the Executive may decline to carry out the provisions of laws established by the Congress of the United States in a constitutional way, including appropriations made by the Congress.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, I yield back the balance of my time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 187, nays 220, not voting 26, as follows:

Messrs. CAMPBELL, CHAPMAN, and HORTON, Mrs. JOHNSON, Messrs. VISCLOSKY, JEFFORDS, WEBER, and MILLER of California, Mrs. LLOYD, and Messrs. PENNY, VALENTINE, RINALDO, and VOLK-

MER changed their votes from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. WEBER changed his vote from "nay" to "yea."

So the resolution was not agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FARM SITUATION DESPERATE

(Mr. WHITTEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, in H.R. 4515, the urgent supplemental appropriations bill, we only try to help the farmer. We have not attempted to take over any committee's jurisdiction. We try to turn back to the law which worked and which is still on the books, a law under which the farmer bought land but which he now loses under the new law and current conditions.

We call for a return to last year's requirements to qualify for production loans.

American agriculture is our biggest industry. Our best and most economic supplier to the consumer is our biggest employer and chief dollar earner in word trade. Farm income of course is V × P less C—volume times price less cost. When you limit both his volume and his price, he cannot hope to cover his cost. The PIK Program, which cost $12,000,000,000, was charged to the farmer, and transferred 11 percent of our production overseas to our competitors and did little to help the farmer other than provide some badly needed cash.

Since World War II, industry and labor's share of the consumer dollar increased from 49 to 73 percent under law. The farmers' share during this period, however, has decreased from 51 to 27 percent.

Mr. Speaker, today hundreds of thousands of farmers are bankrupt. They are rapidly losing their land, often land that has been in the family for more than 100 years. More than 120 banks have failed this year and an additional 120 are said to be in danger of closing.

The Farm Credit Administration is on the ropes and is notifying farmers that they must look elsewhere for farm operating loans.

The Federal Land Banks are foreclosing. Banks in rural areas are hesitant to make any new loans.

Less than one-fourth of those who were approved for loans last year have been approved for loans this year.

In many areas we have seen suicides.

FARMERS PAY FOR FOREIGN POLICY

When we look for the cause we see that in 1973, farmers were urged to withhold exports. In 1974, 1975, and 1980, basic farm commodities were embargoed by the Government to punish Russia.

When the grain companies bought from the farmer and our Government refused to let them deliver, we paid the grain companies. But the Government did nothing for the producer who produced and could not sell his crop. Our country is the only country which has failed to use its authority to make the offering price in world trade competitive. Yet the Commodity Credit Corporation, a $25 billion corporation, was set up to support domestic prices and to retain our foreign markets. Secretary Butz used the private world traders to restore our exports but now our Government will use neither traders or CCC.

Since 1980 we have continued to have our farmers finance our foreign policy, which results in giving their market to our competitors.

Under law, we are making advance deficiency payments because the farmer's financial condition is so bad.

In view of present conditions, a big percentage of our production which should be moved into world trade by us will be lost to competitors as was 11 percent under "PIK," and we will lose the dollars in export sales we could have made.

PERISHABLE COMMODITIES

Of course, perishables commodities are another matter. There we attempt to purchase the surplus and bring supply and demand into balance, thereby maintaining a reasonable price for the farmer. So far as livestock is concerned, under the new law, prices have dropped by $6 to $8 per hundred weight.

NEED TO RETURN TO OLD LAW

Mr. Speaker, under such conditions we have asked that the old laws which are still on the books be used, where loan rates were tied to costs, where the price was paid by the user, and the surplus moved into world trade at competitive prices.

We ask for a return to last year's requirement for production loans. This would save 75 percent of the borrowers.

Mr. Speaker, we have not attempted to take over any committee's jurisdiction. Conditions of American farmers are so bad that we would be glad to turn to any committee.

EXPLANATION OF H.R. 4515

Mr. Speaker, the original bill began on March 12, 1986, when I introduced H.R. 4380, an urgent supplemental appropriations bill for fiscal year 1986. This bill provided $449 million for emergency disaster relief and several other urgently needed items as follows:

	Millions
Disaster relief (Federal Emergency Management Agency)	$250
Disaster Loan Fund (Small Business Administration)	52
Disaster assistance (Impact Aid)	20
Flood control and coastal emergencies	25
Watershed and flood prevention operations	25
Emergency Conservation Program (Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service)	10
FAA (Air traffic operations and safety)	60
Fees of Jurors (Judiciary)	3
Food Safety and Inspection Service	3

This bill (H.R. 4380) was considered by the full committee on March 20. When it became apparent that additional funding was needed for the Internal Revenue Service, the Customs Service, and Embassy Security, and that these and other items would probably be added by the Senate, various subcommittee chairmen and other members amended the bill by adding these and other items which were considered essential. As a result of these actions, both the size and scope of the original bill which I introduced was increased from $449 million to $1.705 million. The bill as amended was reported to the House as original legislation—H.R. 4515.

RELATIONSHIP TO THE BUDGET RESOLUTION

I want to stress that both the bill which I introduced, and the bill which was reported by the committee are under the budget allocation given to this committee pursuant to the conference agreement on the fiscal year 1986 budget resolution. It has been pointed out to me that in the scorekeeping report to the Speaker submitted by the House Budget Committee, that our Committee on Appropriations is under its allocation for fiscal year 1986.

Mr. Speaker, we are proud of the historical record of the Appropriation Committee. Even after you account for the effect of this legislation (H.R. 4515), we are still under our budget allocation. This must be clearly understood in this era of fiscal restraint. Because of final action by the Congress affecting military spending and legislation which permits additional program funding to be drawn from the Commodity Credit Corporation, several of the individual 302(b) subdivisions adopted by the committee on October 28, 1985, have been affected. This reflects a change in our original priorities, however, without the total allocation to the committee being breached.

At the request of the House leadership, the committee delayed the consideration of the bill in order to accommodate certain possible amendments. This has caused the legislation to be scheduled after April 15. This slippage in scheduling created what I considered a technical violation of the so-called 302(b) subcommittee allocations, but not the overall ceiling. As I stated earlier, the legislation is within our committee's overall 302 budget allocation for fiscal year 1986. The Rules Committee considered this a technical matter arising out of new provisions in the Gramm-Rudman legislation, and in this rule waives the 302(f) requirement because the bill still is under the overall 302 allocation.

CONGRESSIONAL MAIL

It should also be noted that the rule would have eliminated $42 million and legislative provisions which deal with congressional mail.

CONSERVATION RESERVE

I would like to call to your attention the new Conservation Reserve Program of the Department of Agriculture. As you know, I have been personally supportive for many years of the conservation programs of the Department of Agriculture as well as other conservation programs throughout the Government. When the conferees met to consider House Joint Resolution 534—the urgent supplemental for the Commodity Credit Corporation—we addressed this specific item. The new program was intended by the authors of the farm legislation to be in addition to the existing Soil Conservation Program.

The Office of Management and Budget, however, has recommended a cut of 60 percent in the regular program and a reduction of 3,700 employees in the fiscal year 1987 budget which would lead to eventual program elimination. As a result, House Joint Resolution 534, as signed (Public Law 99-263) states that the new ". . . conservation reserve program shall not replace or reduce any existing conservation program." With the addition of this language in conference, the provisions of section 2 that I included in this legislation—before we had conference agreement—are no longer required since their goal has been achieved. When I appeared before the Rules Committee, I requested a self-executing rule which would delete section 2 of chapter 1 from the legislation. This would have been done by the adoption of the rule.

SUSPENSION OF DEFERRAL AUTHORITY

Also, I would like to call your attention to section 201 of the bill. This is provided as an emergency measure to deal with problems presented by the Chadha decision of the Supreme Court and actions of the administration.

As a temporary measure, the Appropriations Committee has included language which removes the administration's authority to defer future spending under title X of the Budget Act. In effect this suspends the process until something permanent can be worked out under the leadership of the Rules Committee led by Senator PEPPER and the Government Operations Committee led by our good friend, JACK BROOKS. We hope they will come up with the workable solution.

Mr. Speaker, defeat of this rule will not solve many of the problems addressed in H.R. 4515. These problems must be addressed, either today or in the very near future. The loser today is the American farmer, who is already on the ropes.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. LOTT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time for the purpose of determining for the membership what the schedule will be for the balance of the day and for the week, in view of the fact that the rule on the urgent supplemental was just defeated.

I yield to the majority leader.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, in view of the vote on the rule, we will go now to the rule on military retirement, H.R. 4420, revising military retirement system for new members of the Armed Services. We will go into that rule and, assuming the adoption of that rule, we will take up that bill and debate it for the remainder of today, expecting to arise at least by 7 o'clock if we have not completed action on that bill by that time. That is an open rule, with 2 hours of general debate.

Then tomorrow, assuming we shall have completed the military retirement bill, we hope to take up the Garrison Diversion Unit Reformulation Act and try to complete it.

Mr. LOTT. Did we complete general debate on that bill at an earlier point?

Mr. WRIGHT. It is my understanding that general debate has been completed. But that is an open rule, and we may have amendments that will be offered.

It is my further understanding that most of the controversy which beset that legislation in times past has been resolved and there is some general agreement as to the direction we will go.

□ 1444

So I do not expect that it will take an extraordinarily long time, but it is our purpose to finish the military retirement bill first. If we finish that today, so much the better. If we do not, we will try to finish it tomorrow. Having finished it, we will try to go back to the Garrison bill and see if we could conclude it; in any event, rising at the reasonable hour we earlier had planned tomorrow in order that Members might observe the Jewish religious holidays.

Mr. LOTT. It is still the intention of the leadership that we come in at 10 o'clock on Wednesday?

Mr. WRIGHT. That is correct.

Mr. LOTT. I understand there is some time left on general debate on the Garrison diversion, so there may be some time that is still required under general debate, after the House comes in at 10 o'clock.

Mr. WRIGHT. I think that is altogether possible.

Mr. LOTT. Since the House just defeated the rule on the supplemental appropriations, I would certainly hope that maybe now we could have a rule on a clean urgent supplemental appropriations bill. Does the leadership have any indication when we would take that matter up again of when the Rules Committee would consider it further, if at all?

Mr. WRIGHT. Cleanliness is said to be next to godliness and if it is, we are an ungodly lot.

Mr. LOTT. Was there a pun intended there, may I ask the leader, "ungodly lot"?

Mr. WRIGHT. Cleanliness may be in the eye of the beholder. We would have thought that that bill was as clean as a hound's tooth, but there were certain Members who found abscesses in the hound's teeth.

Mr. LOTT. I think the leader is saying that, "We don't know yet, we'll talk about it later," is that right?

Mr. WRIGHT. We will talk about it on another day when we can get the Borax and all the cleansing fluids possible and try to bring back a bill that will be acceptable.

Mr. LOTT. Well, every dog will have his day, that is for sure, on this subject.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Hallen, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1236. An act to amend title 18 of the United States Code and other laws to make minor or technical amendments to provisions enacted by the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984, and for other purposes.

MILITARY RETIREMENT REFORM ACT OF 1986

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 421 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 421

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 4420) to amend title 10, United States Code, to revise the retirement system for new members of the uniformed services, and for other purposes, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and amendment made in order by this resolution and which shall continue not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Armed Services, the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Armed Services now printed in the bill as an original bill for the purpose of amendment under the five-minute rule, said substitute shall be considered for amendment by titles instead of by sections and each title shall be considered as having been read, and all points of order against said substitute for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 7 of rule XVI and clause 5(a) of rule XXI are hereby waived. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and any Member may demand a separate vote in the House on any amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole to the bill or to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. FROST] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, for purposes of debate only, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. QUILLEN], pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 421 is an open rule providing for the consideration of H.R. 4420, the Military Retirement Reform Act of 1986. The rule provides 2 hours of general debate, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Armed Services.

The rule also provides that it shall be in order to consider the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Armed Services now printed in the bill as original text for the purpose of amendment under the 5-minute rule and further provides that the committee substitute shall be considered for amendment by titles rather than by sections and that each title shall be considered as having been read.

In addition, the rule waives two points of order against the substitute. The first point of order waived in the rule, is specifically provided for the provisions of title IV of the committee substitute. This title relates to fiscal year 1986 unauthorized appropriations and the provisions of the title are not germane to the military reform provisions of the introduced bill. Therefore, in order to allow the Committee on Armed Services the opportunity to address the issue of unauthorized appropriations contained in the fiscal year 1986 Department of Defense appropriations, the Committee on Rules has included a waiver of clause 7, rule XVI, which prohibits nongermane amendments, in the resolution.

The second, a waiver of clause 5(a) of rule XXI, which prohibits appropriations in a legislative bill, is provided because the authorizations contained in title IV have the effect of releasing previously appropriated funds for obligation. The fiscal year 1986 continuing appropriation provided that the unauthorized amounts contained therein could not be obligated unless and until an authorization was enacted. Therefore, because these funds are being released and earmarked in law for obligation by virtue of the authorizations in title IV, the waiver of clause 5(a), rule XXI is necessary and has been provided by the Committee on Rules.

The rule also provides that at the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and any Member may demand a separate vote in the House on any amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole to the bill or to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute. Finally, the rule provides that the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 4420 represents significant changes in the military retirement system. These changes are intended to not only save many billions of dollars in payments to future military retirees, but more importantly, these changes are intended to encourage our military personnel to remain in the armed services past 20 years of service. Under current law, military personnel may retire after 20 years and immediately receive a pension equal to 50 percent of the average basic pay they received in their 3 highest pay years. The incentives provided in the restructured military retirement system recommended by the Committee on Armed Services will encourage our most experienced military personnel—those with 20 years or more of service—to remain on active duty and to continue to contribute their irreplaceable training, education, and experience to an increasingly technologically complex Armed Forces.

To provide these incentives, the Committee on Armed Services is recommending that those personnel who choose to retire after only 20 years service be entitled to a pension equal to 40 percent of their 5 years highest basic pay. For every year a member of the military remains in the service beyond 20 years, pension benefits would increase by 3.5 percent so that by 30 years a retiree would be entitled to 75 percent of basic pay as under current law. In addition, the averaging period used to compute the average basic pay would be reduced by 1 month for each 5 months of additional service beyond 20 years so that by 30 years, a retiree would be entitled to average his three highest basic pay rates, as under current law.

The Committee on Armed Services estimates that these changes, which will affect only those members of the armed services who join after the date of enactment, will cut pension costs for the military by $3.1 million on an annualized basis. These savings are mandated by the fiscal year 1986 Department of Defense authorization, and the Committee on Armed Services is to be commended for recommending this legislation which is fair to all military personnel—retirees, active duty members, as well as future members of the armed services.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 4420 contains provisions which are unrelated to the reform of the military retirement system, but which are of critical importance to the proper functioning of the authorization/appropriations process in the Congress. Title IV of the bill provides authorizations for $2.3 billion of the $5.6 billion in unauthorized appropriations for various military weapons and programs included in the continuing appropriations act for fiscal year 1986. The remaining $3.3 billion, minus $506 million which would be eliminated by the first Gramm-Rudman sequester order, is specifically prohibited from obligation until future authorizing legislation is enacted. The Committee on Armed Services has taken this step in order to exert control over that vast sum of Federal dollars contained in the fiscal year 1986 continuing appropriation which are either unauthorized or exceed authorization levels contained in the fiscal year 1986 Department of Defense authorization. The Committee on Rules, which continues to watch the difficulties the Congress has had in recent years in enacting authorizations in a timely manner so that appropriations may move forward, commends the Committee on Armed Services for taking this action. In these times of fiscal constraint, action by authorizing committees to specifically define the limits of any Federal spending program is to be commended.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 4420 is a bill which represents significant savings to the Federal treasury, both in the future and in the present. The Committee on Armed Services has crafted a fair and equitable retirement system for future military retirees and has addressed a significant problem contained in the current appropriation for the Department of Defense. It is for this reason that I urge my colleagues to adopt this rule and to adopt this legislation.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself as much time as I may use.

Mr. Speaker, it would be redundant for me to explain the provisions of the rule because it has been explained very ably.

We all know that we face a very critical situation in our defense posture. Unless this is passed, we face a reduction in the number of personnel in our defense system. It is in my opinion mandatory that we get down to the business of passing this measure on the floor of the House as quickly as possible so those coming into the service will know what to expect. By reducing retirement expenses, we can retain our current strength or even increase it.

Mr. Speaker, I urge adoption of the rule and measure when it is debated on the floor.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 403, nays 1, not voting 29, as follows:

□ 1510

So the resolution was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 421 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 4420.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 4420), to amend title 10, United States Code, to revise the retirement system for new members of the uniformed services, and for other purposes, with Mr. TRAXLER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Under the rules, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ASPIN] will be recognized for 1 hour and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HILLIS] will be recognized for 1 hour.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ASPIN].

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to bring to the floor of the House today H.R. 4420, the Retirement Reform Act of 1986.

H.R. 4420 would revise the uniformed services nondisability retirement system for individuals who become members of the uniformed services for the first time on or after the date of enactment and would provide authority to obligate certain appropriations contained in the fiscal year 1986 Defense Appropriations Act.

Mr. Chairman, the committee recommends to the full House two changes in the uniformed retirement system. The first is a change in the formula for computing the multiplier and second is a change in the length of the averaging period used to calculate the base for computing retirement pay.

Mr. Chairman, the two things we want to make absolutely clear about this legislation—one is that it does not affect anybody who is currently retired and it does not affect anyone who is currently a member of the uniformed services. This provision that we are enacting today is strictly prospective.

Any person joining one of the uniformed services after the date of enactment, meaning after the date it is signed into law by the President, are the people who are going to be affected. Anybody who joins the uniformed services before that date is under the old system.

Second, I would like to point out, Mr. Chairman, that this system that we are presenting to the Congress here today does not change the retirment system in any way for any member who serves a full 30-year career. Any person who serves a full 30-year career gets the same benefits under the new provision as they got under the old provision. What it does do is change the benefits for the people who serve a 20-year career.

In particular, it means that after 20 years, instead of 50 percent of base pay, a person will retire with 40 percent of base pay and instead of that retirement being calculated on the high 3 years of service, it would be calculated on the high 5 years of service.

Mr. Chairman, the reason for this, and the rationale behind it is to encourage people toward a longer career in the uniformed services. There are a lot of people who join the services, who get valuable training, who are reaching a point after 20 years of service of maximum value to the services because of their training, because of their experience and, of course, because of their value to the Armed Forces, they are also of extreme value to any industry on the outside, and after 20 years of service under the current system, they really are performing a financial sacrifice to stay in the services.

What is happening is these people are leaving. They are getting a good salary on the outside; they are getting one-half of their base pay for having served the 20 years in uniform and we are losing these people. It is the hope of the authors of this legislation to try and encourage people to stay for the full 30 years in the career and to help, therefore, in getting our Armed Forces to keep the people who are most experienced and who are most valuable.

The second part of this bill here before us is a bill that relates to a problem that we brought before this Congress, this body, last year. That is the problem of authorizations and appropriations.

The Appropriation Committee in the other body appropriated a large number of dollars that were never authorized in the authorizing process. I would point out that the problem lies not with the Appropriations Committee in the House. The Appropriations Committee in the House was very cooperative and we worked together and I would like to commend the current chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CHAPPELL] and the former chairman, the late gentleman from New York [Mr. ADDABBO], for their cooperation with us in avoiding this problem on the House side.

However, unfortunately, in the other body, things were not so good and in the other body, a lot of money was appropriated for which there was no authorization.

In the conference on the appropriations, the number was brought down some, but not enough. And, in fact we had approximately $5.6 billion that was appropriated for about 100 programs. These are projects and activities above the levels authorized.

The committee here is recommending in this language. This additional part of H.R. 4420, which we are considering here today, does clear up the authorization/appropriation issue by authorizing some of the unauthorized projects.

□ 1525

In particular, we are authorizing $2.3 billion for recommendation of approval. Of the remaining amount, $500 million—$506 million to be exact, was taken out of the $5.6 billion on the sequestration under Gramm-Rudman for 1986, and the other amount, $2.8 billion, we are recommending be denied under this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to bring to the floor of the House today H.R. 4420, the Retirement Reform Act of 1986.

H.R. 4420 would revise the uniformed services nondisability retirement system for individuals who become members of a uniformed service for the first time on or after the date of enactment and would provide authority to obligate certain appropriations contained in the fiscal year 1986 Defense Appropriations Act.

RETIREMENT REFORM

The committee recommends two basic changes to the uniformed services retirement system: a change in the formula for computing the multiplier and a change in the length of the averaging period used to calculate the base for computing retired pay. I want to make absolutely clear that no member who had joined a uniformed service before the date of enactment of the change—much less any retiree of a uniformed service—would be affected by the committee's recommendations.

The committee recommends a formula that would result in a multiplier of 40 percent of average basic pay for 20 years of service—compared to 50 percent today—and a maximum of 75 percent of average basic pay for 30 years of service—the same as current law.

The committee also recommends that service members who retire with 20 years of service compute their average basic pay based on the highest basic pay they received during any 5 years of service—currently 3 years. The averaging period would be reduced by 1 month for each 5 months of additional service beyond 20 years. For members who serve for 30 or more years, the averaging period would be 3 years (the same as current law).

UNAUTHORIZED APPROPRIATIONS

The second issue addressed by the bill before us today also involves a complex institutional question: the relationship between the authorization and appropriation process.

As a result of the final action on the Defense Authorization and Appropriations Act for fiscal year 1986, approximately $5.6 billion was appropriated for about 100 programs, projects, and activities above the levels authorized. The committee provides specific recommendations that would allow some of the excess appropriations to be spent and that would prohibit the remainder from being spent.

Of the total of $5.6 billion in excess appropriations, $2.3 billion is recommended for approval. A total of $506 million of the excess appropriations would be eliminated as a result of the March sequester and other reductions, and a total of $2.8 billion would be denied under the recommendations.

COST IMPACTS

The Congressional Budget Office estimates that enactment of the changes to the uniformed services retirement system would reduce outlays from the national defense function—050—by $1.3 billion in fiscal year 1986 and by $186 million in fiscal year 1987. The reduction would increase to $1.5 billion by 1991. Eventually, outlays would be reduced by slightly over $3 billion per year. Outlays from the Federal budget would not be affected until service members actually retire under the revised system. At that time, savings to the Federal budget would also be $3 billion per year.

It is important to keep in mind that the committee's recommendations reflect a policy decision that will have very substantial and long-term cost savings in the Department of Defense budget and, eventually, in the Federal budget as a whole. These cost savings will be accomplished with no adverse affect on U.S. military capabilities and will result in a more effecient allocation of resources within the defense budget.

With regard to the unauthorized appropriations, the Congressional Budget Office estimates that prohibiting $2.8 billion from being obligated would reduce outlays by $624 million in fiscal year 1986, $854 million in fiscal year 1987, decreasing to $161 million by fiscal year 1990.

SUMMARY

Mr. Chairman, the legislation being considered today represents a major policy change in one of the most complex and emotional areas within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Armed Services. Military retirement reform has been a goal sought by a number of military and civilian leaders in the Department of Defense and by many Members of Congress—myself included—for the past two decades. The bill represents the culmination of this effort and a resolution of the various issues in such a way as to improve the management of the critical personnel resource rather than simply "cutting costs."

The legislation focuses on a major issue within our institution as well—the gradual erosion of the viability of the authorizing process. Defense priorities are established through the process of considering the Defense authorization bill. When the Defense appropriations bill provides over $5 billion outside of the priorities established, the process has run amok. The legislation provides an opportunity to reestablish the priorities.

Mr. Chairman, during the process of considering the retirement reform portion of this bill, a number of Members on both sides of the aisle have suggested that the change to the retirement system should be more substantial—especially considering that this may be the last opportunity we will have for many years. I would urge the Members, however, to support the committee's recommendation because it represents a substantial and beneficial change, a change that has been a long time in the coming.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, as the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Military Personnel and Compensation, I rise in support of titles I, II, and III, the military retirement portions of H.R. 4420, as reported by the Committee on Armed Services.

Last year, as a part of the fiscal year 1986 Defense Authorization Act Congress made a landmark decision: to change the military retirement system. The battles over the propriety of that decision and the magnitude of the cut were fought in committee, on the floor, and in conference. The battle ended with the enactment of a $2.9 billion cut in the authorized funding level for military retirement. The legislation before us today simply implements last year's decision.

As part of the $2.9 billion reduction in the accrual charge for fiscal year 1986—an accrual charge is the projected percentage of current payroll needed to pay the retirement cost of new entrants into the work force—Congress directed the Department of Defense to submit two plans to revise the nondisability military retirement system to achieve the required level of savings. Although the Pentagon met the literal requirement of the law, the two plans were deficient; both, for example, contained complex multipliers—43 percent of basic pay after 20 years of service, for example—that made little sense. As a result, the committee decided to develop its own option: H.R. 4420.

One of the principal criticisms repeatedly directed at the current military retirement system is the early age at which experienced, highly trained personnel are able to retire. Clearly, 20-year retirement has a vital role to play in maintaining a young, physically fit, and combat-ready fighting force. Today, however, only a small portion of the current force, particularly at more senior levels, is going to be engaged in actual combat.

Instead, much of the current force is composed of highly trained engineers, technicians, and managers—individuals in whom the services have invested thousands of dollars in military and civilian education. The current military retirement system encourages these service members to leave in the prime of their working careers. The incentives are perverse. Despite Pentagon claims to the contrary, the current system is not an efficient force management tool.

The committee, therefore, decided that any restructuring of the military retirement system should enhance its usefulness as a force management tool and opted to revise the financial incentives to encourage more people to remain for 30 years. The change is twofold: A change in the multiplier and a change in the averaging period.

Under current law, the retired pay multiplier is 2½ percent times years of service, that is 50 percent of basic pay after 20 years of service increasing to a maximum of 75 percent at 30 years of service. Under H.R. 4420, this would change to 2 percent per year for the first 20 years of service and 3½ percent for each of the next 10 years. Thus, a service member would receive 40, rather than 50 percent of basic pay after completing 20 years. The benefit at 30 years of service would remain unchanged from current law—75 percent of basic pay.

Presently, the averaging period for those entering active duty after September 7, 1980, is the high-3 average of basic pay. Under H.R. 4420, this would increase to the high-5 average at 20 years of service, gradually decreasing—at the rate of 1 month for every 5 months of service—to high-3 after 30 years of service. Like the multiplier, the benefit at 30 years of service would remain unchanged from current law.

In conclusion, let me restate what I said at the outset: The retirement changes incorporated in H.R. 4420 implement the decision of the Congress last year to change the system. The committee's recommendations are designed to enhance the attractiveness of longer careers by leaving untouched the current 75 percent of basic pay at 30 years of service while reducing the benefit at 20 years of service. Finally, I want to stress that these changes would be applicable only to those entering the Armed Forces after the date of enactment. Everyone in the current system—whether on active duty or already retired—would be grandfathered under the system.

The time is short. Unless Congress acts quickly, a mandated reduction in military personnel funds included in the continuing appropriation resolution last year will be triggered, effective May 1, 1986. The Congress must act quickly, and I urge my colleagues' support of H.R. 4420, as reported.

Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DICKINSON].

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time, and I would like to join in support of the retirement part of the bill presently under discussion.

If we reflect back many years ago, we had difficulty in attracting young men to come in to the service; and particularly to retain then so they would make a career of it. The wisdom of the House at that time, and the Congress at that time was: Well, as an inducement, we would allow them to come in and retire at half pay after 20 years and then 75 percent pay after 30 years.

Perhaps it was needed at that time, but a lot has changed since then. I get more mail in my office asking my assistance in keeping certain servicemen in the service, because they are being threatened with being not allowed to extend than I do in trying to keep them out. It used to be the mail would be: "Would you help Johnny or Willie get out of the service because of this reason; we need him at home." The thrust now is, if they are not performing, if they are not a good soldier, sailor, airman, et cetera, get rid of them.

We have raised their pay since 1980, some 35 percent; well above the inflation factor. They are well paid now and because of the economic situation in this country today, to let a person retire after 20 years with 50 percent of his base pay is a disincentive to stay in.

We bring them onboard; we spend thousands and thousands of dollars to give them a skill, and then by the time they reach sergeant or above, they have served to the point that they are most valuable to the service; then there is an incentive for them to hang it up and to get up and to go with industry.

If a person comes in when he is 19 years old and spends 20 years, he gets out at 39 years of age, then for the rest of his life, he has got half of his base pay; he is equipped with a skill, and he can go out and do quite well for himself.

This simply says that he will not get 50 percent; he gets 40 percent. It does not affect anyone presently serving. This is prospective in nature only; I think it is only fair to those who are onboard, but from now on, if this passes, everybody is on notice that they will not get 50 percent, they will get 40 percent.

As to the other aspect of this bill, that appropriated but not authorized, I think the chairman has stated it very succinctly and very properly. We have a process in the House, and it is the law, that we authorize, on the Armed Services Committee, and then the Committee on Appropriations may appropriate up to but not exceeding the funds that were authorized. It works pretty good; they do not have to appropriate as much as is authorized, but they should not appropriate more.

We have seen, in the past few years in the other body, a total ignoring of the rules of procedures and the rules of the Congress. If they do not like something they just will not give it the money; if they like something over here that has not been authorized, "That's all right—throw the money in there; we're running this thing. We don't have to worry about what the House of Representatives does; we don't have to worry about the sequence that things come up in; we can both authorize and appropriate" seems to be their attitude; and that is what they have been doing.

In conference it was said that these matters that were appropriated, that we had not yet authorized could not be spent unless they were subsequently authorized. We had a chance to look at them.

So that is what we are in the process of doing now. We have gone back and looked at some of these things. Some were justified by events that occurred after we marked up, and before appropriations did.

□ 1535

So we have approved a little over $2 billion. We have authorized that amount of the over $5 billion that was added by the other body. But there are over $2 billion that we did not authorize. We do not think it is a wise expenditure, whether it be for somebody's pet project back home or whatever.

We did not authorize it, it should not be authorized.

We are looking for ways to keep from cutting further into authorized projects under Gramm-Rudman and other constraints that we have, and it is certainly unwise to allow the other body just to run roughshod over the House procedure and to add what they please and if they do not like what we authorize they do not appropriate that. Then to be a little authorizing and appropriating committee all to itself and run the whole show.

I would hope that the House would support our chairman and our committee position and support us on final passage and that we authorize those things which we feel should be and eliminate those that we did not feel should be authorized.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ORTIZ].

Mr. ORTIZ. I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of this legislation, H.R. 4420—a bill to amend title 10, United States Code, to revise the retirement system for new members of the uniformed services, and for other purposes. I compliment our distinguished chairman, Mr. ASPIN and his leadership ability in bringing this measure to the floor today. I find it a distinct privilege to participate with my hard-working colleagues of the committee and with such a truly professional staff, to preserve the commitment we have to our servicemen and women who have honorably served this great country of ours in the past, to those now serving, and to those who will serve America in the future.

Additionally, the chairman, committee, and staff are to be complimented on the manner in which this matter of unauthorized appropriations have been resolved. I believe, in this time of fiscal constraints and efforts to reduce the deficit, that this bill provides those resources so necessary to preserve and improve both our deterrent and defense capabilities, as well as the infrastructure necessary to support these weapons systems and quality of life for those service personnel who defend our free Nation.

We need not be reminded, based upon the events of this past week, that we need to support our Armed Forces with the materiel and tangible benefits that:

Provide the resources to project and enforce our national policies throughout the world; and

Provide those tangible benefits that let our service personnel and their families know that we support them and that we will truly provide for their welfare.

Truly, this bill provides those resources needed to improve our deterrent and defense capabilities, as well as to honor our commitment to those who have served, are serving, and who will serve by providing retirement benefits which will encourage the retention of physically fit, true professionals who comprise our Armed Forces.

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BATEMAN].

Mr. BATEMAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Before delivering my remarks which will be certainly less than 5 minutes, I would like to commend the distinguished gentleman from Indiana and the ranking member of the Subcommittee on Military Personnel and Compensation who by his choice will be retiring at the end of this session of Congress. We will certainly miss him.

He is one of the grand and dedicated, conscientious, and effective Members of this body.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to echo the comments made by the gentleman from Alabama about the quality of the people who are serving in the uniformed services of the United States of America at this time.

The quality has never been higher, and it is a credit to the Congresses which provided levels of compensation, quality of life benefits and retirement benefits which have made this possible.

We should be extremely nervous about changing it in any way that would denigrate the quality of those people.

I have visited them on the flight lines, in their submarines, in their tanks, and I just could not be more proud of the quality of those who serve us.

With reference to this bill today, Mr. Chairman, I rise in support but most assuredly in reluctant support of the measure. We are, when we face up to it, legislating a reduction in retirement benefits for those who serve from 20 to 30 years in the military service, a reduction at least in terms of what they would now receive under present law.

Why then do I support this bill? I support it because in our last session we enacted legislation which in effect says to the Department of Defense:

Unless you make suggestions of changes in the retirement system which will reduce appropriations to the retirement accrual account, we are going to take $2.9 billion out of the personnel account of the Department of Defense. We have got to enact something that you recommended to us or a modification thereof before May 1, 1986.

Well, we are near that date, we must act or otherwise some very draconian things would have to happen to the personnel account and literally thousands and thousands of qualified people in the uniformed services would have to be released from service.

We cannot permit that to happen. This bill, when passed, will prevent it from happening.

For that reason it is entitled to my support and, I believe, the support of the full membership of the House. I do, however, utter my regrets that it is necessary for us to reduce these retirement benefits. I certainly hope that it is going to be possible that this be implemented in a way that is going to give the maximum encouragement within these financial parameters for people remaining in our services for longer than 20 years.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY].

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this legislation and thank my chairman for giving me this opportunity. But I will offer an amendment at the proper time which should be very soon. I would like to briefly explain this amendment and say that this amendment which I will offer today has the total support of all the Reserve forces in this country. This amendment would add for the Army National Guard $100 million, for the Army Reserve $100 million, for the Naval Reserve $25 million, for the Marine Reserve $10 million, for the Air Force Reserve $10 million, and for the Air National Guard $40 million, which totals out to $285 million.

Yes, that is a lot of money, but we get a lot from our Reserve forces and National Guard.

Let me point out to my colleagues that this amendment I will offer contains no big-ticket items, no purchase of big airplanes, tanks, or ships; items like simulators for the Marine Corps Reserve back at the armories, training aids for the Army Reserve, modification kits for the A-7's in the Air Guard and Reserve to make these planes safer for our reservists flying them; and devices to improve safety on our equipment.

The money will not go, Mr. Chairman, just to 1 or 2 States in this amendment, but the money will go to all 50 States. It is a good possibility that some of the equipment purchased under this amendment will end up in the armory in your hometown or your municipal airport where the Air Reserve units are located.

Mr. Chairman, I want to point out that in the last 10 to 12 years there has been in the Reserve forces a great improvement, and a lot of credit for that improvement of Reserve forces has to go to the House of Representatives and especially to the House Committee on Armed Services with the help of the Committee on Appropriations.

We started about 10 years ago putting items in to give new equipment and incentives to the Reserves and National Guard. We did not get much help from the Defense Department, but this House of Representatives said, "We want a strong Reserve, we want a strong National Guard."

So we started adding incentives to treat the reservists just like we treat the regular forces.

By the Congress giving better equipment and incentives to the citizen soldier, I personally have observed the readiness of the Guard and Reserve improve tremendously.

Now we have Reserve units, and listen to this, my colleagues, we have Reserve units now that are as good as or better than some of our regular forces. Now that is good.

We now have two strong military units out there, the regulars and the Reserve forces.

Let me point out that the Reserves are a good buy for the taxpayer. It costs half as much to train and maintain an Air Guard unit as it costs the regular unit with the same mission.

I am aware and I respect our chairman, LES ASPIN, I am aware of the problems we are having approving unauthorized appropriations in this bill by authorizing funding that has already been done by the Appropriations Committee, but I am also very concerned about the equipment shortages that we have in the Reserves. This is a one-time shot that we have got, my friends, to get some money for the Reserves. Let me close by saying that the Reserve forces have about 50 percent of all the combat support missions of the total force, yet the total funding on authorization for 1986 and 1987, the Reserves got less than 5 percent of all the moneys, less than 5 percent.

Now, as I said earlier, the Reserve Association, National Guard Association, Reserve forces themselves, with the chiefs of the different services, together we sat down and we worked out to this figure of $285 million.

Yes, we could have asked for $840 million that has actually been appropriated but not authorized. I think this amendment is a reasonable approach, and if you believe in the National Guard and the Reserve and you have been contacted, you have been contacted by the reservists back in your home district, I certainly hope you will support this amendment.

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. CARNEY].

Mr. CARNEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to H.R. 4420, the Military Retirement Reform Act of 1986, not because I believe the bill represents a change that should not be made but, rather, because I do not believe the bill goes far enough.

Advocates of changing the military retirement system have worked for two decades to get to the point at which we stand today. This is a golden opportunity to make a change that will stand for many decades in the future. This opportunity will not come again—at least in the near term. Yet the committee chose to make a change that, although in the right direction, falls far short of the magnitude needed to position the military retirement system properly in the 21st century.

My objections to the bill are twofold.

First, the bill provides no payment from the military retirement system to those members who fail to complete 20 years of service. We require private sector plans to provide such a payment to employees with as little as 10 years of service. The Federal civil service provides a deferred annuity to those who complete only 5 years of service. This is an equity issue.

Second, 20-year retirement is so ingrained in the system that the committee did not even seriously consider moving that threshold for receipt of an immediate annuity to a later point. There is nothing magic in 20 years other than it has been there for a long time—but not always. Service members have been eligible to retire as early as 15 years of service during certain periods in the past and have been required to remain until 40 years of service at other times. It is interesting to note that, in 1861, officers could voluntarily retire, at the discretion of the President, only after 40 years of service. This occurred at a time when the demands of military service were arguably more substantial than today. Twenty years of service only happens to be the threshold at the current time.

I believe the time has come to change the threshold in response to the needs of the future. Why should the most experienced segment of the force, the segment with the most training, the broadest range of backgrounds, the most education—acquired at Government expense—be provided an incentive to leave the military service at the peak of their career? That is exactly what the current system allows.

Personally, I would like to see a magic number imposed that would restrict the point in time when a service member could first receive an immediate annuity. The magic number could be varied to respond to the needs of the military service. Under such a system, when the combination of the service member's age and years of service reached the magic number, the member could receive retired pay.

For example, say the magic number were set at 70. A service member with 20 years of service would be able to retire with an immediate annuity at age 50—early by almost any standard in the public or private sector. If the member were not age 50 when he completed 20 years of service, he would have a very significant incentive to stay on active duty until he reached 50. This is the very incentive we need.

A magic number of 70 may not always be the right number; it may not be the right number to start with now, for example. If that turns out to be the case, the number could be set or changed to respond to changing circumstances—just as the threshold has changed in the past—without changing the other characteristics of the military retirement system, such as the formula and the averaging period.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to see the change in the military retirement system we make today be the final structural change that needs to be considered by the Congress for many years. Unfortunately, I believe that the attacks on the military retirement system will continue because we will not have used this opportunity to put the issue to rest in our minds or in the minds of our constituents. Such attacks can only continue to raise uncertainties in the minds of current service members even though the changes would be unlikely to apply to them.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HUTTO].

Mr. HUTTO. Mr. Chairman, I would like to enter into a dialog, if I may, about Coast Guard funding.

Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman would agree with me that the administration has been gung ho in defense funding, and we have made some great strides in modernizing our forces and doing something for our defense in recent years, but it has been just to the contrary on the Coast Guard. The Coast Guard has been hurting, really, as far as its funding is concerned.

When we took up the unauthorized appropriations in our committee and I went down the list, I did not see the $235 million that had been appropriated for the Coast Guard that was not authorized. Perhaps it was there and I missed it.

Of course, the Coast Guard has been very hurt in recent years, and particularly in this year. I know we are trying to recover some of that, the Gramm-Rudman cut for fiscal year 1986.

But there is $235 million that the Coast Guard needs for procurement of vessels, aircraft, and equipment to be acquired by the Navy to augment the Coast Guard inventory and their coastal defense augmentation program.

Mr. Chairman, I realize that we are trying to hold this, and the gentleman is fighting amendments to add money, but I do think it is very important for the Coast Guard.

I would like to ask the gentleman and Mr. DICKINSON if, when they get into conference with the Senate, and I understand it is in their Senate bill, that they would look favorably toward possibly receding and providing the Coast Guard, because with the drug trafficking and the enforcement that the Coast Guard needs to do, they need this procurement to carry out their job. So I would appreciate it very much of the gentleman would look favorably toward that.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. HUTTO. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, let me respond to the gentleman from Florida by saying that I very much understand the concern of the gentleman, and especially the part of the country that the gentleman represents, about the problem of the Coast Guard getting adequate funding for the drug smuggling issue. I am very sympathetic to the problem, and I believe that the gentleman in the well is making a very, very good case, as the gentleman has done in the committee and as the gentleman has done before the committee many times before, on the need for an adequate Coast Guard.

The gentleman in the well must realize that the chairman is in a difficult position, because I think it is important not to have any amendments to this bill. If the Chair were to start to talk about some amendments, we would have amendments coming at us every which way.

But I did check with the staff. The gentleman in the well is correct. It is in the Senate bill, as we understand it. Therefore, I would like to say that we would be very sympathetic to the gentleman's concerns when we get to conference, if that would help the gentleman in this issue.

Mr. HERTEL of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUTTO. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HERTEL of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the gentleman from Florida for bringing this to the attention once again to the Committee on Armed Services.

Mr. TRAXLER, the gentleman presiding over the Committee today, and Mr. DAVIS, also from the State of Michigan, have been very concerned about this and have been fighting that battle with the gentleman from Florida and myself. So we are so very happy to hear the chairman of the Armed Services Committee today say that they would be very interested in agreeing with the Senate on this money.

As the gentleman from Florida has pointed out, while the other services have gotten great increases over the last 5 years, the Coast Guard has been virtually frozen, and this has really made it much more difficult for them to do the important duties that no one else can replace them in for our States and the people of our country. So I commend the gentleman.

I understand that procedurally the chairman wants to keep the bill on one subject, but that we can use the Senate amendment and accept that as the vehicle to get these needed funds. I think that is an excellent understanding today.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUTTO. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, this is a matter of legitimate concern. I realize that the Coast Guard is being called on to perform more services in drug interdiction, the smuggling of aliens, and so forth, than it has in the past.

But I think one of the dilemmas that our committee is faced with is that historically we do not have jurisdiction over the Coast Guard. That belongs to the Department of Transportation. That is where their funding normally comes from. It is to the Department of Transportation and that bill dealing with the Coast Guard that, under normal circumstances, a raise for the Coast Guard should be coming. That is their child. They look after it.

As I understand it, the other body added this money, an unauthorized appropriation, getting back to the point that I made before that they do not care what we do over here. They are king over there. They are going to put what they want to in there and leave out what they want without any regard to the authorization process.

So it does leave us with a dilemma. It is something that we should be sympathetic to. It is an irregular procedure.

I support the chairman of the full committee when the gentleman says if we make this exception, add this amendment, then where do we stop. There would be another good amendment coming and we ought to consider it. And then there is a great amendment that ought to be considered. At the same time, we are trying to find enough money so that we can keep the Gramm-Rudman sequester from being triggered in.

So perhaps when we get into conference with the other body, we can work on some accommodation. But speaking for this Member, I do not want to mislead anyone to feel that I am saying, yes, I for one am going to support it if it got to conference, because there are many other things that are going to be considered, as the gentleman knows having sat through conferences. I am just saying that I am sympathetic with the purpose. I do not like the procedure by which it got here. I think we are abrogating the House rules, and if we continue in this vein, I think we might as well do away with the Armed Services Committee and just let the Appropriations Committee do it all.

Mr. HUTTO. Mr. Chairman, I certainly understand what the gentleman is saying.

However, I would like to say that this money was appropriated through the Defense Appropriations and the House Appropriations Committee. They also saw fit to do that.

Mr. CALLAHAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUTTO. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. CALLAHAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman wholeheartedly on the gentleman's request to the members of the conference committee that indeed we certainly ought to give the consideration to the $235 million to the Coast Guard.

We can stand here all afternoon and talk about the merits of our basic defense system, which is the U.S. Coast Guard.

I agree also with the gentleman from Alabama with respect to jurisdiction. But I might also add that this is the only train leaving the station at this point. If indeed we are going to do anything favorable for the Coast Guard in this respect, this is the time. And I would respectfully request and echo the sentiments of the gentleman from Florida in requesting that we recede to the demands of the Senate on this particular issue.

□ 1600

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUTTO. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ASPIN. I would like to point out that we are, in fact, doing some things for the Coast Guard in this bill. It is not that we have not done anything.

Mr. HUTTO. I understand.

Mr. ASPIN. The Appropriations Committee in the House appropriated $100 million for operating expenses, and we do have that covered.

We also have allowed to have covered another $140 million for transfers for procurement.

We have already got $240 million in what we are proposing before the Congress today in additional money for the Coast Guard. What the gentleman in the well is talking about is an additional $235 on top of the original $240.

So we are doing something. It is not that we have ignored the problem. It is just that the gentleman in the well thinks we ought to do more. As I say, we will take a very close took at it in conference. As I told the gentleman from Florida, I am essentially sympathetic with his views.

Mr. HUTTO. I appreciate that very much.

Mr. Chairman, I certainly agree with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DICKINSON] in that the Transportation Department has the Coast Guard under its wing, but the administration does not request the funding they need, and they have to fight every year to try to get the basic needs for operation, and none for procurement.

So I appreciate the comments of the chairman and the others who have entered into this discussion, and I hope you will look favorably on helping us out in the conference.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, I oppose passage of this legislation, H.R. 4420, in its current form, although I do support many of the military retirement reforms it would enact. However, the bill would authorize the military to perform massive, mandatory testing of service personnel for HTLV–III antibody, regarding AIDS. This policy is not justified on either medical or military grounds.

The Food and Drug Administration has licensed the HTLV–III test only for the purpose of screening blood and plasma, not for evaluation of a person's health status. In fact, the manufacturers of the test have labeled it with that specific limitation, and including the following:

It is inappropriate to use this test as a screen for AIDS or as a screen for members of groups at risk for AIDS in the general population. The presence of HTLV-III antibody is not a diagnosis of AIDS.

And in addition, the HTLV–III testing will also not serve the purposes of the military for another reason stated on its labeling, that "a negative test result does not exclude the possibility of exposure to or infection with HTLV–III." Thus, persons with AIDS or at risk may be given incorrect medical information, based on this misuse of the test.

In the several years since this epidemic came to light, it has been well established that AIDS is not transmitted by casual contact, and thus presents no risk to coworkers because of the presence of a person with AIDS. Consequently, the Centers for Disease Control have never recommended mandatory HTLV–III testing for the general population, or the military.

Unfortunately, the test will likely be used to attempt to identify members of at-risk groups, so that they can be denied entry or be removed from the military will less than honorable discharges. Because of the uncertainties of the test, there is no doubt that this will not only discriminate against persons with AIDS, but those incorrectly diagnosed at risk.

While it is true that the military, and all of our society, face a serious threat from this killer disease, the military's proposed test will provide only a false sense of security, and fail to serve medical need.

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time on this side, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time on this side, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute now printed in the reported bill shall be considered by titles as an original bill for the purpose of amendment, and each title shall be considered as having been read.

The Clerk will designate section 1.

The text of section 1 is as follows:

H.R. 4420

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any amendments to section 1?

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I really feel I should speak about this legislation. H.R. 4420 is a measure which tries to balance the budget on the backs of our Nation's career military men and women. This bill would reduce for future newcomers to the military the existing retirement benefits available to military personnel. It is an unwise bill from the standpoint of our national defense.

I oppose this bill because it does two very unfortunate things. First, it discourages bringing to the forces men and women for a career in the U.S. military.

Second, it destroys the device now available to keep the military both young and able.

The existing law allows those with two decades of service to be eliminated competitively, in order to make deserved promotions available for the third decade in a timely manner.

This new legislation does not allow this process. We cannot have military services with an overgenerous number of generals and admirals.

I asked Admiral Watkins, the Chief of Naval Operations, what he felt about this legislation. He replied in a letter that says, and I quote:

Those who don't understand that retirement is one part of a complex compensation system won't understand that changing one part of that system can have a major impact. Deferred compensation is a major part of civilian plans. Certainly, those who deal in civilian salary and retirement programs would realize that a major change to either salary or retirement, or perhaps to other important parts of their benefit package, would make continued employment with the company either more—or less attractive. . . .

The question those who would change the system must ask themselves is equally basic. Are they willing to add compensation in some other area to offset the loss in retirement? If the answer is yes, we should embark on the work necessary to determine how best to do it. If the answer is no, we have another problem. How shall we deal with smaller numbers of individuals willing to volunteer for military service, and, of much more importance at this juncture, can we provide adequate manpower to achieve needed readiness levels with reduced numbers of career personnel?

You will note that Admiral Watkins feels that if revisions are to be undertaken, we must have a thoughtful, careful approach to determine the impact on retention and recruiting. Cutting retirement without considering any corresponding increase in other compensation will inevitably result in less people joining the military, less people staying in for a career, and less able people staying in.

A young man or woman with a family and 6 years of service, who has just been transferred to a remote base away from all civilian comforts, will obviously be more willing to make sacrifices if he can see a light at the end of 20 years service than if that light has been dimmed.

If adequate pensions are such an evil thing, why do we have similar retirement systems for firefighters and police officers? These occupations require youth and physical vigor and demand a certain degree of personal sacrifice. The analogy is not complete, though, because a person in the military is put in greater danger of injury or death, and is expected to function under very dangerous and difficult circumstances, including taking the lives of the enemy.

It seems to me this is just another example of the sad way the military is too often treated and looked at in our country. We are safe, free, and secure because the Armed Forces are eternally vigilant.

Watching our treatment of these fine individuals brings to mind the following lines penned by Rudyard Kipling, who expresses his thoughts far better than I:

For it's Tommy this, an' Tommy that, an' "Chuck him out, the brute!"
But it's "Saviour of 'is country" when the guns begin to shoot;

We can do far better than shouting "Chuck him out, the brute!" and I urge you to reconsider this issue and not vote for this legislation.

In essence this legislation is about fairness and leadership. By cutting the available pension to our military men and women, we ask them to once again help bear the burden for the country's well-being. After 20 years of military service, I believe they have paid their fair share.

This bill also deals with the important issue of leadership in our armed services. With constant advances in technology we need bright young officers and enlisted men. By reducing pensions we reduce the incentive for good men and women to choose the military as a career. The bill is faulted. We should look at the issue again for another solution.

Mr. Chairman, I would just like to conclude my remarks by saying that I feel that this will discourage people from wanting to come into the service, and I think it gets away from the device of using the 20-year period as a time to see what people should be advanced and what people should not be advanced.

I think a very real loss will occur to us from this legislation. I think it is an unwise thing to do it this way, and I think we could have done it—if we had to do it—in a better way. I suggested a better way in subcommittee, which was, in my opinion, to give some sort of additional benefit at the end of 20 years to encourage people to get out for that reason, if that is what you want to do, to encourage them to get out.

The present system is a good system. It has worked a long time. It has brought us good personnel into the military, and I think it is one that should not be ended.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any amendments to section 1?

The Clerk will designate title I.

The text of title I is as follows:

TITLE I—RETIREMENT PROGRAM CHANGES

SEC. 101. RETIRED PAY MULTIPLIER.

Chapter 71 (relating to computation of retired pay) is amended by adding at the end the following new section:

"§ 1409. Retired pay multiplier

"(a) RETIRED PAY MULTIPLIER FOR REGULAR-SERVICE NONDISABILITY RETIREMENT.—In computing—

"(1) the retired pay of a member who is a regular-service nondisability retiree; or

"(2) the retainer pay of a member who is transferred to the Fleet Reserve or the Fleet Marine Corps Reserve, the retired pay multiplier or retainer pay multiplier is the percentage determined under subsection (b).

"(b) PERCENTAGE.—

"(1) GENERAL RULE.—Subject to paragraphs (2) and (3), the percentage to be used under subsection (a) is the product (stated as a percentage) of—

"(A) 2½, and

"(B) the member's years of creditable service.

"(2) REDUCTION FOR RETIREMENT BY NEW-RETIREMENT MEMBERS WITH LESS THAN 30 YEARS OF SERVICE.—In the case of a member who first became a member of a uniformed service on or after the date of the enactment of the Military Retirement Reform Act of 1986 and who has less than 30 years of creditable service, the percentage determined under paragraph (1) shall be reduced by—

"(A) 1 percentage point for each full year that the member's years of creditable service are less than 30; and

"(B) 1/12 of 1 percentage point for each month (or fractional part thereof) by which the member's years of creditable service (after counting all full years of such service) are less than a full year.

"(3) 75 PERCENT LIMIT.—In the case of a member with more than 30 years of creditable service, the percentage to be used under subsection (a) is 75 percent.

"(c) DEFINITIONS.—In this section:

"(1) REGULAR-SERVICE NONDISABILITY RETIREE.— 'Regular-service nondisability retiree' means a member of a uniformed service who is retired as a member under any provision of law other than—

"(A) chapter 61 of this title (relating to retirement or separation for physical disability); or

"(B) chapter 67 of this title (relating to retirement for non-regular service).

"(2) YEARS OF CREDITABLE SERVICE.—'Years of creditable service' means the number of years of service creditable to a member in computing the member's retired or retainer pay (including 1/12 of a year for each full month of service that is in addition to the number of full years of service of the member).".

SEC. 102. RETIRED PAY BASE FOR COMPUTATION OF RETIRED PAY.

(a) TRANSFER OF SECTION 1406.—Section 1406 is transferred to the end of chapter 67, redesignated as section 1338, and amended—

(1) by designating the first sentence as subsection (a) and striking out "chapter 67 of this title" both places it appears therein and inserting in lieu thereof "this chapter"; and

(2) by designating the second sentence as subsection (b).

(b) CONSOLIDATION OF RETIRED PAY BASE STATUTES AND ESTABLISHMENT OF GRADUATED HIGH-PERIOD AVERAGE FOR NEW ENTRANTS.—Chapter 71 (relating to the computation of retired pay) is amended by striking out section 1407 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"§ 1406. Retired pay base for members who first became members before September 8, 1980

"(a) USE OF RETIRED PAY BASE IN COMPUTING RETIRED PAY.—

"(1) GENERAL RULE.—The retired pay or retainer pay of any person entitled to that pay who first became a member of a uniformed service before September 8, 1980, is computed using the retired pay base or retainer pay base determined under this section.

"(2) EXCEPTION FOR RECOMPUTATION.—Recomputation of retired or retainer pay to reflect later active duty is provided for under section 1402 of this title without reference to a retired pay base or retainer pay base.

"(b) RETIREMENT UNDER SUBTITLE A.—

"(1) DISABILITY RETIREMENT.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—In the case of a member of a uniformed service who is entitled to retired pay under chapter 61 of this title (relating to retirement or separation for physical disability), the retired pay base is the monthly basic pay of the grade—

"(i) to which the member is entitled under section 1372 of this title; or

"(ii) to which the member was entitled on the day before the member's retirement or placement on the temporary disability retired list, whichever is higher.

"(B) RATE OF BASIC PAY TO BE USED.—The rate of basic pay to be used under subparagraph (A) is the rate applicable to the grade determined under that subparagraph on the date of the member's retirement or the date when the member's name was placed on the temporary disability retired list, as the case may be.

"(2) RETIREMENT FOR NON-REGULAR SERVICE.—In the case of a person who is entitled to retired pay under section 1331 of this title (relating to retired pay for non-regular service), the retired pay base is the monthly basic pay (computed at the rates applicable on the date when retired pay is granted) of the highest grade held satisfactorily by the person at any time in the armed forces.

"(3) WARRANT OFFICERS.—In the case of a member who is retired under section 564, 1263, 1293, or 1305 of this title, the retired pay base is—

"(A) the monthly basic pay to which the member would have been entitled if he had served on active duty in his retired grade on the day before retirement; or

"(B) if the pay of that grade is less than the pay of any warrant officer grade satisfactorily held by the member on active duty, the monthly basic pay of that warrant officer grade.

"(4) INVOLUNTARY RETIREMENT OF OFFICERS FOR SERVICE OR AGE.—

"(A) GENERAL RULE.—In the case of an officer who is retired under section 633, 634, 635, 636, or 1251 of this title, the retired pay base is the monthly basic pay (computed at the rates applicable on the date of retirement) of the officer's retired grade.

"(B) SPECIAL RULE FOR CERTAIN PERMANENT PROFESSORS AT THE MILITARY AND AIR FORCE ACADEMIES.—The retired pay base of an officer whose retired grade is determined under section 3962(b) or 8962(b) of this title shall be determined as if that section did not apply.

"(c) VOLUNTARY RETIREMENT FOR MEMBERS OF THE ARMY.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—In the case of a member whose retired pay is computed under section 3991 of this title or who is entitled to retired pay computed under section 3992 of this title, the retired pay base is determined in accordance with the following table.

"For a member entitled to retired pay under section:	The retired pay base is:
3911 3918 3920 3924	Monthly basic pay of member's retired grade.[1]
3914 3917	Monthly basic pay to which member was entitled on day before he retired.
3992	Monthly basic pay of grade to which member is advanced on retired list.

[1] For the purposes of this subsection, determine member's retired grade as if section 3962(b) did not apply.

"(2) RATE OF BASIC PAY TO BE USED.—The rate of basic pay to be used under paragraph (1) is the rate applicable on the date of the member's retirement.

"(d) RETIREMENT FOR MEMBERS OF THE NAVY AND MARINE CORPS.—In the case of a member whose retired pay is computed under section 6328 of this title, who is advanced on the retired list under section 6151 of this title, or who is entitled to retainer pay under section 6330 of this title, the retired pay base or retainer pay base is determined in accordance with the following table.

"For a member entitled to retired or retainer pay under section:	The retired pay base or retainer pay base is:
6323 6325(a) 6383	Basic pay of the grade in which the member retired.[1]
6325(b)	Basic pay of the grade the officer would hold if he had not received an appointment described in section 6325(b).
6326	Basic pay of the pay grade in which the member was serving on the day before retirement.
6330	Basic pay that the member received at the time of transfer to the Fleet Reserve or Fleet Marine Corps Reserve.
6151	Basic pay of the grade to which the member is advanced under section 6151.

[1] If the rate specified is less than the pay of any warrant officer grade satisfactorily held by the member on active duty, use the monthly basic pay of that warrant officer grade.

"(e) VOLUNTARY RETIREMENT FOR MEMBERS OF THE AIR FORCE.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—In the case of a member whose retired pay is computed under section 8991 of this title or who is entitled to retired pay computed under section 8992 of this title, the retired pay base is determined in accordance with the following table.

"For a member entitled to retired pay under section:	The retired pay base is:
8911 8918 8920 8924	Monthly basic pay of member's retired grade.[1]
8914 8917	Monthly basic pay to which member was entitled on day before he retired.
8992	Monthly basic pay of grade to which member is advanced on retired list.

[1] For the purposes of this subsection, determine member's retired grade as if section 8962(b) did not apply.

"(2) RATE OF BASIC PAY TO BE USED.—The rate of basic pay to be used under paragraph (1) is the rate applicable on the date of the member's retirement.

"(f) COAST GUARD.—In the case of a member who is retired under any section of title 14, the member's retired pay is computed under section 423(a) of title 14 in the manner provided in that section.

"(g) COMMISSIONED CORPS OF NATIONAL OCEANIC AND ATMOSPHERIC ADMINISTRATION.—In the case of an officer whose retired pay is computed under section 16 of the Coast and Geodetic Survey Commissioned Officers' Act of 1948 (33 U.S.C. 853o), the retired pay base is the basic pay of the rank with which the officer retired.

"(h) COMMISSIONED CORPS OF PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.—In the case of an officer who is retired under section 210(g) or 211(a) of the Public Health Service Act (42 U.S.C. 211(g), 212(a)), the retired pay base is determined as follows:

"(1) MANDATORY RETIREMENT.—If the officer is retired under section 210(g) of such Act, the retired pay base is the basic pay of the permanent grade held by the officer at the time of retirement.

"(2) VOLUNTARY RETIREMENT.—If the officer is retired under section 211(a) of such Act, the retired pay base is the basic pay of the highest grade held by the officer and in which, in the case of a temporary promotion to such grade, the officer has performed active duty for not less than six months.

"(i) SPECIAL RULE FOR FORMER CHIEFS OF SERVICE AND SENIOR ENLISTED MEMBERS.—For the purposes of subsections (b) through (e):

"(1) FORMER CHIEFS OF SERVICE.—

"(A) GENERAL RULE.—In determining the rate of basic pay to apply in the determination of the retired pay base of an officer who served in a covered position, the highest rate of basic pay applicable to the officer while serving in that position shall be used, if that rate is higher than the rate otherwise authorized by this section.

"(B) COVERED POSITION DEFINED.—In this paragraph, 'covered position' means any of the following:

"(i) Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

"(ii) Chief of Staff of the Army.

"(iii) Chief of Naval Operations.

"(iv) Chief of Staff of the Air Force.

"(v) Commandant of the Marine Corps.

"(vi) Commandant of the Coast Guard.

"(2) SENIOR ENLISTED MEMBERS.—

"(A) GENERAL RULE.—In determining the rate of basic pay to apply in the determination of the retired pay base of an enlisted member who served in a covered position, the highest rate of basic pay applicable to the member while serving in that position shall be used, if that rate is higher than the rate otherwise authorized by this section.

"(B) COVERED POSITION DEFINED.—In this paragraph, 'covered position' means any of the following:

"(i) Sergeant Major of the Army.

"(ii) Master Chief Petty Officer of the Navy.

"(iii) Chief Master Sergeant of the Air Force.

"(iv) Sergeant Major of the Marine Corps.

"(V) Master Chief Petty Officer of the Coast Guard.

"§ 1407. Retired pay base for members who first became members after September 7, 1980

"(a) USE OF RETIRED PAY BASE IN COMPUTING RETIRED PAY.—The retired pay or retainer pay of any person entitled to that pay who first became a member of a uniformed service after September 7, 1980, is computed using the retired pay base or retainer pay base determined under this section.

"(b) GRADUATED HIGH-PERIOD AVERAGE.—The retired pay base or retainer pay base of a member under this section is the member's high-period average determined under subsection (c).

"(c) COMPUTATION OF HIGH-PERIOD AVERAGE.—

"(1) FORMULA.—For the purposes of this section, a member's high-period average is the amount equal to—

"(A) the total amount of monthly basic pay to which the member was entitled for the member's countable high-pay months, divided by

"(B) the number of such countable high-pay months.

"(2) NUMBER OF MONTHS TO BE USED IN COMPUTATION.—

"(A) GENERAL RULE.—Subject to subparagraph (B) and to subsection (e), the number of countable high-pay months of a member is 36.

"(B) INCREASE IN NUMBER OF COUNTABLE MONTHS FOR NEW-RETIREMENT MEMBERS WITH LESS THAN 30 YEARS OF SERVICE.—In the case of a new-retirement member who has less than 30 years of creditable service, the number of countable high-pay months shall be increased by one for each period of five months (including any portion thereof) that the member's years of creditable service are less than 30.

"(3) COUNTABLE HIGH-PAY MONTHS DEFINED.—

"(A) GENERAL RULE.—A member's countable high-pay months are those months (the number of which is determined under paragraph (2)) out of all the months of active duty served by the member as a member of a uniformed service for which the monthly basic pay to which the member was entitled was the highest.

"(B) RULE FOR NON-REGULAR SERVICE RETIREES.—In the case of a member who is entitled to retired pay under section 1204 or 1205 of this title or under chapter 67 of this title, a member's countable high-pay months are those months (the number of which is determined under paragraph (2) or subsection (e)) out of all the months the member was a member of a uniformed service before becoming entitled to retired pay for which the monthly basic pay to which the member would have been entitled had he served on active duty during those months was the highest.

"(d) LIMITATION FOR ENLISTED MEMBERS RETIRING WITH LESS THAN 30 YEARS' SERVICE.—In the case of a member who is retired under section 3914 or 8914 of this title or who is transferred to the Fleet Reserve or Fleet Marine Corps Reserve under section 6330 of this title, the member's high-period average shall be computed using only rates of basic pay applicable to months of active duty of the member as an enlisted member.

"(e) SPECIAL RULES FOR SHORT-TERM DISABILITY RETIREES.—

"(1) MEMBERS ENTITLED TO RETIRED PAY UNDER SECTION 1201 OR 1202.—IN THE CASE OF A MEMBER WHO—

"(A) is entitled to retired pay under section 1201 or 1202 of this title; and

"(B) served on active duty—

"(i) for less than 36 months, in the case of a member who is subject to this section but is not a new retirement member; or

"(ii) for less than 60 months, in the case of a new retirement member,

the number of the member's countable high-pay months (notwithstanding subsection (c)(2)) is the number of months (including any fraction thereof) that the member served on active duty.

"(2) MEMBERS ENTITLED TO RETIRED PAY UNDER SECTION 1204 OR 1205.—In the case of a member who—

"(A) is entitled to retired pay under section 1204 or 1205 of this title; and

"(B) was a member of a uniformed service—

"(i) for less than 36 months, in the case of a member who is subject to this section but is not a new retirement member; or

"(ii) for less than 60 months, in the case of a new retirement member,

the number of the member's countable high-pay months (notwithstanding subsection (c)(2)) is the number of months (including any fraction thereof) that the member was such a member.

"(3) MAXIMUM NUMBER OF MONTHS FOR NEW RETIREMENT MEMBERS.—In the case of a new retirement member who is entitled to retired pay under chapter 61 of this title (relating to retirement or separation for physical disability) and who was a member for more than 60 months before becoming entitled to such pay, the number of countable high-pay months may not exceed 60.

"(f) SPECIAL RULE FOR MEMBERS RETIRING WITH NON-REGULAR SERVICE.—

"(1) DISABILITY RETIREMENT.—In the case of a member of a uniformed service who is entitled to retired pay under section 1204 or 1205 of this title (relating to members on active duty for 30 days or less), the high-period average is determined as if the member served on active duty and was entitled to basic pay for the member's countable high-pay months.

"(2) CHAPTER 67 RETIREMENT.—In the case of a person who is entitled to retired pay under section 1331 of this title (relating to retired pay for non-regular service), the person's high-period average is determined as if the person served on active duty and was entitled to basic pay for the person's countable high-pay months.

"(g) DEFINITIONS.—In this section:

"(1) YEARS OF CREDITABLE SERVICE.—'Years of creditable service' means the number of years of service creditable to a member in computing the member's retired or retainer pay (including 1/12 of a year for each full month of service that is in addition to the number of full years of service of the member).

"(2) NEW-RETIREMENT MEMBER.—'New-retirement member' means a member of a uniformed service who first became a member of a uniformed service on or after the date of the enactment of the Military Retirement Reform Act of 1986.".

(c) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

(1) Sections 5083 and 5201(c) are each amended by striking out the last sentence.

(2) Section 6325(c) is amended by striking out the second sentence.

SEC. 103. RULES OF CONSTRUCTION FOR PURPOSES OF COMPUTING OF RETIRED PAY.

Chapter 71 (relating to computation of retired pay) is amended by adding after section 1409 (as added by section 101) the following new sections:

"§ 1410. Rules of construction

"(a) CONSTRUCTION OF 'FIRST BECAME A MEMBER'.—For the purpose of this chapter and other provisions of law providing for computation of retired or retainer pay of members of the uniformed services, a person shall be considered to first become a member of a uniformed service on the first date the person is enlisted, inducted, or appointed in a uniformed service.

"(b) REFERENCES IN TABLES.—Section references in tables in this chapter are to sections of this title.

"§ 1411. Rounding to next lower dollar

"Amounts computed under this chapter, if not a multiple of $1, shall be rounded to the next lower multiple of $1.".

SEC. 104. YEARS OF SERVICE FOR COMPUTING RETIRED PAY.

Section 1405 (relating to determination of years of service for computation of retired pay) is amended—

(1) by inserting "(a) IN GENERAL.—" before "For the purposes of";

(2) by striking out "section 1401" and all that follows through "of this title" and inserting in lieu thereof "the computation of the years of service of a member of the armed forces under a provision of this title providing for such computation to be made under this section"; and

(3) by adding at the end the following:

"(b) FRACTIONAL YEARS OF SERVICE.—In determining a member's years of service under subsection (a)—

"(1) each full month of service that is in addition to the number of full years of service creditable to the member shall be credited as 1/12 of a year; and

"(2) any remaining fractional part of a month shall be disregarded.".

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any amendments to title I?

There being no amendments to title I, the Clerk will designate title II.

The text of title II is as follows:

SEC. 205. MEMBERS OF THE COAST GUARD.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 423 of title 14, United States Code (relating to the computation of retired pay), is amended to read as follows:

"§ 423. Computation of retired pay

"(a)(1) The retired pay of a member who first became a member of a uniformed service (as defined in section 101 of title 10) before September 8, 1980, is determined by multiplying—

"(A) the sum of—

"(i) the basic pay of the member's retired grade or rate, and

"(ii) all permanent additions thereto including longevity credit to which the member was entitled at the time of retirement; and

"(B) the retired pay multiplier determined under section 1409 of title 10 for the number of years of service that may be credited to the member under section 1405 of such title.

"(2) In the case of an officer who served as Commandant of the Coast Guard, retired pay under paragraph (1) shall be computed at the highest rate of basic pay applicable to the officer while so serving.

"(3) In the case of an enlisted member who served as the master chief petty officer of the Coast Guard, retired pay under paragraph (1) shall be computed at the highest rate of basic pay to which the member was entitled while so serving, if that basic pay is greater than the basic pay of the grade or rate to which the member is otherwise entitled at the time of retirement.

"(4) In the case of an officer whose retired pay is computed on the pay of a grade for which basic pay is not based upon years of service, retired pay under paragraph (1) shall be computed on the basis of the number of years of service for which the officer would be entitled to credit in the computation of pay on the active list had the officer been serving in the grade of captain at the time of retirement.

"(b) The retired pay of a member who first became a member of a uniformed service (as defined in section 101 of title 10) on or after September 8, 1980, is determined by multiplying—

"(1) the retired pay base determined under section 1407 of title 10; and

"(2) the retired pay multiplier determined under section 1409 of title 10 for the number of years of service that may be credited to the member under section 1405 of such title.

"(c)(1) In computing for the purpose of subsection (a) or (b) the number of years of service that may be credited to a member under section 1405 of title 10—

"(A) each full month of service that is in addition to the number of full years of service creditable to the member shall be counted as 1/12 of a year; and

"(B) any remaining fractional part of a month shall be disregarded.

"(2) Retired pay computed under this section, if not a multiple of $1, shall be rounded to the next lower multiple of $1.".

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

(1) Section 46 of such title is amended by striking out "and retired pay computed at the highest rates of basic pay applicable to him while he served as Commandant" in subsections (a), (b), and (c).

(2) Section 47 of such title is amended—

(A) by striking out "and retired pay" in subsections (b) and (c); and

(B) by striking out "and with the retired pay of that grade" in subsection (d).

(3) Section 51 of such title is amended—

(A) by striking out "and retired pay" in subsections (a) and (b); and

(B) by striking out "and with the retired pay of that grade" in subsection (c).

(4) Section 288(b) of such title is amended by striking out "Except as provided in section 423(b) of this title, the retired pay" and inserting in lieu thereof "Retired pay computed under section 423(a) of this title".

(5) Sections 291, 292, and 293 of such title are amended by striking out ", with retired pay of the grade with which retired".

(6) Section 327(b)(1) of such title is amended by striking out ", and with the pay".

(7) Section 334 of such title is amended—

(A) by striking out ", with retired pay of the grade with which retired" in subsections (a) and (b); and

(B) by striking out the second sentence of subsection (b).

(8) Sections 353, 354, 355, and 362 of such title are amended by striking out ", with retired pay of the grade or rating with which retired".

(9) Section 357 is amended—

(A) by striking out "the retired pay of the grade or rating with which retired" in subsection (b) and inserting in lieu thereof "retired pay"; and

(B) by striking out "by an amount" and all that follows in subsection (c) and inserting in lieu thereof "by an amount equal to 10 percent of—

"(1) the active-duty pay and permanent additions thereto of the grade or rating with which retired, in the case of a member whose retired pay is computed under section 423(a) of this title; or

"(2) the member's retired pay base under section 1407 of title 10, in the case of a member whose retired pay is computed under section 423(b) of this title.".

(10) Sections 421 and 422 of such title are amended by striking out "rating" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "rate".

(11) Section 424 of such title is amended to read as follows:

"§ 424. Limitations on retirement and retired pay

"(a) The provisions of any section of this title shall not be construed so as to prevent any member from being placed on the retired list with the highest grade or rate and the highest retired pay to which the member may be entitled under the provisions of any other section of this title or under any other law.

"(b) In no case may the retired pay of a member exceed 75 percent of (1) the sum of the active-duty pay and all permanent additions thereto (including longevity credit to which the member is entitled) of the grade or rate on which the member's pay is computed, or (2) the retired pay base determined under section 1407 of title 10, as appropriate.".

SEC. 206. COMMISSIONED OFFICERS OF THE NATIONAL OCEANIC AND ATMOSPHERIC ADMINISTRATION.

Section 16 of the Coast and Geodetic Survey Commissioned Officers Act of 1948 (33 U.S.C. 853o) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 16. (a) Each commissioned officer on the retired list who first became a member of a uniformed service (as defined in section 101 of title 10, United States Code) before the date of the enactment of the Military Retirement Reform Act of 1986 shall receive retired pay at the rate determined by multiplying—

"(1) the retired pay base determined under section 1406(g) of title 10, United States Code; and

"(2) 2½ percent of the number of years of service that may be credited to the officer under section 1405 of such title as if the officer's service were service as a member of the Armed Forces.

The retired pay so computed may not exceed 75 percent of the retired pay base.

"(b) Each commissioned officer on the retired list who first became a member of a uniformed service (as defined in section 101 of title 10, United States Code) on or after the date of the enactment of the Military Retirement Reform Act of 1986 shall receive retired pay at the rate determined by multiplying—

"(1) the retired pay base determined under section 1407 of title 10, United States Code; and

"(2) the retired pay multiplier determined under section 1409 of such title for the number of years of service that may be credited to the officer under section 1405 of such title as if the officer's service were service as a member of the Armed Forces.

"(c)(1) In computing the number of years of service of an officer for the purposes of subsection (a)—

"(A) each full month of service that is in addition to the number of full years of service creditable to the officer shall be credited as $\frac{1}{12}$ of a year; and

"(B) any remaining fractional part of a month shall be disregarded.

"(2) Retired pay computed under this section, if not a multiple of $1, shall be rounded to the next lower multiple of $1.".

SEC. 207. COMMISSIONED OFFICERS OF THE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

(a) MANDATORY RETIREMENT.—Section 210(g)(3) of the Public Health Service Act (42 U.S.C. 211(g)(3)) is amended by striking out subparagraphs (A) and (B) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(A) in the case of an officer who first became a member of a uniformed service before the date of the enactment of the Military Retirement Reform Act of 1986, at the rate of 2½ percent of the retired pay base determined under section 1406(h) of title 10, United States Code, for each year, not in excess of 30, of his active commissioned service in the Service; or

"(B) in the case of an officer who first became a member of a uniformed service on or after the date of the enactment of the Military Retirement Reform Act of 1986, at the rate determined by multiplying—

"(i) the retired pay base determined under section 1407 of title 10, United States Code; and

"(ii) the retired pay multiplier determined under section 1409 of such title for the number of years of his active commissioned service in the Service.".

(b) VOLUNTARY RETIREMENT.—Section 211(a) of such Act (42 U.S.C. 212(a)) is amended—

(1) in paragraphs (4) and (5), by striking out "paragraph (6)" and inserting in lieu thereof "paragraphs (6) and (7)";

(2) in paragraph (6), by striking out "on or after the date of the enactment of the Department of Defense Authorization Act, 1981," and inserting in lieu thereof "during the period beginning on September 8, 1980, and ending on the date of the enactment of the Military Retirement Reform Act of 1986";

(C) by adding at the end the following:

"(2) In determining a member's eligibility for transfer to the Fleet Reserve or the Fleet Marine Corps Reserve under subsection (b)—

"(A) a completed minority enlistment of the member is counted as four years of active service, if creditable to the member for such purpose before December 31, 1977; and

"(B) an enlistment of the member terminated within three months before the end of the term of enlistment is counted as active service for the full term, if creditable to the member for such purpose before December 31, 1977.

"(3)(A) Subject to subparagraph (B), in determining a member's years of active service for the computation of retainer pay under subsection (c)—

"(i) a completed minority enlistment of the member is counted as four years of active service; and

"(ii) an enlistment of the member terminated within three months before the end of the term of enlistment is counted as active service for the full term.

"(B) In the case of a member who is transferred to the Fleet Reserve or the Fleet Marine Corps Reserve under this section after December 30, 1977, service attributable under subparagraph (A) to time which, after December 31, 1977, is not actually served by the member may not be counted.".

(2) REPEAL OF SOURCE LAW.—Section 8039 of the Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 1985 (as contained in section 101(h) of Public Law 98-473 (98 Stat. 1930)), is repealed.

(b) TERMINATION OF SIX-MONTH ROUNDING RULE.—

(1) GENERAL RULE.—Retired pay or retainer pay may not be paid to a covered member of the Armed Forces for any month in an amount that is greater than the amount otherwise determined to be payable after such reductions as may be necessary to reflect adjusting the computation of retired pay or retainer pay that includes credit for a part of a year of service to permit credit for a part of a year of service only for such month or months actually served.

(2) EXCEPTIONS.—The limitation in paragraph (1) does not apply to a member who before January 1, 1982—

(A) applied for retirement or transfer to the Fleet Reserve or Fleet Marine Corps Reserve;

(B) was being processed for retirement under the provisions of chapter 61 of title 10, United States Code, or who was on the temporary disability retired list and thereafter retired under the provisions of section 1210(c) or 1210(d) of such title; or

(C) was retired or in an inactive status and would have been eligible for retired pay under the provisions of chapter 67 of such title, but for the fact that the person was under 60 years of age.

(3) DEFINITION OF COVERED MEMBER.—For the purposes of this subsection, the term "covered member of the Armed Forces" means a member of the Armed Forces who became entitled to retired or retainer pay during the period beginning on January 1, 1982, and ending on September 30, 1983.

(4) REPEAL OF SOURCE LAW.—Section 8054 of the Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 1985 (as contained in section 101(h) of Public Law 98-473), is repealed.

(5) CROSS REFERENCE.—For the effective date of October 1, 1983, for provisions making permanent programmatic changes in law to accomplish the policy provided in such section 8054 (and prior provisions of law), see section 923(h) of the Department of Defense Authorization Act, 1984 (Public Law 98-94).

SEC. 306. REPEAL OF LIMITATION ON PAYMENTS TO ACCRUAL FUND FOR FISCAL YEAR 1986.

Section 666 of the Department of Defense Authorization Act, 1986 (Public Law 99-145; 99 Stat. 659), is repealed.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any amendments to title III?

There being no amendments to title III, the Clerk will designate title IV.

The text of title IV is as follows:

TITLE IV—FISCAL YEAR 1986 UNAUTHORIZED APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 401. PROHIBITION ON OBLIGATION OF UNAUTHORIZED FISCAL YEAR 1986 DEFENSE APPROPRIATIONS.

(a) PROHIBITION.—None of the amounts described in subsection (b), totaling $5,582,130,000, may be obligated or expended for any purpose except as authorized in section 402 or as authorized after the date of the enactment of this Act in a law other than an appropriation Act (including a continuing resolution).

(b) COVERED AMOUNTS.—The amounts referred to in subsection (a) are the amounts provided for programs, projects, and activities of the Department of Defense in fiscal year 1986 defense appropriations that are in excess of the amounts provided for such programs, projects, and activities in fiscal year 1986 defense authorizations.

(c) DEFINITIONS.—For the purposes of this title:

(1) FISCAL YEAR 1986 DEFENSE APPROPRIATIONS.—The term "fiscal year 1986 defense appropriations" means amounts appropriated or otherwise made available to the Department of Defense for fiscal year 1986 in the Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 1986 (as contained in section 101(b) of Public Law 99-190).

(2) FISCAL YEAR 1986 DEFENSE AUTHORIZATIONS.—The term "fiscal year 1986 defense authorizations" means amounts authorized to be appropriated for the Department of Defense for fiscal year 1986 in the Department of Defense Authorization Act, 1986 (Public Law 99-145), as set forth in such Act and in the joint explanatory statement of the committee of conference on the bill S. 1160 (99th Congress), printed in House Report 99-235.

SEC. 402. AUTHORIZATION OF OBLIGATION FOR CERTAIN UNAUTHORIZED APPROPRIATIONS.

(a) AMOUNT AVAILABLE FOR OBLIGATION.—Of the amounts described in section 401(b), $2,291,630,000 may be obligated or expended for programs, projects, and activities of the Department of Defense listed in subsection (b) (for which amounts were provided in fiscal year 1986 defense appropriations).

(b) SPECIFICATION OF PROGRAMS, PROJECTS, AND ACTIVITIES.—Programs, projects, and activities referred to in subsection (a) (and the total amount of fiscal year 1986 defense appropriations that may be obligated or expended for each such program, project, and activity) are as follows:

(1) ARMY PROCUREMENT.—

Mortar ammunition, $91,490,000, of which—

$30,800,000 is available only for 4.2-inch high-explosive cartridges;

$45,400,000 is available only for 81-millimeter for high-explosive United Kingdom round cartridges;

$2,300,000 is available only for 81-millimeter Imp 1/10 range training cartridges;

$7,100,000 is available only for 81-millimeter illuminating cartridges; and

$5,900,000 is available only for 81-millimeter smoke cartridges.

War reserve ammunition, $190,200,000.

Snap anti-jam equipment program, $14,650,000.

AFATADS, $24,320,000.

Boat, bridge erection program, $25,400,000.

Follow-on air defense equipment, $142,650,000 (subject to subsection (c)).

(2) NAVY PROCUREMENT.—

F-14A aircraft, $590,830,000.

P-3C aircraft modification, $361,110,000.

AN/SQR-17 acoustic processor, $21,340,000.

Battleship reactivation program, $466,380,000.

Cost growth for the MCM mine countermeasures ship program, $97,000,000.

MCM-1 mine countermeasures ship program, $189,010,000.

ARTB training ship (conventional) program, $174,100,000.

Service craft, $60,850,000.

Procurement, Marine Corps, general increase, $13,260,000.

(3) AIR FORCE PROCUREMENT.—

Air defense competition, $182,590,000.

AC-130H drug interdiction aircraft, $31,760,000.

(4) DEFENSE AGENCIES PROCUREMENT.—Other DIS equipment, $5,120,000.

(5) AIR FORCE RESERVE, PROCUREMENT.— C-130H aircraft, $144,120,000.

(6) RESEARCH, DEVELOPMENT, TEST, AND EVALUATION.—

DIVAD alternatives, Army, $38,520,000 (subject to subsection (c)).

Rolling air frame missile, Navy, $10,340,000.

Whitehall quick reaction surveillance system, Navy, $18,910,000.

(7) OPERATION AND MAINTENANCE, ARMY.—

Drug testing, $1,430,000.

AIDS testing, $40,510,000.

Medical enhancements, $19,020,000.

Medical readiness, $37,280,000.

DIVAD alternatives, Army, $4,560,000.

Readiness initiatives, $130,290,000.

(8) OPERATION AND MAINTENANCE, NAVY.—

Ready Reserve fleet dispersal, $3,420,000.

P3-A modifications, $2,850,000.

AIDS testing, $4,760,000.

Coast Guard reimbursement, $100,000,000.

(9) OPERATION AND MAINTENANCE, AIR FORCE.—

Medical readiness, $5,330,000.

AIDS testing, $4,760,000.

Classified project, $480,000.

(10) OPERATION AND MAINTENANCE, DEFENSE AGENCIES.—

Peer review, $7,130,000.

Quality assurance, $28,530,000.

Defense Agencies classified project, $1,200,000.

(11) OTHER OPERATION AND MAINTENANCE ACCOUNTS.—

Force structure initiative, Army Reserve, $6,610,000.

Roland missile maintenance, Army National Guard, $3,900,000.

AIDS testing, Army National Guard, $2,380,000.

Force structure initiative, Army National Guard, $3,900,000.

Environmental Projects, Army National Guard, $380,000.

Environmental restoration, $360,520,000.

ADP management fund, $100,000,000.

(c) PRIOR REPORT REQUIREMENTS FOR CERTAIN PROJECTS.—Fiscal year 1986 defense appropriations for programs, projects, and activities which under subsection (b) are made subject to this subsection may not be obligated or expended until the Secretary of Defense submits to the appropriate committees of Congress a report setting forth in detail the manner in which funds are proposed to be obligated or expended for such project.

(d) MODIFICATION OF FISCAL YEAR 1986 AUTHORIZATION FOR CERTAIN SHIPBUILDING PROGRAMS.—Notwithstanding the amounts specified in section 102(c) of the Department of

Defense Authorization Act, 1986 (Public Law 99-145; 99 Stat. 592)—

(1) the amount authorized to be appropriated for fiscal year 1986 for Shipbuilding and Conversion, Navy, is $10,703,750,000; and

(2) the amounts available for the following shipbuilding and conversion programs for fiscal year 1986 are as follows:

For the battleship reactivation program, $466,380,000.

For the MCM-1 mine countermeasures ship program, $189,010,000.

For cost growth for the MCM mine countermeasures ship program, $97,000,000.

For the ARTB nuclear training ship program, $174,100,000.

For service craft, $60,850,000.

(e) MODIFICATION OF FISCAL YEAR 1986 AUTHORIZATION FOR OTHER APPROPRIATION ACCOUNTS.—Notwithstanding the amounts specified in the Department of Defense Authorization Act, 1986 (Public Law 99-145; 99 Stat. 595), the amounts authorized to be appropriated for fiscal year 1986 for the following accounts are as follows:

(1) Air Force Reserve Procurement, $144,120,000.

(2) Environmental Restoration, Defense, $360,520,000.

(3) ADP Equipment Management Fund, $100,000,000.

(f) PROGRAM LIMITATIONS.—All limitations and requirements set forth in the Department of Defense Authorization Act, 1986 (and in the joint explanatory statement of the committee of conference on the bill S.1160 (99th Congress), printed in House Report 99-235), shall apply to the obligation of funds authorized by subsection (b) in the same manner as if the funds made available for obligation by such subsection had been authorized in such Act.

(g) TRANSFER AUTHORITY.—For the purposes of section 1401 the Department of Defense Authorization Act, 1986 (99 Stat. 742), authorizations in subsection (b) shall be deemed to have been made available to the Department of Defense in such Act.

SEC. 403. PROGRAMS FOR WHICH AMOUNTS ARE NOT AUTHORIZED FOR OBLIGATION.

Programs, projects, and activities of the Department of Defense for which amounts provided in fiscal year 1986 defense appropriations are subject to section 401 (other than those programs, projects, and activities described in section 402) are the following:

(1) ARMY PROCUREMENT.—

AH-1S attack helicopter (Cobra Tow).

Army Helicopter Improvement Program (AHIP).

Stinger missile program.

M577A2 Carrier, command post light, FT.

M113 Carrier, personnel, FT, ARM.

M88 recovery vehicles.

120-millimeter mortar.

AT-4 lightweight multipurpose system.

Chemical demilitarization program.

Production base modernization.

Special operations forces communications equipment.

KG-84 dedicated loop encrypting device.

AFRTS (audiovisual).

Deployable medical system.

CBT Support equipment medical.

(2) NAVY PROCUREMENT.—

Refueling tanker modification.

APN weapons production facility.

War reserve munitions.

Medical support equipment.

Undistributed reduction, Other Procurement, Navy.

SSN-688 submarine program.

Coastal defense augmentation.

Undistributed reduction, Shipbuilding and Conversion, Navy.

(3) AIR FORCE PROCUREMENT.—

Air Force One replacement.

KC-10 aircraft.

B-1B modifications.

B-52 modifications.

A-7 modifications.

F/RF-4 modifications (including $92,000,000 for FA INS/HUD upgrade).

Airborne command post modifications.

AMRAAM advanced procurement.

Rapier (Turkey).

Minutemen modifications.

War reserve munitions, Air Force.

Intelligence data handling system.

Medical readiness, Air Force.

(4) ARMY RESERVE PROCUREMENT.—

Miscellaneous equipment.

Truck SLEP.

(5) NAVY RESERVE PROCUREMENT.—Miscellaneous equipment.

(6) MARINE CORPS RESERVE PROCUREMENT.—Miscellaneous equipment.

(7) AIR FORCE RESERVE PROCUREMENT.—Miscellaneous equipment.

(8) ARMY NATIONAL GUARD PROCUREMENT.—

Miscellaneous equipment.

Improved TOW vehicle.

M198 howitzer.

Truck SLEP.

(9) AIR NATIONAL GUARD PROCUREMENT.—Miscellaneous equipment.

(10) RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT.—

Medical research/AIDS, Army.

Ship subsystems development/LBTS, Navy.

Bigeye operational test, Navy.

Space Defense System, Air Force.

MEECN communications upgrade, Air Force.

Air Force One, Air Force.

Liquid synthetic fuels, Air Force.

Precision tactical approach system, Air Force.

Director of Test and Evaluation.

(11) OPERATION AND MAINTENANCE.—

Real growth reductions not taken.

Audit/inventory report reduction not taken.

Civilian training.

F-4 upgrade, Air Force Reserve.

SEC. 404. AUTHORIZED MILITARY CONSTRUCTION PROJECT.

(a) AUTHORIZED PROJECT.—

(1) AUTHORIZATION.—The Secretary of the Navy may carry out the military construction project described in paragraph (2), funds for such project having been appropriated in the Military Construction Appropriations Act, 1986 (Public Law 99-173; 99 Stat. 1024).

(2) PROJECT DESCRIPTION.—The project referred to in paragraph (1) is a project for the construction of a berthing pier and bulkhead at the Naval Station, Staten Island, New York. The amount authorized for the project is $37,750,000.

(b) CONSTRUCTION WITH PUBLIC LAW 99-167.—

(1) PROJECT AUTHORIZATIONS.—The project authorization in subsection (a) shall be deemed to have been included in section 201(a) of the Military Construction Authorization Act, 1986 (Public Law 99-167; 99 Stat. 966).

(2) APPROPRIATION AUTHORIZATION TOTALS.—The total amount authorized to be appropriated for the Department of the Navy set forth in section 602(a) of such Act (99 Stat. 980), and the amount authorized for military construction projects inside the United States set forth in paragraph (1) of that section, shall be deemed to be increased by the amount specified in subsection (a)(2).

(3) LIMITATION RELATING TO FUNDS FOR NAVAL STRATEGIC HOMEPORTING.—For the purposes of section 205 of such Act (99 Stat. 971), amounts available for the project authorized in subsection (a) shall be deemed to be funds appropriated pursuant to an authorization in section 602 of such Act for Naval Strategic Homeporting.

(c) PROHIBITION ON OBLIGATION OF EXCESS APPROPRIATION.—Of the amount appropriated for military construction for the Navy for fiscal year 1986, $1,950,000 may not be obligated or expended for any purpose except as authorized after the date of the enactment of this Act in a law other than an appropriation Act (including a continuing resolution), such amount being the amount by which the amount appropriated for the project authorized by subsection (a) is in excess of the amount authorized for that project by subsection (a).

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. MONTGOMERY

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MONTGOMERY:

Page 59, strike out line 18 and all that follows through page 60, line 9 (and redesignate the following paragraphs accordingly).

(b) RESERVE COMPONENT EQUIPMENT PROCUREMENT.—Section 401 applies with respect to fiscal year 1986 defense appropriations for procurement of equipment for the reserve components only to the extent that amounts appropriated for such purposes exceed the amount specified in section 402(e)(1). Programs, projects, and activities for which amounts provided in fiscal year 1986 defense appropriations for procurement of equipment for the reserve components are subject to section 401 (except to the extent to which funds are available to be obligated or expended as provided in section 402) are the following:

(1) ARMY RESERVE.—

Miscellaneous equipment.

Truck SLEP.

(2) NAVAL RESERVE.—Miscellaneous equipment.

(3) MARINE CORPS RESERVE.—Miscellaneous equipment.

(4) AIR FORCE RESERVE.—Miscellaneous equipment.

(5) ARMY NATIONAL GUARD.—

Miscellaneous equipment.

Improved TOW vehicle.

M198 howitzer.

Truck SLEP.

(6) AIR NATIONAL GUARD.—Miscellaneous equipment.

Mr. MONTGOMERY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, this possibly will be the only amendment, and I feel very strongly about offering this amendment today.

What it actually does is that it calls for $285 million to be authorized for the National Guard and Reserve. $100 million will go to the Army Guard, $40 million will go to the Air National Guard, $100 million for the Army Reserve, $25 million for the Navy Reserve, $10 million for the Marine Corps Reserve, and the Air Force Reserve under this amendment will receive $10 million.

We have met with the different Chiefs of the Reserve Forces plus the associations, and we have come up with this reasonable amendment.

Now, $840 million was appropriated for the Reserve Forces. It had not been authorized. Now we came out with this authorization bill today that only provides for $30 million to be authorized of the appropriated funds. That is not enough, Mr. Chairman, for the Reserve Forces.

I point out that you go through the bill, and our committee has authorized $2.4 billion, I believe, under this bill that was appropriated, not authorized. Now under this bill it will be authorized. All I am asking for is $285 million. If you look over the sheet, further in this piece of paper I have here, nothing is marked for the Reserve Forces.

On the Senate markup of the Supplemental appropriation bill for items that were not authorized, they put in $488 million for the Reserve Forces. Under our bill, as I said earlier, there is only $30 million. Mine will add $285 million, and these are basic funds that will go to your armories back home, they will go to your municipal airports, there will be simulators, they are safety devices.

I point out that for the Air National Guard A-7 night vision goggles. They should have had those years ago. They do not have them. Under this amendment they would be given night vision goggles. They would have video recorder systems that they do not have now. They do not have the proper medical kits and damage repair kits that they need.

None of these items or moneys of the $285 million are big-ticket items. They are not big airplanes, they are not tanks, they are not ships. And the reason I offered this amendment was that when our committee met—and I would have offered the amendment in the committee, but it moved so quickly that there was some misunderstanding what we were doing in the committee. We have some unauthorized amendments, authorization in this bill now. All I am doing is adding what we have already done in committee. If the committee would not have authorized any nonauthorization appropriations, I would not have done that either. But I want to point out this has a lot of merit for the Reserve Forces. We have put a lot of responsibility in the Reserves. I point out that the Air Reserve last year won all of the competitions against the regulars and also against the Air Guard. They won the F-16 competition, they won the ground-to-air reconnaissance, the air refueling. So we have got some great units, but we need to give them equipment.

List of equipment follows:

Type of equipment needed

	Millions
Army National Guard:
Armored personnel carriers	4.2
M 198 howitzers	21.5
Tactical communications equipment	44.3
Storage, training, and maintenance projects	30.0
Total	100.0
Air National Guard:
Aircrew combat maneuvering instrumentation [ACMI]	8.2
Tactical communications equipment (radios, terminals, technical controls, etc.)	22.5
A-7/F-4 video recorder systems	1.3
AIM 9L missile modification	2.6
A-7 night vision goggles	1.7
Combat support equipment (battle damage repair kits, medical kits)	3.7
Total	40.0
Navy Reserve:
Aircraft modifications:
Weather radar	2.5
VHF radios	5.0
Navigation systems	8.7
Controller modifications	4.5
Civil engineering support equipment:
5-ton trucks	1.2
Generators	.5
1.5-ton trucks	.2
Water tanks	.1
Maintenance trucks	.2
AQA sound signal processors	2.1
Total	25.0
Marine Corps Reserve:
Marksmanship training: Indoor ranges (live fire/simulators)	7.7
Maintenance and operator training devices (simulators, video discs, etc.)	.3
Precision gunnery training systems (simulated laser trainers, tank gunnery trainers, etc.)	2.0
Total	10.0
Air Force Reserve:
Tactical radio systems	1.7
Various type vehicles (security, refueling, aircraft loading, etc.)	4.2
Aircraft support equipment (avionics test, engine test stands, etc.)	4.1
Total	10.0
Army Reserve:
Medical equipment (field operating tables, surgical instruments, etc.)	.4
Communications equipment (radios, meters, etc.)	12.2
Aviation support equipment (2 aircraft, etc.)	1.4
Various type vehicles (trucks, jeeps, etc.) and associated equipment	78.9
Missile electronic test equipment	1.5
Arms and ammunition	1.6
Other electronic/communication equipment (regulators, power supply assemblies, etc.)	2.1
Other miscellaneous equipment (generators, water purifiers, flood lights, etc.)	1.9
Total	100.0

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HILLIS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I have a couple of comments and perhaps a couple of questions. First of all, we are all very aware in this Chamber that the name of the game today is a total force concept, and to have that concept work, the Reserve and the National Guard have to maintain a high state of readiness. I think we all agree to that.

I want to ask the gentleman: As I understand the items, as I listened to the gentleman's presentation both during general debate and now, the gentleman is not talking about procurement items, not large items; the gentleman is talking about things that contribute to the readiness, as I understand it, of the Reserve and National Guard, particularly the Air Reserve and Air National Guard forces; is this correct?

Mr. MONTOGMERY. That is correct. It does not include F-16 aircraft, the M-1 tanks; it includes simulators for the Marine Reserve, the simulators will go back to the armories around the country where the Marine Reserves are located.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY] has expired.

(On request of Mr. HILLIS and by unanimous consent, Mr. MONTGOMERY was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. HILLIS. I think what the gentleman is saying—I caught this when he talked about night vision goggles for the A-7 pilots—the gentleman is talking about things that will permit these people to readily use the equipment that we are in the process of procuring for them. If they give a pilot an F-16, you better have a pilot that can fly an F-16. Is that what the gentleman is saying here? If they need a simulator, or whatever the equipment is and it is going to be provided for them, you have to have the readiness and the training and the backup for the pilot to use it efficiently and to survive and accomplish his mission.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. That is exactly right. Also included is money to update some of the A-7 aircraft, of which the Air National Guard has about 15 squadrons. The planes have a lot of age on them now. They need modifications. There is some money in here just to improve them, make them safer for these pilots to fly.

Mr. HILLIS. As I understand, too, the gentleman was saying originally there was about $840 million that was appropriated for Reserve accounts that was unauthorized, to begin with. Now, the other body authorizing committee has seen fit to authorize $488 million, but in the House here, in this bill we are only talking $40 million. And the gentleman's request is for $285 million, which is still less than what the other body's authorizing committee has authorized. Is that correct?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I think it is a fair and reasonable approach. I am concerned about the cost of our military. I could have made it $840 million. We did not. We made it $285 million, and the Reserve units agreed to that, the associations agreed to it.

We could have asked for the whole $840 million that has been appropriated, but it has not been authorized. We would still have been legal and we would not have added to the cost of the appropriations on the military for 1986.

Mr. HILLIS. Well, I know the gentleman is very aware of the squeeze that we find ourselves in with Gramm-Rudman, but it seems to me that these are all very necessary items. I am happy to rise in support of the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I appreciate the gentleman's support.

□ 1615

Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Members of the House Armed Services Committee have worked long and hard over the years to improve the status of our Reserve components. We have done so because there is little doubt that reliance on the Guard and Reserve is an excellent way to save taxpayer dollars. Substantial savings result from such factors as the lower cost of pay and the lower tempo of training required in Reserve units.

While I feel significant improvement in the readiness of these units is evident, I also feel that there is much that needs to be accomplished. In order for the Reserve forces to be truly effective elements in the defense of our country, they must be ready to fight. In order to be ready to fight, they must be properly equipped. This is what the gentleman from Mississippi's amendment is all about.

The authorization called for in the amendment is not intended for expensive or "nice to have" equipment. It is for critically needed combat and support items such as radios, medical kits, various type vehicles, and simulators.

Mr. Chairman, quoting in part from the House Armed Services Committee report on the 1985 DOD authorization bill:

> Given the Nation's limited defense resources, tradeoffs can be made between resources for active and Reserve forces in the future. In order to make full use of these tradeoffs, however, the performance and capability of the Reserves must be improved to the greatest extent possible, * * *

If we are to improve the performance and capability of the Reserve components, we must provide them with the equipment necessary to perform their missions. Mr. MONTGOMERY is attempting to do so by offering an amendment which authorizes a portion of the funds which have already been appropriated for these forces.

I hope the membership will support this amendment.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, we have worked on this issue of the amount of money to be authorized and appropriated under this bill for a long time, and it seems to me that if we start making exceptions here and there, we are going to end up with a lot more exceptions than we have rules. So I rise in reluctant opposition to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY] because he is a good friend, and a good friend of the Guard and the Reserve, and the Guard and the Reserve deserve some support.

I would like to point out to the members of the committee that the Guard and Reserve have gotten a lot of support in the fiscal year 1986 authorization bill. In fact we approved $658 million more than the administration asked for in 1986. So before we do anything with this bill, we are already at $658 million higher than the administration's request in fiscal year 1986 for the Guard and Reserve.

The gentleman from Mississippi would like to add another $285 million, which in fact puts us a billion dollars over the Reagan administration request for the Guard and Reserve for fiscal year 1986. I am not saying that there are not things that you can find to spend that kind of money on, but it does seem to me that in a time of fiscal austerity everybody has got to take part of the cuts. When the Gramm-Rudman provision took effect in 1986, the Guard and Reserve lost probably about $250 million through the Gramm-Rudman cuts for 1986. What we are doing here in effect is saying that the Guard and Reserve should be exempt from the Gramm-Rudman cuts. The gentleman from Mississippi is adding a little bit more money back than the Gramm-Rudman cut.

It seems to me that that is not right, that if you are going to have Gramm-Rudman cuts—and a lot of people who voted for the Gramm-Rudman cuts certainly understood what those Gramm-Rudman cuts were going to mean to every line item in the budget, and that meant the Guard and Reserve line items in the budget—it seems to me that we ought to not now go back and restore the money for those things that were being cut under Gramm-Rudman.

Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, let me make just one more point, and then I will yield to the gentlewoman from Maryland [Mrs. HOLT].

Mr. Chairman, there is one final point: Nothing in this recommendation of the gentleman from Mississippi cannot be dealt with in 1987. The 1987 bill is now just before us. As soon as we get a defense number from the Budget Committee and we get a number that we an mark to, the Armed Services Committee will produce an authorization bill that is consistent with that number.

There is not a single item in the list of the gentleman from Mississippi that is of such urgency that we have to put it into the 1986 bill. Every single one of those items could be considered under the normal budget process of 1987.

It seems to me for all of those reasons that it would be a very bad idea to pass the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASPIN. I am happy to yield to the gentlewoman from Maryland [Mrs. HOLT].

Mrs. HOLT. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I am sure that the gentleman, our distinguished chairman, agrees with me that the Guard and the Reserve are very cost-effective parts of our total force concept, that we are getting our dollar's worth out of them.

Mr. ASPIN. Absolutely.

Mrs. HOLT. As we become more austere in the active forces, as we begin to cut the active forces, does the gentleman not feel that it is important to make certain that the Guard and Reserve have the kind of equipment that they need to do the job to perform half of the missions that they are now performing for our total force concepts?

Certainly the simulators are an important part of this. The gentleman says that there are things that can be postponed, but this is very, very important for them to have the simulators to save the money, the cost of training.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I would just point out to the gentlewoman that under the normal process we passed in our authorization bill an addition of $658 million this year higher than the Reagan administration requested. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY] was involved in it. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY] is not lax at looking for things to add to the Guard and Reserve. We went through our whole authorization bill, and indeed, the bill got the support of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY].

Now all of a sudden the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY] wants $285 million more. This is $285 million more that nobody else on the committee has had a chance to review.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ASPIN] has expired.

(On request of Mr. MONTGOMERY, and by unanimous consent, Mr. ASPIN was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, this is $285 million that nobody else on the committee outside of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY] has had a chance to review. It is money that has been put in on the appropriation bill over there in the Senate. It seems to me that what we are dealing with here is that the gentleman from Mississippi sees an opportunity to put in some more money for the Guard and Reserve. It is not a requirement driving this request, it is an opportunity there, because when we were building the 1986 budget, as we did last year, the gentleman from Mississippi was happy with a paltry $658 million added to the President's request. Now there is this other chance to add it and push it over a billion. It seems to me that we should not be legislating in this way.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASPIN. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY].

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, I am really amazed that the gentleman keeps quoting Ronald Reagan's budget. I am glad to hear that he feels it has some merit to it.

I am not apologizing for offering this amendment for $285 million. As the gentleman knows—and I have to be fair, he has tried to help where he could for our Reserve forces—in 1986 the Reserve and National Guard only got 5 percent of the total procurement budget; in 1987, this great budget that you are talking about coming up in a few days, the National Guard and Reserve are only getting 5 percent of that. They have almost 50 percent of all the combat and support missions.

I really do not see how they do as well as they do, and I really cannot see why the gentleman is giving us a problem on this one.

Sure, it is a good buy. We ought to take credit for what we have done in the Congress. Twelve years ago, when I was in the Guard and Reserve, we spent a lot of time sitting on the hoods of automobiles. We did not have any equipment. We did not have any training devices, any simulators.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ASPIN] has expired.

(On request of Mr. MONTGOMERY, and by unanimous consent, Mr. ASPIN was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASPIN. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. We really did not have any good training, because we did not have any equipment. Now we have given them the equipment, we have given them the incentives that the regulars have, and they are as good or better than the regular forces, and the regular forces will tell you that. They have some problems in the regulars. Instead of flying an airplane every weekend, they have to be on court-martial boards, they have to be in the Defense Department, they have to be overseas as military attachés, where the Guardsmen and the reservists sit in the cockpits and fly every weekend.

I am not apologizing for this amendment at all. It has a lot of merit to it. What we have done in the last 10 years is created two strong military forces out there, and we have done it in the Congress of the United States. You have $2.4 billion up here today that was not authorized. You are trying to authorize it now. All I am adding in is $285 million.

If I had known it would give you this much trouble, I would have gone with the whole $840 million.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, let me respond to the gentleman that I do not doubt that in the old days the Guard and Reserve were in very, very bad shape. I also would like to commend the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY] for his undying effort to improve the quality of the equipment that the Guard and Reserve have. I would also like to point out that the gentleman from Mississippi has been pretty successful in his effort to improve the quality of the Guard and Reserve.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. From 4 percent to 5 percent.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to take back my time.

The reason the gentleman from Wisconsin is quoting Ronald Reagan is that Ronald Reagan is not a person who is known to be parsimonious or stingy about defense. Yet we have taken the President's defense request for the Guard and Reserve, and we have added $658 million. That was the authorization bill that passed this body last year for fiscal year 1986. The gentleman from Mississippi was happy with that number.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ASPIN] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. ASPIN was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. ASPIN. The gentleman from Mississippi did not ask for any additional money at that time.

That seemed to be a very good number. Now, what has changed? Well, nothing has changed. The only thing that has changed is an opportunity to get a little bit more because of the appropriation process in the U.S. Senate.

None of us, the committee has not looked at this issue. We have not had a chance to review it. There is nothing that says this has to be time urgent. We can do it in the 1987 cycle. We are doing the 1987 bill within a matter of months if the Budget Committee will ever come up with some targets for us to mark up to, and it seems to me that this is a crazy way to proceed with legislation. It seems to me that if we are ever going to get control and get our committee involved in the process here, we have got to stop just going back and authorizing things after they have been appropriated by other committees.

It is for those reasons and the reasons of process and the reasons of the committee that I am opposing this amendment. I have not, in fact, had a chance to look at the gentleman's list in detail to know whether the list makes sense or not. It may be that if I had a chance to sit down and look at it I would approve of some.

But that is not the point. It is a process point. The point at this time, what we ought to do is stick with the bill as we have had it. If we pass an authorization bill that adds $658 million for the National Guard, that is our judgment that that is how much we ought to add to the National Guard and we ought not to go back later and change our minds and add or even subtract, unless there is some different evidence to say that we ought to change it.

So that is the reason why I oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Montgomery amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think a good many of us overlook the fact that the National Guard and the Reserve forces have been for a very long time the stepchild in the Pentagon. It has been the practice of the Procurement Subcommittee to recognize the fact that the Guard and the Reserve forces are part of our total force concept. In fact, if the balloon should go up in Europe, if we should get into trouble in dealing with Colonel Qadhafi, it is very likely that it is going to be the National Guard divisions and the Reserve divisions that are going to be sent to Europe to reinforce the troops already there in any conflict that might break out.

You cannot have an adequate Reserve component to provide the necessary additional forces unless they can operate the same kind of equipment that the regular forces are doing.

It is quite true that the gentleman from Mississippi put in an additional fund for 1986, for the Reserves, but the Committee on Armed Services, at the request of the Subcommittee on Procurement, has added an amount every single year because they know the Reserve and the Guard Forces have been living on half rations. They have, in fact, been starved.

Some have the idea, that the Guard and the Reserve just meet once in awhile in somebody's kitchen and talk over the days of World War II. That is no longer the case. If we are going to have a total force concept, we have got to give them the best equipment.

That is what this amendment does.

What has happened here is something that I think is very providential as far as the Guard and the Reserve. These funds that the gentleman has referred to represent some $840 million which the other body has appropriated. The gentleman from Mississippi is only asking for $285 million. That does not have to come out of the 1987 budget. We are going to be living on short rations, of course as the distinguished chairman of our committee has already explained time and again, once Gramm-Rudman goes into operation.

But as of now we have no budget at the present time, let alone triggering in Gramm-Rudman; so we do not know what is going to happen to the kind of annual contribution to the Guard that will be made once Gramm-Rudman triggers in.

I think to provide these relatively minor sums of $10 million for the Marine Corps Reserve, $10 million for the Air Force Reserve, $100 million for the Army Reserve, and $100 million for the Army National Guard, these are figures that providentially are going to make it possible for us to continue the expansion and the improvement of these forces that God forbid we might have to use in Europe or in the Mediterranean or somewhere else.

I think that to suggest that this is a waste is certainly misleading.

I want to commend the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY] for his diligence, because as one who has spent some 34 years in the Navy Reserve I know the importance of having a ready Reserve and one that is fully qualified. This money is not going to be wasted, you can be sure of that.

Mr. Chairman, I urge support and approval of the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, we are here debating an add-on today to the bill. I think most of the rhetoric and most of the arguments in support of the amendment simply obfuscate the facts.

Neither the chairman nor I are in opposition to furnishing adequate equipment to the Guard and the Reserve. As a matter of fact, we very strongly support it.

We have heard those in support of the amendment point out what a great thing it is to have these weapons systems, that we need them, and no one is denying that.

The Guard does a great job, we know that.

The point is that we in the committee have had no chance to have hearings, to have deliberations on what will this money buy. It is just an opportunity that is passing along. Evidently the gentleman from Mississippi does not want to miss an opportunity to help the Guard and the Reserve, which is very commendable. We have got this thing stirred up.

I have heard from any number of my reservists and national guardsmen from home that some have called and said, "I don't know what it's all about, but they told me to call you, so I am calling you in support of the amendment, and please support it."

It runs from there to those who are knowledgeable.

It is not that we do not necessarily need these things, but it is a question of what is the orderly process by which we authorize and then appropriate?

Now, to say that the Guard is a total stepchild and has not been taken care of, first, as has been pointed out by the chairman, there has already been an add on, an additional amount over the budgeted amount that was approved by the committee after hearings of $658 million. Now, that is already here.

Now there is an additional sum, for which we do not know what it will be spent for, no justification. I am sure it will be well spent, but we do not know for what. Everyone is just going to be given a lump sum, as far as I know, of another $285 million.

Now, in the past 2 years, for instance, the Air Force has been given the F-16's, the F-15's, the C5-B's.

The Navy has been given the F-14's, the F-18's and the A-6's. These are new aircraft.

The Army has been given Apache helicopters, the M-1 tanks. These are not just hand-me-downs, things worn out in the regular forces. This is new equipment that has gone into the Reserve. I am not saying that this is enough, my point being, though, that we have recognized and are coming to recognize even more the necessity for the Guard and the Reserve and the part they play, that we cannot just continue to give them hand-me-downs, that they are an integral part of our complete defense posture. They should be funded and they should be adequately provided for and we should do this; but it is the procedure that we are going about that the chairman has objected, as I understand it. It is the way that we are going about it. We do not know. There is no testimony as to what this money will be spent for. I am sure it will be well spent and I am sure that the Guard and the Reserve can spend it wisely. We do not know. Actually, it is just a blank check.

So I feel very strongly that whatever we do here, we would already have gone through the markup session in a normal legislative year. We would already have had hearings and marked up our bill for the coming fiscal year 1987. Because of the budgetary process and because of Gramm-Rudman, we have not got to that yet. These items that this would buy would normally be in the next budget cycle for fiscal year 1987. They are not there because we have not even got to marking up because we are waiting on the Budget Committee.

So there is no urgency. There is no necessity to do this in this out of the ordinary procedure. We can do it in an orderly procedure as we usually follow. It can be done in this year's markup. It can go through just like it does every year. I think that is the proper way to do it. I think that is the reasonable way to do it.

I would just like to point out before I yield to the gentlewoman from Maryland that this is irony at the greatest. I believe of all those who have spoken this afternoon in defense of the effect of Gramm-Rudman here, the chairman and I are the only two who voted against the darn thing.

Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I voted against it.

Mr. DICKINSON. Good for you.

We voted against it because we knew the mischief that would befall us and we voted against it. Now the very ones who voted for it are trying to undo it.

It just does not make sense.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

(At the request of Mrs. HOLT, and by unanimous consent, Mr. DICKINSON was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I am very pleased to yield to the gentlewoman from Maryland.

Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Chairman, our leader says that his objection is procedural. Well, this is the problem that I have. Are we not authorizing six or seven items in this particular piece of legislation that were appropriated and not authorized?

Mr. DICKINSON. It is my understanding that there are some items and I do not know for sure which they are.

Mrs. HOLT. And did we have hearings on those particular items?

Mr. DICKINSON. Well, I will be glad to yield to my leader, but I think most of them have been either scrutinized and had discussion on or had hearings, but I am going to yield to the chairman to answer that.

Mrs. HOLT. Well, will the gentleman continue to yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. Well, if the gentlewoman wants an answer to her question, I thought I would yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mrs. HOLT. Well, I just want to say that this is my objection to the whole process, that we are authorizing some things that have been appropriated and we are not authorizing those things that are really important.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I am happy to yield. We are not adding any amendment. We are opposing any amendment that was not previously considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. DICKINSON was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, let me say that I agree entirely with the statement of the gentleman in the well. The only reason that we have added anything in the way of authorizations of things that we did not appropriate is for three reasons.

One is that if what they did in the Senate would have saved money, or what they did in the appropriations process would have saved money, we went along with it.

Second, if there were changed circumstances, and we always recognize in the authorization process that the appropriation bill comes later and that sometimes situations have changed. All of that recognizes that we would have done the same thing had our bill come along a little bit later and we had known the circumstances at that time.

The third category, and a very small category, results from technical differences.

In the main what we did here was stick with the committee's original authorizing position with changes that had to be made due to changed circumstances and really changes in cost.

Basically that is what we are trying to do. I think that is what is important. You cannot just blindly go ahead with the authorization bill in the spring of 1986 the same way as it was in the spring of 1985. Of course, things have changed in the year. We brought this bill onto the floor and did it last spring and did it last summer. Of course, things are different now.

So we have recognized those and we have made a couple changes in here; but remember what is going on. The Senate is adding on in their appropriation process a lot of money.

Let me remind you, it is not free money. I mean, this $285 million that we are talking about is not free money, because they have to make the same budget targets that the authorizing committee does.

□ 1640

When they appropriate more in some categories, that means they are taking the money out of something else.

Mr. DICKINSON. Exactly. It has got to come from somewhere. It is not open end.

Mr. ASPIN. So something that we authorize is being drastically underfunded for them to fund more than we authorized in some other category. So if we do not shut this off, and if we do not send the message to the Senate that we are not going to stand for this, we are going to find this happening more and more and more.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I appreciate the gentleman yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I really do not know any other way to get more money for the National Guard and Reserves than to come with amendments. The Department of Defense does not send over in the President's budget each year, as the gentleman knows——

Mr. DICKINSON. The gentleman had his vehicle with the regular bill and we added money in the committee. There is over $600 million already added here.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Sure. We should have added money, and we should add some more.

Mr. DICKINSON. I do not debate that. My point is that we had hearings and we knew what it was going for. If the gentleman will offer this during the regular process, I will support it.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I thought the gentleman was going to yield to me.

Mr. DICKINSON. It is my time and I can take it back if I want to. I just thought we would share.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DICKINSON] has again expired.

(On request of Mr. MONTGOMERY and by unanimous consent, Mr. DICKINSON was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. MONTGOMERY. If the gentleman will yield further, and I will stop after this, does the gentleman agree that we got less than 5 percent in procurement in 1986, including the addition of $600 million, that I beat you over the head with and made you take this money for the Reserve and Guard? It still was less than 5 percent.

Now, they send up again from the Department of Defense only another less than 5 percent for the Reserves. So this is money that has already been appropriated. We are not going to add onto the appropriation. We are going to have every armory in the country, including the gentleman's armory. He has the biggest National Guard units in the country and he ought to be supporting this amendment and not fighting it.

Mr. DICKINSON. I do not have to do it by the amendment process. We can do it by the regular process and not these add-ons, putting patches on things.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. You would not give me the chance. I tried to talk to the chairman.

Mr. DICKINSON. The gentleman had the chance.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I talked to the chairman.

Mr. DICKINSON. We support it. We are going to support the National Guard and we support the Reserve, but not by adding patches on these pieces of legislation as they come through, but in the main.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether I should get into this internal battle here between the Committee on Armed Services. I do not know what the credentials are that make one eligible. If it is a vote on Gramm-Rudman, I qualify. I voted against Gramm-Rudman, too, for a lot of reasons. This is just one of many.

But I did spend more than 20 years in the Reserve components after World War II, and I can recall that right after World War II, it was tough being in a Reserve component. We got all the hand-me-downs, everything we wore out and did bring back from Europe; nothing back from Asia, as I recall.

I remember going to summer camp as a battalion commander and half of my mission was to keep the equipment working. We spent half of our time back home in the home armory repairing worn-out equipment, whether it be mechnical equipment with engines, or whether it was rifles, or recoilless rifles, or whatever it was. We spent half of our time in maintenance, just trying to survive. We would go to summer camp and I would send people in advance to go up and cannibalize as much as we could steal off the active duty vehicles. We would borrow an active duty vehicle and we would change carburetors because ours were worn out. We even went to the extent of changing engines. We had to do that.

Things have changed, because we have started realizing the role that the armed services play and the role that the Reserve components play. Much of that is through the equipment process that this Congress has seen fit to support. It is no longer a contest to see if we can keep our equipment running.

But as Gramm-Rudman is applied more and more, we are going to have to depend more and more for our military defense preparedness on the Reserve components. It is the only way we can go. It is the cheapest way.

So I support the gentleman from Mississippi in his amendment here. I do not know what happened in the process in committee, but I do know there is a need yet in the Reserve components, because I can recall going back on active duty in 1960 for an extended duty and thinking could I compete with active duty? Let me tell my colleagues, it was no problem at all.

The Reserve components are a fighting group. They are a capable group. They need the equipment, and this Congress ought to provide it, especially if we are going to be reducing the armed services in the future because of Gramm-Rudman. The cheapest way is to provide it right through this amendment here. I support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi..

Mr. CARNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CARNEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that I was just relieved after questioning counsel as to the statute of limitations on the UCMJ, and it is only 3 years. So the gentleman does not have to worry; no one will come in and cart him away for what he did as a Reserve officer.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. It has been longer than 3 years.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that he was in doubt.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

Mr. MARTINEZ and Mr. HANSEN changed their votes from "no" to "aye."

Mr. SOLARZ changed his vote from "aye" to "no."

So the amendment was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments?

Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to reserve the right to offer an amendment pending a colloquy that I would like to have with the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services.

If the gentleman would respond to a question, section 404(a) deals with the homeport in Staten Island and authorizes $37,750,000. It makes reference on page 62 to section 205 of the act. Section 205 is that section that required that the Navy file a report, and that no action be taken for 90 days thereafter, and spending the money that was authorized and appropriated for fiscal year 1986.

Now on the report language, the report language says that:

No funds may be obligated until the Committee on Armed Services of the Senate and House have approved the ship dispersal concept.

That is not part of the language of the law today. The other body's Armed Services Committee is going to vote tomorrow.

I do not think that is the intent of those who drafted this piece of legislation, and I would hope that the chairman could make a statement. At the present time, the Navy has an agreement whereby if the Senate Armed Services Committee tomorrow votes to approve the Navy home port, they are ready to go out with contracts.

That is critically important from the Navy's standpoint. I am deeply concerned, as others are that share my feeling, that with this report language that will be stopped unless both committees have a vote and it is a favorable vote.

I do not think that is what the gentleman intended, and I would hope that he could help us on this question.

Mr. ASPIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOLINARI. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ASPIN. I would like to say to the gentleman, as I understand it, what the gentleman is saying is what the committee intends; and the gentleman is right.

The language that we have here, repeating section 205 does not imply any additional delays for the homeporting issue. The language is as it was in the original bill, which was the military construction bill. We are going to have that debate and that discussion and that vote in the committee and on the floor. This does not mean any additional delays.

Mr. MOLINARI. Would the gentleman then agree that the report language on page 59 is incorrect, and that where it says that the funds may not be obligated or expended until the Committee on Armed Services of the Senate and House of Representatives have approved the ship dispersal concept.

That is not present in the law today; that is not a prohibition to the expenditure of moneys today.

Mr. ASPIN. This is report language; it does not apply to the bill language.

Mr. MOLINARI. So it is the gentleman's understanding, then, that the Navy, pending a favorable vote tomorrow by the Senate Armed Services Committee, would be free to go ahead and expend any moneys in contract for the Staten Island homeport site?

Mr. ASPIN. No. Whatever process was in the law before is the same process that will be in the law as this bill passes today. There is no difference. We have not added to the delay. We have still this process to work our way through, but this bill that is before us today does not in any way add to the delay or add to the complexity.

Mr. MOLINARI. One last question. Is it the gentleman's understanding, then, that unless unfavorable action is taken by the Committee on Armed Services in the other body or the House, that the Navy would be free to go ahead and contract or obligate the funds that were authorized last year and appropriated last year?

Mr. ASPIN. We still have a process in the military construction bill that will still have to be followed. But this bill that we are voting on today does not add to that process at all. There are certain things that the Navy will be able to do when certain committees vote, but this bill that we are voting on today does not add to or subtract from that whole process.

Mr. MOLINARI. This is very important. We have been in touch with the Navy today. They did not know that this language was in there. The understanding that I had is that unless, unless the Committee on Armed Services of the House rescinded the 1986 funding, or the other body, that the moneys were free to be obligated, the Navy is ready to go into contract. Is that changing by what is happening here today?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

(By unanimous consent Mr. MOLINARI was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. MOLINARI. I will yield again to the Chairman.

Mr. ASPIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

As I understand it legally those restrictions have been lifted and they are continued to be lifted under this language.

Mr. MOLINARI. Then there is no tie-in here between fiscal year 1986 and fiscal year 1987?

Mr. ASPIN. There is the informal process that we have asked the Navy to observe to give our Committee on Military Construction adequate time to consider the issue. But that is the only thing that is at play, and this bill that we are voting on today does not affect that in any way, shape or form.

Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied with the explanation of the Chairman.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOLINARI. I yield to my colleague from New York.

Mr. WEISS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Let me see if I can get a question answered by the gentleman from Wisconsin. The gentleman is saying that this authorization in order to be implemented as far as appropriations are concerned still requires an appropriation to be followed through, is that right?

Mr. ASPIN. No. That was already appropriated.

Mr. WEISS. Right. But this particular authorization adds nothing new to that process.

Mr. ASPIN. That is correct.

Mr. WEISS. I thank the gentleman, and I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied. I have no intention of offering my amendment. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments?

Mr. BUSTAMANTE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I commend the chairman and ranking minority member for their efforts to preserve the integrity of the military retirement system.

At a time of budgetary austerity, the cost and structure of military retirement has come under greater scrutiny. The concern over the quadrupling of outlays for military retirement between 1963 and 1984 has led to six major studies in the past 10 years. Each study has made major recommendations to change military retirement and improve its ability to meet our defense manpower requirements at reasonable cost. However, none of the proposals was ever adopted. Instead the retirement system has been modified on a piecemeal basis. Those changes have had a serious impact on the lifetime value of a military pension. Under current budgetary pressures, my concern has been that additional piecemeal tinkering with the military retirement system would undermine the long-term stability of the system. I, therefore, support this reform legislation which will provide a stable element of compensation in the indefinite future.

This reform legislation will provide new members of the military a retirement system that makes sense and that is easy to understand. It also makes it attractive for the highest quality service members to remain in active duty for longer. According to the Congressional Budget Office, the changes in this legislation will increase the numbers of service members with over 20 years of service by 12 percent. These are the most experienced service members. The services have invested the most on their education and training, and they possess a broad range of experience. This legislation anticipates the future needs of our Armed Forces. It anticipates that the weapons systems, tactics, and doctrine of the Armed Forces will be substantially more complex than they are today. It is foward-looking legislation which undoubtedly contributes to the quality of our Armed Forces.

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation to restore the integrity of the military retirement system.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments?

The question is on the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TRAXLER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill [H.R. 4420) to amend title 10, United States Code, to revise the retirment system for new members of the uniformed services, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 421, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on the amendment to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute adopted by the Committee of the Whole? If not, the question is on the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. CARNEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 399, noes 7, not voting 27, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING THE CLERK TO MAKE CORRECTIONS IN ENGROSSMENT OF H.R. 4420, THE MILITARY RETIREMENT REFORM ACT OF 1986

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in the engrossment of the bill, H.R. 4420, the Clerk be authorized to make such clerical and technical corrections as may be necessary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks, and to include extraneous matter, on the bill, H.R. 4420.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

SUNDRY MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 4421, COMMUNITY SERVICES PROGRAMS AMENDMENTS OF 1986

Mrs. BURTON of California, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. 99-549) on the resolution (H. Res. 428) providing for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 4421) to authorize appropriations for fiscal years 1987, 1988, 1989, and 1990 to carry out the Head Start, Follow Through, dependent care, community services block grant, and community food and nutrition programs, and for other purposes, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF RESOLUTION PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 3302, NEVADA WILDERNESS PROTECTION ACT OF 1985

Mrs. BURTON of California, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. 99-550) on the resolution (H. Res. 429) providing for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 3302) to designate certain national forest lands in the State of Nevada for inclusion in the National Wilderness Preservation System, and for other purposes, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

(Mr. O'BRIEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, I was not present on Thursday, April 10. Had I been present, I would have voted "aye" on final passage for H.R. 4332, the Federal Firearms Law Reform Act of 1986, as amended by the Volkmer substitute.

CHILDREN'S CHALLENGE CENTER FOR SPACE SCIENCE

(Mr. BROOKS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I am today, along with Congressman DON FUQUA, chairman of the House Committee on Science and Technology, and Congressman MIKE ANDREWS, my colleague from Texas, introducing a sense-of-Congress resolution expressing our support for the establishment of a Childrens' Challenge Center for Space Science as a living memorial to the seven crew members of the space shuttle Challenger. These seven individuals gave their lives to expand the world's knowledge through exploration of the space frontier. What more fitting memorial could we establish than one to provide children of all ages with an opportunity to learn about space and related science through hands-on activities related to space exploration?

Speaker O'NEILL graciously met with these fine people this afternoon.

Representatives of the families of the seven astronauts who were lost on the Challenger flight are here in the Capitol. It is their fervent desire that this center be established in conjunction with NASA at the Johnson Space Center to provide activity stations, simulators, dormitories for visiting teachers and students, and other special interest areas devoted to depicting air and space travel. The center, sponsored by the nonprofit childrens' Challenge Center Foundation, will be available to teachers throughout the United States and the rest of the world. We in the Congress should support this effort as a national memorial to these brave and courageous Americans.

CHILDREN'S CHALLENGE CENTER FOR SPACE SCIENCE

(Mr. FUQUA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, I am very delighted to join with my colleagues, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BROOKS] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ANDREWS], in introducing this resolution supporting the wishes of the family of the crew of the Challenger VII. These were brave people who continued to stimulate interest in America's space flight and science. The recommendation of the family to have a Children's Challenge Center for Space Science to be established on NASA land at the Johnson Space Center I think is a fitting and living tribute to seven great and very distinguished Americans.

I am very happy to join in this activity because I think having a living memorial is something that can inspire children throughout the world and young people concerning the values of science and technology and hands-on experiments, that they can see and somehow be touched by these seven wonderful people who tragically gave their lives.

I am very delighted to join in this, and I encourage my colleagues to join us in sponsoring this resolution expressing our support.

As the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BROOKS] said, we had a chance to meet with them today. We are very pleased that they are in the Capitol. They had a chance to meet with the Speaker and other Members of the Congress who have all expressed their wholehearted endorsement of this most worthwhile project.

CHILDREN'S CHALLENGE CENTER FOR SPACE SCIENCE

(Mr. ANDREWS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, in 1960, at Rice University, John Kennedy said: "If history teaches us anything, it is that man in his quest for knowledge and progress is determined and cannot be deterred."

And surely as we face the weight of this country's greatest space disaster, we stand on the threshold of some of our countries in the world's greatest achievements in space.

Those achievements will occur through education, through a greater knowledge of this universe and through determination. Our children's generation is the generation that will literally go to the edge of this solar system and reach to every distant star.

The cure for cancer may well be found in outer space and not here on Earth.

The Children's Center that will be located at the Johnson Space Center will not only be a living memorial to those brave seven astronauts who gave their lives, but a lasting educational center for our children, a place they can see, they can feel, they can learn, they can study about man's ongoing contributions and quests for space.

I urge all of my colleagues to join us in this resolution, and let us make this important center a reality.

FISCAL YEAR 1987 BUDGET OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 99-206)

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARCIA) laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

(For message, see proceedings of the Senate of today, Tuesday, April 22, 1986.)

CONTINUATION OF NICARAGUAN EMERGENCY—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 99-207)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed.

NINTH ANALYSIS AND EVALUATION OF FEDERAL JUVENILE DELINQUENCY PROGRAMS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 99-208)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, without objection, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may be permitted to extend their remarks and to include extraneous material on House Resolution 425, which was considered earlier today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

SIR OLIVER WRIGHT'S SPEECH BEFORE THE HARVARD CLUB, APRIL 17, 1986

(Mr. PEPPER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, on the evening of the 17th of April, it was my rare privilege to hear, at the annual meeting of the Harvard Club of Washington, the principal address of the evening delivered by His Excellency, the British Ambassador, Sir Oliver Wright.

It was a delightful experience to hear this witty and wise Ambassador of our great friends, the British, out of his rich experience, speak of our own Harvard in relation to his Oxford and Cambridge, speak of the background, character, disposition, and attitudes of our own people and those of his own, relations between our two countries, relations between the United States and Russia, many matters of great interest to all of us in respect to our relations to other nations of the world.

I thought my colleagues and many of our countrymen would like to hear the wisdom and enjoy the wit of this learned and great man. So I ask the privilege to offer for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for its permanent embodiment, the able and delightful address of Ambassador Wright to follow my remarks.

The address follows:

ANNUAL DINNER OF HARVARD CLUB, WASHINGTON DC, APRIL 17, 1986

My wife and I are delighted to be able to join you at the Annual Dinner of the Harvard Club of Washington. As a Cambridge man myself, although from the other Cambridge, I am particularly honoured to be your guest in the year that Harvard celebrates its 350th Anniversary; being a sort of harbinger for the Prince of Wales, also a Cambridge man, who will speak at the celebrations at Harvard itself next September. I congratulate you too on the felicitous choice of venue, a hotel named after the ship which bore to these shores from England the members of the Community who formed your great University.

I am also honoured—and terrified—to be here in the company of Carter Brown. Terrifying man, Carter Brown. It's too late now, but up to last Sunday, you could have seen the product of his Reign of Terror: the Treasure Houses exhibition at the National Gallery of Art. Don't be misled by that electrifying smile: like electricity it can both light up, and shock. Carter must have something of the viking in him: certainly, like the vikings, he has pillaged the Stately Homes of England, and Scotland for that matter, to produce that wonderful exhibition.

It was a wonderful exhibition. In fact, it was two exhibitions: an exhibition of our treasures and an exhibition of his exhibitioner's art. The organisation and presentation was in itself a work of genius. Carter is, of course, a genius. And we in Britain, and the owners of the Stately Homes, are greatly in his debt. A Renaissance man, Carter: they had a lot of footpads during the renaissance—but a Renaissance man, nevertheless, who lends distinction to a city of incomparable distinction.

Although I have often visited Harvard, to my profit and pleasure, the first time in 1962, I have never before been asked to speak to the Harvard Club. I accepted with some trepidation. My mind went blank. If it were an Oxford and Cambridge dinner, I would know what to say. As a Cambridge man, I should have been rude about Oxford. It's not very difficult to be rude about Oxford. And the Cambridge men and women present would genuinely love it, while the Oxford men and women would have to pretend to love it, for fear of not being accused of having no sense of humour. The deadliest insult you can offer an Oxford man. No doubt because it is true. So they would grin and bear it, while plotting revenge.

But as one Cambridge man among others, I cannot repay your hospitality by being rude to you, can I? So I sought advice. I was at the University of South Carolina last week and met at dinner the Mayor of Columbia, who is a Harvard man. In desperation I asked him if he knew any Harvard jokes, so as to settle your digestion and provide sugar for the pill which follows. He was very discouraging: "For God's sake don't tell them any jokes" he said "keep it serious: They like it serious".

Tell me, is that really so? Are there no Harvard jokes? Is the one about Dr. Conant not a joke at all? You know the one I mean: someone calls Dr. Conant at home; the butler answers and says: "The President is in Washington seeing Mr. Roosevelt". That's not meant to be funny? Just a statement of fact? If that's so, I'm in deep trouble. I see what the Mayor of Columbia meant.

It rather reminds me of the time when my wife and I were in Copenhagen. Lovely city, Copenhagen, full of delightful people. But admirable though Danes are, as Allies in NATO they do not exactly, how shall I put it, overspend on defence. So I asked a Danish friend of mine how was it that the Danes, who had spent hundreds of years pillaging and laying waste the East Coast of England, were so averse these days to taking defence seriously. He replied: Well, you see, all the warlike Danes went and pillaged England. leaving only peace-loving Danes behind.

You may well ask what is the point of this story and its relevance to this evening's festivities. Be patient, and all shall be revealed.

If I've got my history right, all the Pilgrim Fathers who came to Plymouth—John Harvard himself, I am told, only made it a year after the college which bears his name was founded—all these Pilgrim Fathers certainly feared God and loved freedom and were deeply imbued with the work ethic—all admirable Yankee characteristics to this day—it was of course from the Pilgrim Fathers that that English master of serious frivolity Noel Coward got the phrase "work is more fun than fun"—where was I—O yes—all these very high minded people were of course Puritans. And they came to Harvard to get away from all the incorrigibly frivolous people back in England.

Which is why Harvard men and women don't like jokes.

But this set me wondering about the differences between the people of the two Cambridges. And the differences between then and now.

Life, of course, is not what it was. It never has been. Hence the truth behind the myth of the Garden of Eden. Life, even for Ambassadors, is not what it was. It was Margaret Thatcher who brought that home to me. At a dinner in my house a year ago in honour of President Reagan to celebrate 200 years of diplomatic relations between Britain and the United States, she quoted from a memorandum preserved in the Smithsonian. In that memorandum, President Jefferson is recorded as writing to his Secretary of State as follows: "We have not heard anything from our Ambassador to France for 3 years. If we do not hear from him this year, let us write him a letter . . ." Those were the days.

These days life is very different. In olden times one of my predecessors, an Ambassador to France in the time of Elizabeth I, described himself as "an honest man sent to lie abroad on behalf of his country". A modern definition of a modern Ambassador would be "a peaceable sort of chap sent abroad to conduct rows on behalf of his country".

That, at any rate, is what my life is about. At any one time I've got about six rows going with various parts of the Administration: burden sharing, arms control, farm exports, steel imports, Freddie Laker, unitary tax. You name it, we're having a row about it.

I've often wondered why this should be. I can understand why we have trade rows. Although we all have an interest in upholding the international trade rules and in preserving the free world's open trading system, we are, within that system, competitors. And, of course, as competitors up to all sorts of skullduggery, no doubt.

But on defence we are on the same side. Yet we repeatedly rub each other up the wrong way. Why is this?

I think it has to do with differences of historical experience and differences in geographical perspective. We in Europe have been mixed up with Russia over the centuries and tend to see Communism as just adding another—although very important—dimension to the Russianness of Russia. All this time, you were opening up this wonderful country of yours, moving westward with your backs to Europe.

We have had to rub along with our neighbours whether we liked them or not. You have had no neighbours to rub along with, and I know Canadians and Mexicans will forgive me for saying that for they will know what I mean.

We are right up alongside Russia: Helmut Schmidt used to remind people that his home in Hamburg was about 30 miles from the Red Army; about as far as from here to Annapolis. You are, Alaska apart, thousands of miles away from Russia, whether you go East across the Atlantic or West across the Pacific. It makes a difference.

We have de-demonised Russia: I don't think Americans have. That too makes a difference. We shall not convince each other otherwise, so it is pointless to try. Neither of us can un-have our historical experiences nor change our geographical location. We have to learn to live with and accept each others' difference of perspective. We shall continue to say Tom-ah-to: you will continue to say TO-MAY-TO. We can at least agree that we mean the same fruit.

There is also another factor in the relationship which we have to reckon with. It is what I would call differences in cast of mind.

Americans are by nature tremendous optimists. They have had to be, to develop this vast country. I visited Independence, Missouri, a year or so ago to visit the Truman Museum. Truman is one of my favourite Presidents, perhaps because I was Vice-Consul in New York 40 years ago during his presidency and so was present at the creation of the Truman doctrine, the Marshall Plan, launched at Harvard, at the commencement of June 1946, and the foundation of NATO. It was from Independence that, during the last century, whole families would set off in wagons at the first thaw of Spring and hope to get to the Pacific, by the Oregon or Santa Fe trails, before Winter set in. It is a wonderful story.

This "can do" spirit leads to a conviction that all problems are soluble. Just throw enough energy, intelligence, money and good will at a problem and a solution can be found. The immediate American reaction to a problem is "C'mon, fellers, let's go", sometimes, it seems to me, without too much thought of where they're going or what they will do when they get there. British and other sourpusses have been known to mutter under their breath "cowboys".

The British cast of mind is very different. We tend to believe that many problems exist precisely because there are no solutions to them and that the best one can do is to manage them so that they don't get out of hand and so that not too many people get hurt. No prizes offered for naming, say, three of today's insoluble problems.

The British reaction to a new problem is often to sit down and have a cup of tea and think it over and try to think it through. We have to want not only what we want, but the consequences of what we want. And the American reaction to this national characteristic is to mutter "wimps".

Fortunately, in my experience, what happens in real life is that cowboys and wimps alike get round a table and eventually come up with what are on the whole sensible joint answers to the common problems in hand. But we start from different premises and create a lot of aggro and static before we reach agreement.

One final point. To differences of historical experience, geographical perspective and cast of mind, I would add: the attitude to power. America is our friendly neighbourhood superpower and conscious of its strength. Europeans used to be great powers, governing vast tracts of the world's surface. They are no longer.

The European powers are all now—Britain, France, Germany, Italy—powers of the second rank.

It makes a difference. Because our muscles are not as strong as they were, we hesitate to use them. Because yours are strong, you have, shall we say, less inhibitions. But a constant factor is our apprehension lest you throw your weight around too much, and that we shall get hurt in the process. Of course, we have also a contrary fear; that you won't throw your weight around enough when we think it necessary.

It's tough for you. I have to admit that. But then, who said being a Superpower, even a friendly one, was easy.

The task of interpreting America to Britain and Britain to America is, in my experience, unremitting. Take your eyes off the ball for one second and you're in the rough. That's what, I suppose, Ambassadors are for. At least it keeps us off the streets.

v

Please don't get me wrong. I am not saying that you are wrong and we are right; still less that you are right and we are wrong. I am merely saying that these objective differences exist, provide the background against which our regular rows are played out, and are worth bearing in mind when our rows go public.

But, when the chips are down, we stand shoulder to shoulder. That I take it, is what friends are for.

For the transatlantic relationship is rather like the Atlantic ocean itself. On the surface, the sea is often stormy, as conflicts of interest churn up the waters, corresponding in real life to the series of crises that regularly plague us: burdensharing, protectionism, anti-trust, the disposal of subsidised agricultural surpluses. These problems provide the grist to the mills of intergovernmental business in Washington and give us diplomats our daily workout.

But just below the surface the deep water is calm, reflecting the deep community of interest which joins Europeans to North Americans and North America to Europe.

For we share a common interest in the maintenance of the free world's open trading system. Five hundred million Europeans and Americans together represent the world's two greatest markets. There is about $100 billion worth of trade in goods and services in both directions across the Atlantic. Britain is the largest foreign investor in the United States and the largest single recipient of US investment overseas. The amounts of money, curiously enough, are about the same: $35 billion.

We share a common interest in the defence of that system and the democratic way of life and the common heritage that it represents. For Americans and Europeans, the North Atlantic Alliance is the cornerstone of our freedom and of our partnership.

The institutions which provide the infrastructure for the free world were put in place during the period of America's economic and military supremacy after World War II. They are still in good shape and a great tribute to the wisdom and far-sightedness of the founding fathers of the post-war world, chief among them Harry Truman, George Marshall and Dean Acheson over here, Ernie Bevin, Paul Henri Spaak, Jean Monnet, Konrad Adenauer over there.

It is the task of statesmen, diplomats, and, perhaps most important of all, of the educated electorates in all our countries, and that includes the alumni of Harvard, to keep them and our friendship in good repair.

Don't leave it to the experts. Just as war is too important to leave to generals—so diplomacy is too important to leave to diplomats and maybe politics too important to leave to politicians.

That said, my wife and I first came to the United States in 1946 as Vice Consul in New York City. Experience of 40 years of our special relationship puts me firmly on the side of the optimists.

And I hope that you are too.

We leave later this year. I commend my successor to you. He is a splendid man, a personal friend of 25 years' standing. There could have been no better choice. He has only one defect: he went to Oxford. But he will be at Harvard with the Prince of Wales for your 350th Anniversary. He will, I know, wish to cherish the links between Harvard and Britain. For Harvard is one of the Treasure Houses of intellectual and moral excellence not only in the United States, but it is one of the Treasure Houses of the human spirit of mankind.

As a man from Cambridge, England which had a small part to play in your foundation, even if only as the piece of grit in the oyster which produced the pearl, I am proud and flattered to bring greetings this evening to the men and women of Cambridge Massachusetts.

We salute achievement and recognise excellence when, as this evening, we are in its presence.

MEDIA SNATCHES DEFEAT FROM JAWS OF VICTORY

(Mr. DORNAN of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I would like permission to put into the RECORD from yesterday's paper the media analysis column by Don Kowet. The title of Mr. Kowet's article is "Media Snatches Defeat From Jaws of Victory." He points out that although 80 percent of the American people agreed with President Reagan's difficult decision to finally respond to the terror that Mr. Qadhafi sends around the world, that our media sources, in a rut to get some sort of a news twist on this, have been literally shuttling back and forth by bus to locations that Qadhafi and his people select, putting a twist on the story that is again causing Americans to flagellate ourselves.

The story that Qadhafi wants in every American living room is that civilians have been killed and only one soldier, one.

Joseph Goebbels and Hitler's Nazi Germany never lied with any greater degree of boldness than Mr. Qadhafi.

Our screens are going to be filled with Arab anguish; once again guilt is going to be thrust down our throats. It has been going on for over a week in earnest.

Well, bless People magazine for this cover. There is a handsome young face of Sgt. Kenneth Ford. His death and the death of little Demetra Klug and her mother who was pregnant and her grandmother, also named Demetra, and the horrible sight of a pair of American journalists, man and wife, and their little daugther Samantha Simpson dying in that airport in Rome, these are the pictures that I think our news media should show us every night again to help our memory recall just why the President made this difficult decision.

MEDIA SNATCHES DEFEAT FROM JAWS OF VICTORY

(By Don Kowet)

Monday night, after the air attack against Libya, network newsmen reported that 80 percent of Americans polled believed the president was right. They spent the rest of the week trying to prove those people wrong.

All three over-the-air networks, plus Cable News Network, announced the air raid shortly after 7 p.m. Monday evening. ABC, CBS and NBC stayed with the story until 8 p.m.; CNN persevered until 9 p.m., when President Reagan addressed the nation.

CNN continued its non-stop coverage; the other networks contributed special reports. It wasn't until shortly after 3 a.m. Tuesday that the networks aired their first film from Tripoli. Correspondents and television crews, quarantined till then in their hotel, were herded onto a bus by the Libyan Ministry of Information and driven to a residential neighborhood where several apartment buildings had been blasted by bombs.

American bombs, it turned out, from a doomed F-111.

Throughout the week, the press shuttle would be repeated. Television crews went along with the Libyans, collaborating with Col. Muammar Qaddafi on the one story he wanted in every American living room: Some civilians were dead and wounded; friends and relatives were mourning.

Our screens were going to be filed with Arab anguish; once again, guilt was going to be thrust down our throats.

By Tuesday evening, when the networks aired their nightly newscasts, the issue of the death and destruction wrought against Libyan civilians had reduced any military motive for the attack to a mere footnote.

The networks let their pictures dictate their lead story.

The American warplanes, said ABC's Charles Glass from Tripoli, "killed innocent civilians and destroyed civilian homes. . . ."

Viewers saw children in a hospital crying out in pain.

"In the hospital, children cried out in pain. . . ."

"Among the dead and wounded were a number of children," reported CBS' Allen Pizzey. "Estimates of the wounded ran to more than 100. . . ."

Mr. Pizzey introduced a second motif. The raid, he added, "will almost certainly spark more, not less, acts against U.S. targets."

These would be the twin television themes: Innocent civilians had been killed, among them Col. Qaddafi's adopted infant daughter; and the air attack wouldn't stop international terrorism—just ask our allies.

There were complaints in the British House of Commons, and the French had refused our F-111s overfly privileges. Protesters were marching in Italy, in the Arab world, in Spain.

The bad news kept building.

The Soviets canceled a meeting called to plan the next Reagan-Gorbachev summit.

The Vietnamese scuttled scheduled talks on MIAs.

The television dirge, punctuated by pictures of civilian mourning and death and destruction, droned on.

All three networks led their Wednesday evening newscasts with a Libyan TV clip proving that Col. Qaddafi hadn't perished.

Col. Qaddafi said that, unlike the United States, Libya does not bomb children.

No network newsman bothered to remind viewers why Libya doesn't drop bombs on children: Its agents prefer to machine-gun them in airports or blow them out of airplanes.

ABC's Mr. Glass reported that damage had been done to Col. Qaddafi's main headquarters. "But for many Libyans," he added, "the main concern is still the outcome of the first attack, in which so many civilians were casualties," including Col. Qaddafi's 3- and 4-year-old sons.

How Mr. Glass or his colleagues knew "the main concern" of "many Libyans" was a mystery.

"Charles," said ABC anchor Peter Jennings, "I know Western reporters in Tripoli are restricted tonight. . . ."

The press were still prisoners in their hotel; taking the pulse of the Libyan people meant interviewing each other, or their mentors from the Libyan propaganda ministry.

Mr. Jennings promised that "later in this broadcast," ABC would finally get around to assessing the damage done to the five military targets.

That assessment lasted about 12 seconds. Mr. Jennings resurrected the theme of damage done to civilians.

That evening, all three networks covered the return to home port of the aircraft carrier the USS Saratoga, which had launched planes in an earlier assault against Libya. No one had ever suggested that a single Libyan civilian had been injured in that raid. Nevertheless, said NBC, "The captain conceded to reporters that . . . his men do think about the innocent Libyan civilians who have died in U.S. attacks. . . ."

Gradually the networks' message was getting through: The fact that some civilians had been killed meant this new raid was a failure.

"You and the Defense Department now acknowledge that the United States may have been responsible for civilian casualties in Libya," CBS anchor Dan Rather told Secretary of Defense Caspar W. Weinberger in an interview. "Does that alter your view that the raid was a success?"

"The reports that you're giving credence to—for example, that Qaddafi's children were killed—those are Libyan reports," Mr. Weinberger replied. "There's absolutely no confirmation of that," he added, "except from Libyan sources, which have been something far less than reliable in the past."

Mr. Weinberger's comments were like water rolling off a duck's back.

The Libyans were innocent until proven guilty. The White House was guilty until proven more guilty.

"Counting those buried yesterday in Benghazi," reported NBC's Steve Delaney from Tripoli, "the official Libyan death toll is 37. There was only one soldier," he added, "among the fatalities."

One soldier? After air raids on five terrorist-related military targets, in which tons of explosives were dropped?

White House claims were treated with skepticism unless substantiated in spades. Key Libyan assertions were instantly accepted as facts.

ABC's "Nightline" devoted four programs to the Libyan attack, focusing on the discontent of our allies and alleged CIA connivance in setting up the Libyan terrorist network, among other topics.

CNN's "Crossfire" also devoted a week's worth of programs to the subject.

"We really can look like jerks," said Phil Donahue, who, on his Libya show, got no argument from two of his three guests, Christopher Hitchens (of The Nation) and Sanford Unger (of American University). "We swagger, we swagger." Mr. Donahue added, swaggering.

Thursday evening the networks finally aired full segments about the five terrorist-related targets of the raid. Why? The Pentagon had provided them with some gripping footage, recorded during the bombing runs.

The film, and follow-up reconnaissance, showed that the raid had been deadly accurate, destroying MIGs and Soviet-made cargo planes, as well as barracks. All the intended targets had been hit, only one plane was lost. . . .

Ho-hum.

Who cared how much damage had been done to terrorist targets? Civilians had died, and that meant the attack on Libya would fail to curtail terrorism. The problem was, no network newsman was able to explain exactly why, until former President Jimmy Carter came along.

"If 17 years ago, someone had killed Amy . . ." Mr. Carter told network television, "I would have sworn that as long as my life existed, I would retaliate."

Mr. Carter had synthesized the networks' dangling twin themes (civilian casualties, and the tactical futility of retaliation) into a moral excuse for more murder.

On cue, the bodies of three British hostages were found outside Beirut, Lebanon. One of the three was reported to be a United Nations employee named Alec Collett. CBS and NBC showed Mr. Collett's son, in Los Angeles, saying that President Reagan and British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher were "responsible, and . . . no better than murderers themselves for this act of treachery."

The next day, the two networks had to eat crow: Mr. Collett had been mistakenly identified. He was not one of the trio of slain hostages. Who had been killed? An American named Peter Kilburn. The networks substituted Mr. Kilburn's nephew and niece in place of Mr. Collett's son. On national television they, too, blamed Mr. Reagan for their uncle's death.

Now network television was trampling over familiar turf, worn thin during the Iran crisis, and the TWA crisis, and the Achille Lauro crisis. the hostage families (whose loved ones had guns pointed at their heads) were called in front of the cameras to condemn their country.

By the week's end, pathos was giving way to panic.

Watching the "CBS Evening News" in an airport lounge, New York Times columnist Flora Lewis wrote last Sunday: "I wondered what we were doing to ourselves. One day Americans were puffed-up supermen, proudly telling each other that nobody can push them around. The next day," she added, "people were quivering, not at terrorism but in self-induced terror, to a degree no Libyan leader could possibly achieve."

The transformation was proof of the power of television.

VOTE ON JOURNAL OF TUESDAY, APRIL 22, 1986

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow morning I intend to get a vote on the Journal and I thought I would use the time to explain the reason for getting the vote on the Journal.

Today in an action on the House floor, by unanimous consent the outside earnings of Members of Congress were raised by $7,500. In other words, we received a backdoor pay increase on the floor today.

Tomorrow what I intend to do is ask the House to vote down the Journal so that we can vacate the proceedings by which that action was taken. An amendment to the Journal that would knock out the proceedings by which that action took place would in fact eliminate the action and we would therefore be back to square one.

Since it is clear that the action was taken without the proper consultation which is supposed to be accorded to this House before such actions are taken by unanimous consent, we ought to go back to square one and at least assure that before such a unanimous-consent resolution is brought before the House again that all the appropriate leadership is checked with.

That was not done today and the only recourse left to the House then is to try to knock it out by amending the Journal tomorrow. So I will ask for a "no" vote on the Journal. Should the Journal be voted down, I will have an amendment prepared that will knock out that part of the Journal which was the action that resulted in the back door pay increase for Members of Congress.

So I would hope that the Members tomorrow will understand in voting for the Journal that there is a substantive matter involved on it and I will try to have information on the floor to point out the substance of the matter at that point.

NUCLEAR WASTE REPOSITORY STATEMENT, REPRESENTATIVE SNOWE LEGISLATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, in 1982, the Congress and the President of the United States approved a law which called for the creation of a primary and a secondary nuclear waste repository.

The need for this legislation was obvious. As a Nation, we are presently creating 2,000 tons of nuclear waste each year and storing this hazardous waste material in temporary sites around our country. A safe and permanent way to store this waste is badly needed and we are already moving toward opening our first permanent site around 1998.

In the process of selecting the primary site, DOE has investigated a number of sites around the country and has now narrowed the choice to three finalists. This process has already cost the country billions of dollars, and more will be spent before the first site is opened.

But the Department of Energy is also moving ahead on creating a secondary site, just as the bill has ordered them to do. They have selected 12 sites around the country, which range from Georgia to Maine to Minnesota, and will spend $760 million in this next fiscal year just to begin testing these sites.

Mr. Speaker, there is no need for our Nation to spend this money now on testing for a secondary site.

The selection of a secondary nuclear waste repository is not feasible, practical, nor does it make any common sense.

The testing cost alone for the 12 selected sites over the next 7 years is over $5 billion.

This $5 billion expense must be reexamined in light of budget realities and the Gramm-Rudman cuts. With $5 billion, we could:

Build two space shuttles;

Provide an additional 846,000 students with educational aid for 1 year;

Provide school lunches and child nutrition programs for the Nation for 1 year; and Drastically reduce the cost of Medicare and other health costs.

I understand that the prices we pay for technological advances are high and are necessary, but to even consider a secondary site at this time of financial trauma for America makes no common sense.

It is estimated that the first primary site selected will take almost seven decades to fill, once our legislation which lifts the arbitrary storage ceiling is passed.

The entire process of selecting and preparing a site for nuclear waste storage takes less than two decades—so any actions we take now to prepare for a secondary site are premature and even harmful.

The testing process is estimated to take 5 years or more. During this period, communities under consideration will suffer from deteriorating community and industrial development at a time when it can least be afforded. Economic momentum will be devastated in some areas. Personal anguish by the citizens is already intense.

In this time of budget cuts, we need to be practical and economical in actions we take. If in the process of selecting the primary site, we find two or even three sites which could be used for storage or nuclear waste, then it would make economic and budgetary sense for us to use one of those sites as a secondary repository when it is needed.

But the time to look for a secondary site is not now, and this is money which we can and we should find other ways to spend.

Mr. Speaker, today I join 22 of my colleagues in introducing legislation which, if passed, will legislatively eliminate the requirement for a secondary site in a different geographical location.

This bill, if passed, will head us in the right direction and it will eliminate in a legislative way and provide a measure that will eliminate this provision which is not practical, not feasible, and does not make common sense in searching, seeking, and spending money for a secondary site.

I am pleased to be an original cosponsor. I will work for its passage. I encourage my colleagues to consider this legislation and to become a full cosponsor.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Colorado [Mrs. SCHROEDER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, due to official business duties, I had to miss the vote on H.R. 4392, Control of the Plague. Had I been present, I would have voted "yes."

AMERICAN BUSINESSES ARE PAYING $2 BILLION A YEAR TO QADHAFI

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUSTAMANTE] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BUSTAMANTE. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in applauding President Reagan's bold action against Libya last week. We have now established a clear policy on international terrorism.

The evidence linking Libya to the bombing of a German nightclub in which one American soldier was killed and many others injured is incontrovertible.

Given that evidence, the United States had every moral, legal, and national security obligation to act militarily.

I am proud of the performance of our Air Force pilots who conducted their recent bombing mission in Libya with precision and quickness. At the same time, Mr. Speaker, I am embarrassed that five American Fortune 500 corporations still continue to do business as usual in that country.

The continued presence of Occidental Petroleum, Conoco, Amerada Hess, Marathon Oil, and W.R. Grace & Co. undercuts the purpose of economic sanctions. These companies are not there illegally. They were exempted from President Reagan's January Executive Order mandating the disinvestment of U.S. commercial interests.

Their presence represents an important revenue source for financing Libya's terrorist campaign. According to Dr. Henry Schuler, a good friend and specialist on the Middle East at the Georgetown Center for Strategic and International Studies. Five United States companies paid an estimated $2 billion in taxes last year to Libya.

That amount accounts for nearly one-fourth of Libya's national budget, and for nearly all of its hard currency.

I am disappointed with the reaction of some of our key allies to the U.S. military attack. But I am equally disappointed that our resolve to impose effective economic sanctions against Libya is subject to question. I urge the President to call on those companies to withdraw their interests. Current circumstances dictate that the President implement an economic sanctions' policy that is clear and unequivocal. The President has squarely framed the conditions for future military engagement. Our position on economic sanctions should be no less resolute.

To W.R. Grace & Co., Occidental Petroleum, Conoco, Amerada Hess, and Marathon, I urge you to leave Libya. Libya is at war with the free world. It is your tax dollars which are financing the missiles which are aimed at our F-111's. The line has been drawn in the sand. Whose side are you on?

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE 71ST COMMEMORATION OF ARMENIAN MARTYRS' DAY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. PASHAYAN] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. PASHAYAN. Mr. Speaker, no crime against humanity is more heinous than genocide, regardless of the perpetrator. This Congress, this President, and scores of others who served before us have expressed this Nation's concern for the first genocide of the 20th century, that imposed on the Armenian people in the Ottoman Turkish Empire.

This body visited the issue last year and came to no true resolution, but the depth of this concern has been the subject of four special orders in this Congress. Today marks the fifth such discussion.

One of the previous special orders addressed the concerns of the Congress as far back as 1896. Another reviewed the records of Presidents as far back as Benjamin Harrison, Grover Cleveland, and Theodore Roosevelt. Yet another revisited the coverage of events in the Ottoman Turkish Empire by the news media. This past April 24 the Congress also commemorated the 70th anniversary of Armenian Martyrs' Day. Today we mark the 71st year in which a series of events culminated in the first genocide of the 20th century, and that served as a precedent for the Holocaust that was to follow one-quarter of a century later in Nazi Germany.

But I am familiar with the rhetoric whereby history of the events between 1915 and 1923 is attempted to be rewritten.

Since coming to Congress, I have urged that the historians and others search into the charges and countercharges. I have offered to the Government of Turkey, "Let us talk." Regrettably, that has not yet occurred.

Let us today focus on the simple issue before us: To commemorate an event that did occur and the tragic loss of two of every three Armenians who resided in the Ottoman Turkish Empire then in history.

The United Nations last year adopted a document calling the 1915 Armenian massacre a genocide. Thus again the ongoing efforts of today's Turkish Government to distort the Armenian genocide have been refuted in an international forum.

As California Gov. George Deukmejian asked:

> If Turkey is a mature society, it should be able to acknowledge its past mistakes. . . It is time that Turkey admitted its role in the Armenian Genocide, and it is time that the President and the Congress stopped buckling under to Turkish pressure to deny this simple historical truth.

Mr. Speaker, indeed the world cannot bury its head in the sand because of the events of the past. Elie Weisel, a survivor of the Holocaust, reminds us all that "the opposite of love, I have learned, is not hate but indifference."

As leaders in the most free and tolerant nation, we have the responsibility to remember and to speak out. Indeed, we have a responsibility not to forget the dead, but to learn from history.

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PASHAYAN. I am glad to yield to my colleague.

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentleman for taking this special order on the Armenian massacre, or to be characterized in its proper form, notwithstanding the delinquency on the part of the House to recognize it as genocide of Armenians. I guess it is a forerunner of the House in the past and the world has universally acknowledged the holocaust. How do you make the distinction?

Some of the very same people who have supported resolutions for the holocaust have not supported this.

Mr. PASHAYAN. I think the gentleman raises an excellent point. I can see nothing but illogic between the two, because they were like actions, perpetrated by two different governments indeed. There is no logic why a Member should support the one and not support the other.

Mr. BIAGGI. That is the conclusion I arrived at.

The gentleman might be pleased to know that the Armenian community on Sunday last had a rally of significant proportions in Times Square in the city of New York, once again focusing attention on the Armenian massacre.

I think it is important, as the gentleman says, that the Turkish Government come of age.

□ 1810

We are not foistering blame on the present Turkish Government for this massacre.

Mr. PASHAYAN. That is true. The Republic of Turkey, which is the constituted government of the nation of Turkey today, was not responsible for the events of its predecessor government, which took place under the Ottoman Turkish Empire, and that was a separate and distinct government because, as the gentleman knows, the Ottoman Turkish Empire functioned under a different constitution. There was an entire change of constitution and of national character in 1923, and this government is certainly not responsible.

It is strange, indeed, it is unenlightened, indeed, that this government does not admit what a predecessor government did.

Mr. BIAGGI. The fact of the matter is, the historical fact is that it did occur. We know it. Why do we tend to make a distinction between one and the other. They are both heinous and should be recognized as such, and should be put forward and focused upon for all humanity to understand that this has occurred, and hopefully we have learned lessons from it.

Mr. PASHAYAN. I thank the gentleman for taking his time, and for the support that he offers.

Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PASHAYAN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. COELHO. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I appreciate also the gentleman taking this special order to give those of us who agree with his position an opportunity to acknowledge what has occurred.

I think, as the gentleman has pointed out, it is time for the Turkish Government to come of age and to understand that what happened in the Ottoman Empire does not mean that they have to be responsible for it; that they ought to be like the West Germans of today, understanding what happened in prior governments. They regret it, but they are open about it and, consequently, there is no ill will toward the current government in Germany.

The current government in Turkey refuses to acknowledge, accept, understand a fact of life and, consequently, there is a lot of ill will toward the current government of Turkey by many people who would not normally have this feeling and it is unfortunate that that is the case.

I would hope that at some point the Turkish Government would accept historical fact. I think that one of the concerns that I have is that, starting in 1982, the current administration, the Reagan administration, joined in with the efforts of the Turkish Government to try to change history. As the gentleman in the well knows, they were successful in getting the Department of State records changed to show that the massacre did not occur.

That was rectified to some extent, but not corrected. We still have the situation today where our government, the current government, is the first in many, many years that has failed to recognize that the massacre did occur, and as the Governor of California and the gentleman in the well, both of Armenian ancestry, pointed out, all you have to do is talk to those who went through it, talk to Government officials here in the United States and other countries who went through it, to know that it was a fact of life, but to sit back and try to deny it is a sham and it is something that this Government of the United States should not stoop to that level and should not even be requested by the Government of Turkey to do it.

It is a time to sit back and to recognize Martyrs' Day and to recognize that this is now the 71st anniversary of Martyrs' Day, and for the Armenian-Americans all across this country and, of course, people of Armenian ancestry all across the world, they should know that many of us in the U.S. Government do recognize that the massacre did occur and that we will continue to recognize this day and to continue to try to work on the U.S. Government to change its policy.

Mr. Speaker, I rise along with my colleagues today in observance of a day which is important to each and every one of us—Armenian Martyrs Day which is celebrated on April 24. This date marks the 71st anniversary of the beginning of the genocide of 1.5 million Armenians by the Ottoman Empire. It is not just a tragedy which is to be commemorated only by the Armenians, rather it is an opportunity for us as mankind to reflect on our history and contemplate our future. The killing of 1.5 million Armenians was an intentional act by the Ottoman government to eliminate a Christian minority within the vast confines of a Moslem empire just as Hitler sought to eliminate Jewish men, women, and children in order to ensure the purity of the Aryan race. Both were efforts to create a homogenous society.

Both of these tragedies are examples of man's inhumanity to man. But more importantly, they both provide us examples of what may arise in extreme instances of man's intolerance of man—perhaps because either one group's language, religion, or culture may be foreign to anothers.

We need to constantly be reminded of these incidents to prevent them from being committed again. As a modern society, we like to consider ourselves civilized, and yet this concept has not prevented leaders from trying to eliminate whole races of people who did not fit into their plans.

This year is perhaps more significant than others in our efforts to recognize and commemorate the Armenian genocide. As the 71st anniversary, we commence with the eighth decade of observing this tragedy. As the years pass, fewer and fewer Armenian genocide survivors remain. But the memory of this tragedy remains.

The genocide itself is well-documented by its survivors as well as U.S. Presidents, Members of Congress, Senators, and high-ranking diplomats from the early 1900's through 1923. I feel that it is a disgrace that the Reagan administration has sought to ignore this documentation and has continued to argue that the evidence in support of an effort on behalf of the Ottoman Empire to kill off 1.5 million Armenians is vague. Why in 1982—almost 70 years after the event—did the administration choose to change official U.S. position on the Armenian genocide? I offer that it has a matter of convenience. It is easier to rewrite history than it is to confront the past and deal with it appropriately in terms of our relationship with the modern Republic of Turkey.

Despite the desire of the Reagan administration to ignore this history, I feel strongly that it is very important for us to be reminded of it. We must not forget the lessons of this tragedy—not only for the Armenian survivors and the Armenian people, but for ourselves as members of this brotherhood we call mankind.

Mr. PASHAYAN. I appreciate the gentleman taking his time, and would add to his remarks that it is, indeed, puzzling and unfortunate that the administration has taken the position that it has through the Department of State to oppose the efforts of this body to state a simple historical truth, and it is especially puzzling and unfortunate because the President himself, in several remarks, has acknowledged the existence of the Armenian genocide and, therefore, the position taken by the administration and the Department of State appears, as I say, especially puzzling and especially unfortunate.

Mr. COELHO. I think we need to make clear, as the gentleman knows, that the President in some of the meetings with the leadership and others, has indicated his opposition to what we were trying to do here in the House. So it is not just the Department of State and others. It comes from the White House on down.

But today is a day to recognize what actually did occur, and to celebrate on this day. So I applaud the gentleman for taking this special order.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, on this solemn occasion, I join with my colleagues in today's special order to remember the fate of hundreds of thousands of innocent Armenians who died 70 years ago. This tragedy was, indeed, one of the most ghastly crimes against humanity on record.

In 1915, the Ottomans began a 9-year campaign of bloodletting and massacre which resulted in the death of some 1.5 million Armenians. The term "Armenian genocide" was born of this epic tragedy. This year marks the 71st anniversary of the beginning of that sad event and it is important that we focus attention on this and other genocides of the 20th century. I believe that this special order will serve to reaffirm American resolve to work for the prevention of massive human suffering.

Time after time, man has dispensed with his essential compassion for his fellow man and replaced it with a horribly destructive malice that has shaken the very foundations of our civilization. By remembering these past lapses that defy the imagination, we can hope to prevent these abuses against innocent people from happening again.

Let us all reflect today on the needless suffering that has historically taken place in the world and continue to do our part to raise the specter of past atrocities in an effort to prevent future tragedies.

Mr. LEHMAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I stand proudly today, with my colleagues who also share my deep commitment, to honor and remember the victims of the Armenian genocide on the occasion of its 71st anniversary.

We are here today because we are committed to the truth about the Armenian genocide. We are committed to the cause of the more than 600,000 Armenians living in this country that has been all but forgotten by this administration. The facts of the Armenian genocide are as clear to us as they were to our predecessors in the House who spoke here on this floor about the atrocities in Ottoman Turkey. The truth about the genocide was clear to Henry Morganthau, former U.S. Ambassador to Turkey between 1913 and 1916, when he reported back to officials in Washington that, after visiting the Armenian territories in 1919, he had witnessed the "most colossal crime of all ages."

The present Government of Turkey refuses to address the facts and has tried to influence other governments into officially denying that the genocide ever took place. More importantly, they have succeeded in holding hostage Americans of Armenian descent, who for decades have sought peaceful means to address their grievances. Rather than pressuring the U.S. Government into accepting that a genocide never took place, and rewriting history to ignore the massacre, the issue remains like an open wound for those who carry the reminders of the genocide in their memories of their loved ones.

As I have done many times before and will continue to do as long as it is necessary, I come to this House with a commitment to see that the Armenian genocide is recognized for what it was—a planned extermination of a race. I speak on behalf of all Armenians when I say that we will work to prevail in our efforts to recognize historical fact.

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I wish to reiterate my strong convictions about the subject of this special order. I am a proud cosponsor of House Joint Resolution 192 which would officially recognize April 24 as a national day of remembrance of man's inhumanity to man. This resolution was before the House for consideration late last year but action was never completed.

I recently joined as a cosigner of a letter to President Reagan urging him to issue a proclamation calling on the American people to observe April 24 as a national day of remembrance for all victims of genocide, especially those Armenians who suffered at the hands of those in the Ottoman Turkish Government between the years 1915 to 1923.

April 24 of this year will mark the 71st anniversary of the Armenian genocide. It is a day of immense importance to the 600,000 Armenians living in the United States who still vividly recall the memory of their 1.5 million ancestors who were the first victims of genocide in the 20th century.

As I said earlier, it is time to put an end to the effort to distort history. It is time that the United States ended its policy of nonfeasance with respect to the Armenian massacre. It did exist, it cannot be wished away. It cannot be ignored. Rather it should be recognized for precisely what it was—a holocaust in the literal and brutal sense of the word. Yet to continue to deny it as a part of history or to attempt to deny it was genocide allows the perpetration of the horror.

No one who supports the enactment of House Joint Resolution 192 would take issue with the fact that Turkey is an ally of the United States. Yet that fact in and of itself should not serve as a justification to blot out history. The modern Turkish Government is not responsible for the deeds of its predecessors, the good or the horrible. Yet they continue to exert their influence to block passage of this resolution.

I recall the communication directed to Congress by our Ambassador to Turkey, Robert Strausz-Hupé, who opposed passage of House Joint Resolution 192 saying it "would be a gratutious insult." I contend in addition to the communication itself being inappropriate, the greater insult being promoted is against the Armenian people by failure to adopt this resolution.

Our failure to recognize April 24 does a disservice to the recognition of history but also to the ongoing efforts to educate and work toward the prevention of future holocausts. That is the issue we must contend with.

I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this special order and hope that in the not too distant future, we will be able to observe April 24 as a national day of remembrance of mans inhumanity to man. It will be the just thing to do for the victims and the survivors of the Armenian genocide.

Mr. MAVROULES. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of a commemoration is twofold: First we must remember what happened, relive those feelings, and honor those who suffered; then, with the memory fresh in our minds, we must make sure that it does not happen again.

The Armenians take time every April 24 to remember something painful, something that would be easier to forget: the genocide of their people in 1915. Today we join with the surviving Armenians to take a moment to reflect on the horror of that April of 71 years ago. Images that come to mind are of men being led away from their homes to be hanged or stabbed out in the fields, and women and children loading up all their possessions in a wagon only to be led out and abandoned in a desert.

With these images in my mind, I share the rage, shock, and fear that Armenians must be feeling. What happened was wrong and must be recognized as such. As uncomprehensible as the act of genocide may seem, it happened.

Denial is a human response, and this is exactly what the Turkish Government is doing with the Armenian genocide today. They are constantly denying that the genocide happened, afraid to admit to having done something so horrible. This aggressive denial even has the United States doubting the reality of the incident.

It is this questioning by Turkey and by the United States of well-documented historical events that frustrates American-Armenians. Armenians would like to go on with their lives, continue their cultural development, and forge a new history. But they are forced to focus on this one particular event. Because it is not being allowed to be a permanent part of world history, Armenians must put all their efforts into keeping this chapter of their history book open.

Turkish denial can be understood in terms of human behavior and one's natural aversion to taking responsibility for something bad that has happened. But this type of behavior must not be supported by the concurrence of the United States.

If we consider ourselves the strongest, most powerful nation in the world, not afraid of anyone or anything, then why is it difficult to acknowledge this incident? What happened to our ideals of truth, justice, and honesty? Where is our backbone? If Turkey can get us to deny the basic truth of an event that took place 71 years ago, what will other allies be able to get us to say, do, and believe?

Let's allow the Armenians the luxury of turning the page on that horrible period of their history. We must learn the lesson and promise that it will not be forgotten.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Speaker, each year we gather on the floor of the House to mark the occasion of Martyr's Day. This year I come here troubled.

Oh, there is good news this year. In February, the Senate ratified the Genocide Treaty. It took almost four decades to win acceptance. That's a long time. The fact that we won approval in the end demonstrates the benefits of persistence.

The Genocide Convention, of course, is largely symbolic. By itself, it isn't going to prevent future genocides. Not at all. But it is important symbolism because it puts on paper our unwillingness as a society to tolerate future genocides. As many proponents of the treaty, including me, have said: It sends a signal to the would-be genociders to think again, because the world has said it is prepared to punish you.

So, why should I come here troubled today with this clear-cut achievement fresh in our memories.

I come here troubled because I see movement in the wrong direction at the same time as we ratified the Genocide Treaty. Despite our efforts for more than 2 years, we have been unable to enact a simple resolution by which the Federal Government would recognize Martyr's Day. We came very close last year, but not close enough.

I come troubled because I see that our efforts to pass this resolution—which is purely symbolic—have been stymied. They have been stymied largely by the efforts of the Turkish Government, which has pulled out all the stops to convince Members to oppose this simple resolution to recognize the origin of the Armenian genocide in the Ottoman Empire during 1915.

I come troubled because this sends the wrong message. This sends the opposite message from our ratification of the Genocide Treaty. If the Genocide Treaty says, "Think again, we are prepared to punish you," then the nonpassage of the Martyrs' Day resolution says, "Think again, if you're powerful enough and vocal enough, you can rewrite history."

I come troubled because I heard Members during last year's debate on the Martyrs' Day resolution say that nothing serious happened in the Ottoman Empire during World War I. Oh, some Armenians died, but those were difficult times; the war had disrupted normal life—but there was no conscious effort to exterminate the Armenian as a people. How can we stand in this august Chamber and mouth such things?

I come troubled because I remember each year that quotation we all recall so vividly on this day. Before planning the final solution, Adolf Hitler asked, "Who remembers the Armenians?" Those of us who gather here each year in April to mark the start of the genocide do remember the Armenians. But we are not a majority.

I come troubled because this body has memorialized the Armenian genocide something like a dozen times. But now, for 2 years in a row, including the year of the 75th anniversary of the genocide, we have failed to do so.

I come troubled because there are too many who not only fail to remember, but choose to forget.

I come troubled because peoples who refuse to remember history are condemned to repeat it.

In 1919, President Wilson was so moved by the tragedy in Armenia that he explored the idea of sending troops there. In 1921, President Harding was so disturbed that he asked his Secretary of State if it would help to send an American warship to Armenia. Harding's knowledge of geography was poor, but his soul wasn't dead.

I come troubled because I wonder what others might have to say about our soul today.

I come troubled because I have, not a dream, but a nightmare—a nightmare in which the band of Members gathering in this Chamber each year dwindles, because there are too few who wish to remember and too many who choose to forget.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that after 40 years my country has at last ratified the Genocide Treaty.

But I come troubled here today because that is not enough. That is not enough.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join my colleagues in paying tribute to the 1½ million Armenians massacred between 1915 and 1923. Seventy-one years ago, Ottoman Turkey began carrying out systematic genocide of the Armenian people. Two months ago, the Senate finally approved the Genocide Convention, acknowledging our resolve to work to prevent mass human destruction wherever it takes place.

It is now time for us in this body to reaffirm our commitment to opposing acts of genocide and those forces which perpetrate it. The Armenian massacre was possible due to the silence of the international community. The Holocaust was carried out under a similar cover of international silence. We can not afford to be silent again.

It is the responsibility of the Congress, the President, and the American people to assure that such tragedies never recur. Reports of genocide are always easier to ignore than to believe, but by ignoring them we become complicit in the crime. Reports of the massacres of Armenians, Russians, and Jews were all ignored at the cost of millions of lives. America must be certain that similar reports are never again ignored.

I ask my colleagues to join me in paying tribute to the 1.5 million Armenians who were massacred 71 years ago. Let us be certain that, as a result of our vigiliance and our opposition to such acts, acts of genocide will never be carried out again.

Mr. ANUNNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join my distinguished colleagues, Hon. CHARLES PASHAYAN, JR., of the 17th District of California and Hon. TONY COELHO of the 15th District of California in commemorating the 71st anniversary of the Armenian Genocide of 1915.

One and one-half million Armenians were the first 20th-century victims of "genocide," a term coined by Raphael Lemkin, whose efforts at the League of Nations in 1933 later gave rise to the Genocide Treaty which has been debated in the U.S. Senate for 37 years and which finally was ratified a few months ago.

I am personally pleased over the ratifications of this treaty because it gives formal recognition to America's moral commitment, and further, it is a positive effort toward averting wholesale slaughter of other peoples. After all, it happened to the Armenians, to the Jews, to the Cambodians, and so many others—and unless we remain ever vigilant, a similar tragedy could easily reoccur.

Mr. Speaker, at this point in the RECORD I would like to include a February 21, 1986, editorial from the Washington Post commending the U.S. Senate for their positive action in ratifying the Genocide Treaty.

The Post editorial follows:

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 21, 1986]

FINALLY, THE GENOCIDE TREATY

It was unusual to hear U.S. Senators speak of their fathers during the course of debate on the genocide treaty this week. But because the treaty had been stalled in the Senate for more than a generation, it should not come as a surprise that men long dead were involved in the drama that preceded the agreement. But at times the debate became personal and so, as it should for each of us did the subject.

Sen. Rudy Boschwitz spoke of his father, a Jewish judge in Germany, who came home on that January day in 1933 when Hitler took power, and told his family that they were leaving the country. After almost three years, moving through half a dozen countries, the Boschwitz family was finally admitted to the United States; many relatives who had not acted as quickly perished in the Holocaust.

After recounting this story, Sen. Boschwitz spoke at length and with great respect, of Herbert Pell, father of Sen. Claiborne Pell, who served on President Roosevelt's War Crimes Commission and was in effect fired from a high State Department position because he pressed, with too much enthusiasm, the cause of genocide victims.

Sen. Pell then pointed out that another member of the Foreign Relations Committee had reason to be proud of his father: Sen. Christopher Dodd's father Thomas—who also served as a senator from Connecticut—had been a prosecutor at the Nuremberg war crimes trials which helped bring the staggering facts of Nazi-era genocide to the world's attention.

The treaty was written soon after World War II, and it is as relevant to Armenians, Cambodians and others as it is to Holocaust victims. Sent to the Senate for advice and consent in 1949, the pact has been controversial because of unjustified fears that it would somehow override the U.S. Constitution, subject citizens to criminal trial in international courts or give rise to charges against this country based on segregation laws or Vietnam war activities. Through 37 years, though, there were always senators urging debate and ratification and deploring the United States' failure to agree to the document. Sen. William Proxmire in particular distinguished himself in this effort. President Reagan's strong support, announced in 1984, and Sen. Richard Lugar's skilled negotiating were also crucial in persuading undecided senators.

Ratifying this treaty will not end genocide, which continues even today. But it does give formal recognition to this country's moral commitment. This generation has now completed the work of another, begun many decades ago. Supporters of the treaty through this long period can share a sense of accomplishment and pride.

I would also like to include an editorial from the Chicago Tribune of April 25, 1985, which condemns "the stubborn refusal of Turkey's Government and people to acknowledge that the (Armenian) massacre ever happened."

The Tribune editorial follows:

[From the Chicago Tribune, Apr. 25, 1985]

NOW IT IS 70 YEARS

Anniversaries of Turkey's massacre of its Armenian citizens—which began in April of 1915—have changed their character. By now the observance is not so much a mourning for the dead, or the hideous manner in which most of them died. That was 70 years ago, and enough horrors have happened since to blur the memory.

Only one thing keeps this wound fresh among all the wounds the world has suffered. It is the stubborn refusal of Turkey's government and people to acknowledge that the massacre ever happened.

The time for mourning the dead may have passed. What is still to be mourned is the strange, perverse ability of human beings to deny reality and to keep denying it, apparently forever.

The Turks do not want to remember the systematic killing of more than a million men, women and children. No nation could. But there is a right way and a wrong way to get rid of an evil memory: to cleanse it, or to repress it. For 70 years Turkey has clung to the wrong way. It has tried to erase a historical fact from everyone's memory, to convince the world that such things are too dreadful to happen and therefore did not happen.

That is the purpose of observing this anniversary: to make clear that the self-deception has not yet succeeded. And if it has not worked for Turkey in 70 years, it may not be worth trying any longer, for the Turks or anyone else.

Although the United States has attempted to rectify the injustices done to the American Indians, and the present German Government has forthrightly accepted responsibility for the crimes of its Nazi predecessors, the Turkish Government in sharp contrast stubbornly continues to deny any wrongdoing by its Ottoman Empire predecessors. This continuing denial appears almost ludicrous in light of extensive United States media coverage of the Armenian genocide at the time that it was actually taking place. In the New York Times alone, there were over 194 news articles about the Armenian genocide. A chronological listing of some of the headlines from articles which appeared in the New York Times and other leading publications of the day, follow:

Were the editors of the highly respected New York Times, the Literary Digest, and other similar publications printing facts or fiction? The answer is obvious and the facts are undeniable.

The horrible story of what happened to the Armenian people was accurately documented on a day-to-day basis in leading newspapers and publications of the day, and as time goes on, more and more people are becoming familiar with what happened to the Armenian people in 1915 at the hands of the Ottoman Empire.

Genocidal massacre, regardless of the nationality of the victims, can never be denied or repressed. For Turkey, it will fester, like an open wound, until a public admission of guilt is made, an expression of atonement is given, and an attempt follows to rectify injustices done to the innocent victims. Hopefully this will occur soon, for only then can this unfortunate chapter in world history be closed.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, today we again take the opportunity to pay tribute and recognition to Armenian Martyrs' Day. It is often asked why we continue to be concerned about an event that occurred over 60 years ago in another region of the world. It is the individuals who ask this question to whom I would like to address my remarks.

The purpose of our annual commemoration of this tragedy is to make it less likely that a similar event will occur in the future. During the period between 1915 and 1923, the Ottoman Turkish Government conducted a brutal persecution against the Armenian race within its borders. In this short 8-year period, 1.5 million Armenian men, women, and children were mercilessly murdered.

Such an atrocity is not the type of event any civilized person enjoys discussing, but it is not one that we can simply ignore or characterize as a unique episode in world history. In this century, the world has witnessed two events that have shown remarkable similarities to the Armenian genocide. The discovery of the Nazi concentration camps and the death of 6 million Jews at the conclusion of World War II as well as the atrocities that occurred in Cambodia in 1975 shocked and angered the world. Yet, if these latter events are closely studied, similarities with the Armenian genocide become obvious; the names and faces may have changed, but the results remain the same.

We do not rise today to embarrass an ally or blame the descendants of the perpetrators of this crime. We do not rise to express our tolerance for the actions of Armenian terrorist groups. We condemn their acts just as we condemn those of the Ottoman Empire against its Armenian population.

We pay heed to this event in order to prevent future generations from becoming the newest victims of genocide. The suffering and death that occurred in Europe and in Cambodia reflect the need to continue to bring the Armenian genocide to the attention of the Nation and the world.

No one has the power to alter what has occurred in the past, but collectively we have the opportunity to shape the future. However, in order to ensure that history does not repeat itself, we must never forget the lessons it has taught us. Today, we commemorate Armenian Martyrs' Day because, as past events in Europe and Cambodia reflect, we have not fully comprehended the lessons of the Armenian genocide. Through our continued acknowledgement of the Armenian tragedy and those that followed, we try to ensure that our children never feel the pain and sorrow of genocide that the Armenians, as well as the Jews and Cambodians, experienced. So, to those who ask why we continue to make reference to the Armenian genocide, I point to the millions of Jewish and Cambodian graves, and I point to our children, and ask them—why not?

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, honorable Members of the House and Senate, we have been brought together to reflect on one of the darkest moments in modern times. Seventy-one years ago, the Government of the Turkish Ottoman Empire unleashed a vicious campaign to systematically exterminate the Armenian people. In the next 8 years, 1.5 million Armenians were killed under Ottoman hands, and another one-half million were exiled from their homeland. Only 20 years later was a word invented that could capture the gravity and the horror of this act. The word is "genocide."

Genocide is recognized as the gravest crime known to man. It is beyond question that this heinous act was committed against the Armenian people in Ottoman Turkey in the early part of this century. Its occurrence has been confirmed by eyewitnesses Henry Morgenthau, U.S. Ambassador to the Ottoman Empire, and Kemal Ataturk, founder of modern Turkey; by authorities on genocide, Raphael Lemkin, who coined the term "genocide" and introduced it to the world, and Elie Weisel; and by both Presidents Carter and Reagan. Yet despite this extensive documentation, Armenians today find themselves in a vital struggle against an apparent willingness to cloud, and to ultimately extinguish any human memory of this epic tragedy.

We Americans have a deep and enduring sense of justice. The morality of our people, though often obscurred in the heat of political battle, can always be seen guiding the ship of American policy. We saw this last year as the President planned his trip to Bitburg. The American people view Germany as our close friend and ally, and without hostility. But our warmth toward the Germans will never dull our horror over the vicious crimes committed by the Nazi regime, or our firm sense of justice toward those who carried out the evil plan. Similarly, we cannot allow our close and important alliance with the Republic of Turkey to compromise our deeper sense of justice in the face of history. The Armenian genocide was one of the most savage crimes against humanity in history. By refusing to recognize it, the U.S. Government is perpetuating a dangerous and immoral lie, and is helping to keep open the possibility that somewhere, sometime, it may happen again.

I believe that we who are speaking out in this Chamber today represent the true voice of the American people. As such, we will never allow the Armenian genocide to be forgotten. We stand by the Armenian people in forever guarding the flame of justice that has served as a beacon both to our Nation, and to our civilization.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the gentleman from California for taking this special order commemorating the Armenian martyrs who, 71 years ago, were slaughtered in one of the world's worst acts of terrorism. In recalling the Armenian massacre we are reminded of the darkest moments in history. The suffering and conflict created by those horrible events remain a very real experience for those whose lives have been affected by it.

In celebrating the 71st anniversary of the Armenian genocide we are engaging in an act of remembrance. We do so to pause and reflect upon the Armenian experience, and to ensure that those events 71 years ago are never forgotten.

This exercise also serves to remind us that acts of barbarism and terrorism continue unchecked to this day. It is appalling that we live in a world where man is inhumane to man and where acts of terrorism have become commonplace. It is our responsibility to see that these acts are not forgotten. We are morally obligated to build toward a safer world where the rights of all are protected.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today as part of this special order to acknowledge and remember the tragic genocide of 1.5 million Armenians. Furthermore, I rise to express my deep regret that this Congress has not yet passed a resolution making April 24 a National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man.

It has been 71 years since the tragedy which wiped out 1.5 million Armenian men, women, and children; more than 7 decades since those people were marked by the Ottoman Empire for cultural genocide. To this day, I receive letters from my constituents who are survivors of this tragedy and were eyewitnesses to some of its horrors. More and more, those letters are being written by children or friends as the survivors are now too old to write for themselves.

Thus the task of remembering this tragic event becomes even more sacred. The truth must survive the eyewitnesses. When someone suggested to Hitler that world public opinion would be hostile to his "final solution of the Jewish problem," Hitler responded, "Who remembers the Armenians?"

Unfortunately, last December, this House did not remember the Armenians. After a lengthy and often heated debate on House Joint Resolution 192, to designate a National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man and particularly the Armenian tragedy, the Members of this House bowed to the pressure of the Turkish Government and defeated a friendly amendment, 213 to 206. This was not a proud day for this House, and I hope it is a day we can rectify in the near future.

The Turkish Government continues to battle this resolution and to deny that the massacres by the Ottoman government ever occurred. Moreover, the Turkish Government has made this issue a litmus test of support for our NATO ally Turkey.

To their denial I say that the truth of the reported massacres has been established by the survivors and by substantial evidence found in the records of the Congress. To their litmus test I say that if we acquiesce to our allies' rewriting of history and truth as a sign of our support, we shall be a nation stripped of our morality.

We are all aware of the 37 years it took the Senate to approve the Genocide Convention and to reaffirm America's resolve to work toward the prevention of mass human destruction. I would hope that our Armenian friends and constituents will not have to wait twice 37 years for their day of commemoration.

Mr. TORRES. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleagues from California, Mr. COELHO and Mr. PASHAYAN for requesting this special order on the anniversary of the Armenian genocide.

It is only right that we recognize and commemorate the genocide perpetrated on the Armenian people over 70 years ago.

Mr. Speaker, I have joined my colleagues on several different occasions bringing attention to events that devastated the Armenian people. The genocide is still alive in the memories of people of Armenian descent.

Over 70 years ago, between 1915 and 1923, more than 1½ million Armenians perished at the hands of the rulers of the Ottoman Empire. The Armenian people were nearly destroyed. I believe it is important that each year Congress bring this tragedy to the attention of the American people and the world.

It is unfortunate that we have to have legislation like House Joint Resolution 192 in Congress. It saddens me that man has been so cruel, so often that we must memorialize these events of genocide. I fear that to forget the genocide of Armenians and other groups would be a mistake. Genocide will not end with this resolution, but I hope it will cause us to reflect on man's inhumanity. Perhaps it will help us pledge to do better in the future. If this special order and House Joint Resolution 192 can achieve this simple goal, they are worth our support.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my colleagues in this special order commemorating the 71st anniversary of the Armenian genocide.

The genocide against the Armenian people of Turkey, perpetrated by a dying Ottoman Empire in 1915, remains one of the most significant events in world history. The degree of savagery with which it was undertaken, and the precedent it set for the monstrosity committed by Adolph Hitler in World War II, assures it of a permanent place in the collective memory of the world's nations and people. That the genocide occurred is an indisputable fact. The modern day tragedy of that event is that the pain and suffering of the Armenian people continues unabated to this day, due to the continued refusal of the Turkish Government to acknowledge that the genocide ever took place.

The level of man's inhumanity to man demonstrated by the Turkish regime of that era, has sadly been repeated by other governments in other countries since. Genocide, it is said, has four stages: identification, segregation, extermination, and denial. We continue to mark this day in world history in memory of those people who perished in the deserts of Der-El-Zor, in the hope that the collective conscience of the world will never countenance the denial of the event. We also mark this anniversary in the hope that in so doing we will prevent future acts of genocide. That requires vigilance, a vigilance that was sadly lacking in Hitler's Germany and, in more recent history, Cambodia. But, just as the Armenian people have persevered through a profound strength and faith, hope remains for mankind, that it might one day fully realize the horrendous enormity of such genocide. As part of that process, we must recognize and accept our past. It is in that spirit that we commemorate the Armenians that perished, and the strength of those Armenians that carry that legacy today.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleagues, especially my Californnia colleagues, Mr. COELHO AND MR. PASHAYAN, for organizing today's special order on the Armenian genocide.

This year marks the 71st anniversary of the Armenian genocide, in which 1.5 million men, women and children lost their lives in Turkey between 1915 and 23. The genocide began with the arrest and execution of leading intellectuals and clergymen and the murder of the young men drafted to serve in the Turkish Army. By 1923, one-half of the world's Armenian population had been massacred on its ancestral land which it had inhabited for more than 3,000 years.

Today we memorialize the Armenian martyrs. What happened 71 years ago was the first atrocious display of the 20th century of international neglect and passivity in the face of genocide. Unfortunately, we did not learn and the tragedy was repeated again in Germany and in Cambodia. It is important that not only Armenians, Cambodians, and Jews remember the atrocities of genocide, but that the rest of humanity also remembers these events. We have a moral responsibility to draw our attention to the tragedy of genocide and remind ourselves of its consequences so that it will not happen again.

Our Presidents, statesmen, and legislative bodies have repeatedly recognized the atrocities of the Armenian genocide. Henry Morganthau, U.S. Ambassador to the Ottoman Empire at the time, sent a telegram to the Secretary of State which stated that:

Deportation of and excesses against peaceful Armenians is increasing and from harrowing reports of eye witnesses it appears that a campaign of race extermination is in progress under a pretext of reprisal against rebellion.

President Reagan, in a 1981 proclamation regarding the victims of the Holocaust stated that:

Like the genocide of the Armenians before it, and the genocide of the Cambodians which followed it—and like too many other such persecutions of too many other peoples—the lessons of the Holocaust must never be forgotten.

Most recently in Congress, a resolution was introduced last year to designate April 24, 1986 as a "National Day of Remembrance of Man's Inhumanity to Man" especially for remembering the Aremenian genocide by the governments of the Ottoman Turkish empire.

It is our moral obligation to remember the tragedy of the Armenian genocide and work toward the prevention of mass human destruction. The consequence of this act has implications not only for surviving Armenians and their relatives, but for all of mankind. We must heed our own warnings and do all that we can to ensure that another genocide, that another race, ethnic group, or nationality does not face the atrocities which the Armenians faced 71 years ago. Therefore, it is appropriate that we join today in recognizing this tragic event in the hope that our combined efforts will help prevent such a recurrence.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, today another year is added to the legacy of the Armenian genocide, another year of Turkish denials, and terrorist violence that dishonors the memory of every martyred Armenian soul. As we reach the 71st anniversary of our century's first genocide, the Government of Turkey has intensified its image-building campaign in the mistaken belief that mere rhetoric can make their country part of the Western moral community. Strident assertions of innocence and outright fabrications are simply not part of the democratic character to which Turkey allegedly aspires.

It is indeed time for Turkey to join its NATO partners in moral as well as strategic solidarity against the Soviet threat, but among the many words spoken the right ones have not yet been heard. Turkey's real accession to the moral plane of its fellow alliance members can only begin with a recognition of the historical facts. Quite simply, the Armenian population of the Ottoman empire was, behind the shroud of a world war and civil confusion, deliberately, systematically, and mercilessly slaughtered. As part of a secret but official government policy of genocide, Ottoman soldiers herded, tortured, and murdered their victims for the crime of being Armenian. These facts cannot be denied any more than we can deny that Hitler, as a matter of state policy, murdered the Jews of Europe.

Time and again, year after year, the same is said. The genocide was real and Turkey will never be able to assume a mantle of honor until the past is recognized for what it was. Why must we continue to harangue the Turkish Government to admit the guilt of the Ottoman empire? Why do we not let go of the past and forge a new future with Turkey? Because of the Orwellian warning of what can happen to a community that rewrites history. If government authorities are allowed to rewrite a nation's history, then no one is left to challenge the direction that government chooses to take. If we allow the Turkish Government to erase every memory, wait until every witness dies, then the entire human community suffers. For we will have no evidence that it happened, that it was wrong, and that it mattered.

After 71 years, the time has come for Turkey to take the honorable path, the path taken by the Federal Republic of Germany, which has risen proudly from the most terrible human experience of this century. Only when Turkey chooses to acknowledge the truth of the Armenian genocide can it stand in moral unity with its NATO partners against the terrorism, against the uncertainties of the future, and against the bitterness of these terrible memories.

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my colleagues in commemorating the 71st anniversary of the beginning of the Armenian genocide. This terrible chapter in the history of mankind reaped the lives of 1.5 million Armenians. I join my colleagues with a sense of sorrow and dismay as we reflect upon this tragedy that spanned a number of years and decimated the Armenian population in the Ottoman empire while leaving innumerable scars on the survivors of this tragedy.

The Armenian people were not only deported and robbed of their lands and possessions but they were also subjected to cold-blooded massacres and atrocities and brutal extermination. Males were separated from their families and massacred while remaining women, children and the elderly were forced to march across Asia Minor to the Syrian Desert. Of these marchers, thousands died in route of starvation, exposure, and disease. Countless survivors witnessed the atrocities perpetrated upon their families, relatives and friends and these survivors still carry with them the memory and the scars of this genocide.

During this trying time, our Government and other governments around the world joined in condemning this systematic destruction of a particular group of citizens. Press reports and government studies all point to the fact that this tragedy did occur and those that will deny its occurance are denying history and fact. The most glaring aspect of this entire tragedy is the fact that the Turkish Government still continues to deny that this genocide ever occurred and explains the deaths of 1.5 million Armenians as having resulted from years of civil strife in the region.

This denial of history which has been documented by survivors, eyewitnesses, correspondents, U.S. Presidents, and even past Congresses, underscores the need for approving House Joint Resolution 192 and paying tribute to the memory of those who died while ensuring that future governments will not be able to deny these atrocities. House Joint Resolution 192, which I have cosponsored, designates a day of remembrance for the victims of the genocide but its intent has been misconstrued and its effects have been cast in the light of present-day relations between the United States and the Republic of Turkey.

I have joined several of my colleagues in sending a letter to the President requesting that he officially commemorate this 71st anniversary of the Armenian genocide. By commemorating this date and by remembering the many lives that were needlessly lost, we are in no way condemning the current Government of the Republic of Turkey or the Turkish people. Rather, we are calling attention to a significant chapter of the history of mankind as a way of preventing further tragedies. For when we continue to remember that man has the capacity to destroy as well as rebuild, we will be better able to ensure that genocides will no longer be a part of our future. We owe it to the future generations, to the survivors, and to the memories of those who died, to continue our vigilance and ensure that this tragic chapter of the history of mankind is never again ignored, forgotten or doubted.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my colleagues in paying tribute today to the million-and-a-half men, women and children who died in the Armenian genocide of 1915–23. This is the 71st anniversary of that horrendous event and I don't think it is a day that should go unnoticed in this body.

I would like to recall that half the Members of the House sponsored a resolution that would have designated April 24, 1986, as a day to remember man's inhumanity to man and all victims of genocide.

Sadly, because of tactics employed by the administration, the resolution did not come to a vote. The administration raised the specious argument that passage of the resolution would adversely affect our relations with the present government of Turkey, even though it clearly and specifically said it dealt with the atrocities of the Ottoman empire and in no way reflected on the present government.

April 24 is the date that people of Armenian ancestory commemorate the death of these million-and-a-half victims of horrible slaughter at the hands of the Ottoman empire's bloodthirsty agents.

I want to point out today, as I did at the time the resolution was on the floor, that we are in no way criticizing the Government of the Republic of Turkey, with whom we enjoy an excellent relationship.

At the same time I want to stress that this commemoration is very important to thousands of Armenian Americans who have contributed and continue to contribute so much to our Nation. And I want these people to know that Americans shudder at the very thought of what happened to their ancestors those many years ago. And not only to ancestors, for some of the older Armenian-Americans themselves are survivors of the horrible massacres.

And even though we failed to pass the resolution, I want all Armenian-Americans—and indeed the whole world—to know that we in America find that what happened earlier this century is a terrible blow to humanity, decency and all the virtures for which our country stands.

Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, today, I join my colleagues in commemorating a tragic event in 20th century history, the Armenian genocide of 1915.

I am struck by the horror of the first modern case of genocide. One-and-a-half-million people in Armenia were systematically and ruthlessly exterminated by the Ottoman government. A government, recognized and respected by other governments, attempted to extirpate a people, a culture from the face of the Earth. The Ottomans tried to change human history—to close a chapter in the story of humanity. The Ottomans did not succeed in their demented project. One-and-a-half-million men, women and children died, but the Armenian people still live, their culture and their history flourishes.

The horror of the Armenian genocide is made all the worse by the refusal of some people to acknowledge that it ever happened. They would like to ignore this sordid chapter of history. They plead that we cannot offend the sensibilities of our allies. They place concern for radar installations above regard for human life.

I take heart, Mr. Speaker, in the fact that the other body ratified the Genocide Convention on February 19, ending 37 years of sterile debate.

Today we should pause for a moment, open our hearts and remember those unfortunate people who lost their lives because they happened to be Armenian. Once we have done that we should increase our resolve that it never happen again.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, as you well know, genocide is the most horrible of all crimes. Although genocide is an action against a specific group of people, it has far-reaching consequences for humanity. Genocide robs the world community of its dignity and its most important natural resource: its people.

When I mention genocide, the Nazi Holocaust in which millions of Jews and Eastern Europeans were exterminated, first comes to mind. Over the past 40 years, there has been a concerted effort to educate people about the atrocities carried out by the Nazis during World War II. Yet there is another example of genocide which occurred only 30 years before World War II that receives little attention. Between 1915 and 1923, 1.5 million Armenians were exterminated by the Ottoman Turkish Government. These Armenians were neither rebels nor usuprers, but loyal Turkish citizens. The only crime of these 1.5 million men, women, and children was their Armenian heritage. Today we take a few moments to pay tribute to the men, women, and children who died in the Armenian genocide.

It has been 71 years since the beginning of the mass extermination of Armenians by the Ottoman Turkish Government, yet the effects of the crime still linger. Before World War I, 2,500,000 Armenian lived in the Ottoman Empire. Since the genocide, fewer than 100,000 declared Armenians reside in Turkey. For the Armenian community the atrocities of the early 1900's are still too real; however, little has been done to recognize this tragedy and make certain that it never occurs again.

It is alarming that this example of one of the most horrible crimes of the 20th century should go largely unrecognized for so long. While almost everyone remembers learning about the Holocaust, few people are aware of the great tragedy of the Armenian genocide. Today, we take this time to recognize and educate about the Armenian genocide, because very often the past serves as a blueprint of the future. As a nation and a member of the global community, we must prevent the mass extermination of peoples. This can only be accomplished through a greater knowledge and understanding of the past. We must directly face the history of genocide in order to prevent future atrocities.

If we ignore the problem of the Armenian genocide, we condemn our children to make the same mistakes that previous generations have made. For this reason, we pay tribute to the 1.5 million men, women, and children who perished at the hands of Ottoman Turkey. Hopefully, our solemn efforts today will ensure that we can prevent future atrocities from occurring.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, once again I appreciate the opportunity to add my statement to those of my colleagues who today remember and pay tribute to the one and a half million men, women, and children who were the victims of the Armenian genocide from 1915 to 1923.

There are many people today, living in the United States, whose relatives fell victim to the Armenian genocide. I have talked with some of them. They have told me their very personal and sad stories. They have told me how difficult it is to live with the knowledge of what happened. And, they have expressed their deep sadness and outrage that the Armenian genocide seems to be a forgotten event, that one of the most cruel horrors of modern history goes unnoticed and unacknowledged.

Elie Wiesel, as chairman of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council, said in 1981:

> Before the planning of the final solution, Hitler asked, "Who remembers the Armenians?" He was right. No one remembered them, as no one remembered the Jews. Rejected by everyone, they felt expelled from history.

This special order today is a time for us to remember this shocking period in world history. It is an opportunity for us to join with the generations of Armenians who must live with the knowledge of what has happened to their relatives and historically to their people.

All the memories of this painful time will pass through generations. What we are saying today is that the horror of those years must be known and understood and—like other atrocities against humanity—must find its place forever in the human heart and the human conscience.

I believe, as President Reagan has said in Proclamation 4838:

> Like the genocide of the Armenians before it, and the genocide of the Cambodians which followed it—and like too many other such persecutions of too many other peoples—the lessons of the Holocaust must never be forgotten.

Recognizing the Armenian genocide, as we have recognized the Holocaust, reminds us of what the very worst in human nature can bring about, and compels us to protect our future from the recurrence of such a nightmare. At all costs we must preserve for succeeding generations our dreams and hopes for a better, more humane world.

Mr. McHUGH. Mr. Speaker, we commemorate today the 1.5 million Armenian men, women, and children who were the victims of Ottoman massacres during the years from 1915 through 1923.

It is perhaps the saddest fact of our times that such destruction of a racial, religious, or social collectivity not only occurred, but has continued to reoccur in this century, and in various parts of the world—particularly in the Nazi Holocaust as well as in the extensive Soviet campaigns to exterminate dissident and potentially dissident minority blocs. To describe such systematic murder, Raphael Lemkin first used the term "genocide" in 1944; since then it has become part of our century's vocabulary, a sad reminder that although the human race has made much technological and social progress in this century, various nations have shown themselves to be capable of massive and hideous cruelty toward literally millions of innocent victims.

Today, as we remember the victims of the Armenian genocide early in this century, we are aware of the precarious situation in the world caused by the spread of terrorism. More and more people throughout our planet have become victims and potential victims of irrational, mindless destruction. This circumstance, of a world increasingly steeped in random violence, reminds us of the fundamental threat to our common humanity and survival whenever any group or nation resorts to violence as a way of asserting national, cultural or religious dominance.

Earlier this year, the Senate approved the U.N. Genocide Convention, an act which records our resolve as Americans to work toward the prevention of mass human destruction. Especially on this day, as we mourn the loss of over a million innocent Armenians early in this century, we pledge ourselves to redouble our efforts to seek a more peaceful world in which such monstrous crimes cannot reoccur.

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, I am torn between feelings of honor and sadness that Members of Congress are compelled to seek special time to remember the genocide against the Armenian people.

I am honored that this Congress, the greatest legislative body in the history of the world, is populated by decent and moral men and women who will take the time to keep the facts of genocide alive so that they will never again be repeated. As a Member of this House of Representatives I have a duty to call the attention of the American people to the truth of history and its implications for the future. We must learn truth and we must live truth if we are not to relive past horrors.

Our diplomatic representatives knew of the Armenian genocide. There are numerous cables and letters clearly laying out the systematic and planned nature of the actions against the Armenian people. Our political leaders knew about the genocide. And yet we did nothing about it. Much the same thing happened in Germany beginning in 1936 against the Jews. Very little was done about this situation until it was too late and the Second World War had begun and drawn a black curtain of death over Europe. More recently we have seen the mass destruction of the Cambodian people by their own rulers who used much the same model developed in 1915 by the Ottoman Empire and refined by the Nazis from 1936 to 1945.

Where was the world while these horrors were taking place? We knew or at least suspected that these things were happening, but the whole world seemed to withdraw into collective refusal to act against genocide. We cannot afford to let this happen again. Only by remembering and keeping history alive can we hope to deter a future Hitler of Idi Amin from the brutal and senseless slaughter of human beings.

I stand here today saddened because we still seem to have not learned the lessons of history. Some still try to deny or mitigate the truth for their own personal or political reasons. This seems to me to be the height of folly and irresponsibility. The denial syndrome can only weaken the moral foundation and resolve of a people and a nation. If strenuous efforts are made to rewrite history and deny the truth then who is to say where this process stops?

The better course, the only moral course, is to face the truth and deal with it in a useful way. To face the truth, no matter how horrible and ugly, and to use that truth to exorcise the spirit of evil and immorality that caused these events in the first place is the only proper way to deal with these issues. The fact that some people do not seem to be able to recognize the truth is a sad fact that we must fight and work against until all people everywhere learn the lessons of history and prepare themselves to prevent any future genocide.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you for recognizing us for this special order and I only hope that we may soon not need to use these methods of drawing attention to the truth.

Mr. MANTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend my colleagues for organizing today's special order in commemoration of the 71st anniversary of the Armenian genocide of 1915–23. It is important that today the Congress stresses our commitment to freedom and justice.

The tragic death of 1.5 million Armenians during the Ottoman Empire was the first genocide of the 20th century and remains one of the greatest crimes of this century. Unfortunately this genocide was ignored or forgotten by the world. Therefore, it was not the last genocide of the 20th century. Hitler himself said, "Who remembers the Armenians?"

I am firmly convinced that the Armenian genocide must never be forgotten. That is why I cosponsored and strongly supported House Joint Resolution 192 which would have designated April 26 as a day of remembrance of man's inhumanity to man, especially the victims of the Armenian genocide. I believe we must never forget those 1.5 million men, women, and children who died solely because of their ancestry. We have a duty to their memory, a duty to their families and the survivors to never let the world forget this great tragedy. Furthermore, we also have an important duty to our children to teach them the mistakes of the past. By doing so we will make certain that such tragedies are never repeated.

There are some who will say that the Armenian genocide did not happen. We know this to be untrue and there is a great body of evidence to refute this false claim. The American ambassador to the Ottoman Empire during the period of this genocide reported extensively on the continuing massacres and his efforts bring them to an end. Last August a U.N. human rights panel in Geneva specifically cited the Armenian genocide. Furthermore, in both 1975 and again in 1984, the House of Representatives passed a resolution marking the anniversary of the genocide and eight Presidents of the United States have protested the genocide. Most recently, President Carter and President Reagan reaffirmed American recognition of this tragedy. We cannot allow ignorance, prejudice, or short memories to rewrite history.

Mr. Speaker, America has a special role to play in ensuring that this tragic chapter of human history is not forgotten. Many of the survivors later emigrated to the United States where they helped to build a strong, prosperous, and free nation. The great contribution of Armenian-Americans is indisputable. Furthermore, as a leader of the free world, the United States must remember all victims of tyranny and injustice. Today's ceremony reaffirms America's dedication to the principles of personal and religious freedom and our commitment to promoting peace and liberty throughout the world. I pledge my commitment to those goals and will continue my efforts to ensure that the Armenian genocide is never forgotten.

Mrs. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, today I join my colleagues in a tribute to the Armenian people. The suffering of the Armenian people is well known. Last year the House spent many hours in debate highlighting the actions that occurred 75 years ago. The historical debate about the exact numbers, the scope, and the motivations of those involved continues without resolution. It is not, however, necessary to reach a conclusion about the cause of a tragedy in order to share the sense of loss felt by the Armenian people. It would compound that tragedy if the world were to forget the sufferings of the Armenians during and after the First World War.

In my own State of Rhode Island, the Armenian community has a particularly rich tradition and heritage. As a guest at the annual festival at St. Sahag and St. Mesrob Armenian Church, I am reminded of the hospitality, the sense of fellowship, and the service that is such an important part of the Armenian community in Rhode Island. Certainly our State has benefited immensely from the contributions of the Armenians who have settled here. The majority of that community has no personal memory of the events in Armenia between 1914 and 1926, but they have heard the tales of suffering from their parents and grandparents.

I think that at a time when we remember this suffering it is appropriate for us to look as well to the triumphs of the Armenian people. The contributions of the Armenian people to the business, culture, education, and government, not only in Rhode Island, but wherever they have placed their roots, should stand as a reminder to us all that out of suffering comes strength and out of tragedy, compassion. We commemorate today the suffering and tragedy that befell the Armenian people 75 years ago, but we also celebrate the strength and compassion that stand as a mark of Armenians everywhere.

We cannot undo history. We do know, however, that the benefits that we enjoy are often founded in the sufferings of earlier times. It is only proper that we set aside contemplative time to remember those who suffered and to express our gratitude for our freedom, our community and our heritage. I join my colleagues today in remembering both the tragedy of the Armenian people and their triumphs during the past three-quarters of a century.

Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, today as we commemorate the genocide of Armenians from 1915 to 1923, we must recognize the permanent pain and anguish that will not be forgotten by the survivors of this tragedy.

The 1.5 million Armenian men, women, and children who perished will be remembered as victims of a cruel and barbarous act against humanity.

We cannot compensate for the remorselessness of this massacre but we must remember those who perished so that they will not have died in vain. We should never forget such acts of barbarity. The determination and perseverance of the Armenian people, whose culture and heritage allowed them to survive this disaster, must be commended. In this day and age, we cannot afford to look the other way when human rights violations are being perpetrated. We must work toward preventing other genocidal acts by remembering incidents like those of the Armenian people and informing world opinion about such tragedies so that they will not occur in the future. Let us hope that the U.S. Senate's ratification of the Genocide Treaty is a step in the right direction in preventing future acts of mass destruction against any nation or people.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to participate in this important special order.

The 20th century has seen its share of triumph and tragedy. We celebrate the triumphs; we mourn and learn from the tragedies. But we cannot learn anything if we insist on closing our eyes to the fact that a tragedy has indeed taken place.

Seventy-one years age, the Ottoman Turkish Empire began a system of genocide against the Armenian population that eventually left 1.5 million dead, and opened the way for future genocides. There are those who, for various reasons, insist that this terrible tragedy was not in fact a genocide, or more grotesquely, that it never occurred at all. Such lies have devastating results—not only for the Armenian people who suffered so much, but for those of us who hope to prevent the occurrence of future such tragedies.

Mr. Speaker, in February, the Senate ratified the Genocide Convention after 37 years. The United States is now an official participant in the battle to prevent future genocides. It is recognition of the Armenian genocide, as well as the subsequent Nazi Holocaust, that galvinized the world community into taking the important step of a treaty to outlaw genocides. The least we can do is stand here today to bow our heads and remember the Armenian people's suffering. They must know that it was not in vain—that we have learned from this and other holocausts.

When you talk about fundamental human rights, you cannot waiver because of political or economic expediency—1.5 million Armenians were killed during World War I at the hands of the Ottoman Turkish Empire. Let us never forget their suffering. For humanity's sake, let us never forget that future genocides can only be prevented by never forgetting the past. I implore my colleagues, the American people and people of all nations, to remember the tragedy of the Armenian genocide, so that we can truly make the claim, never again.

Mr. MATSUI. I rise with my colleagues today to remember those innocent men, women, and children who died in the Armenian Genocide of 1915–23. Although the time has passed for mourning, time does not wash away history. With the victories, the tragedies of the past should be rememberd if we are to use history as a guide for our future actions.

To this day, however, Turkey's government still refuses to acknowledge the massacre. It is for this reason that we are here today observing this anniversary.

Seventy-one years later, our minds have turned to the horrors of terrorism. Our need to acknowledge and remember base human actions is more prevalent than ever. When the world forgets and refuses to even acknowledge its mistakes, terrorism becomes the tool to force us to remember. Therefore, I join with my colleagues today to prove that we do not ignore the plights of the persecuted. Instead, we acknowledge the mistakes of the past in the hope that we can set an example for the future.

Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues here today in marking the 71st anniversary of the Armenian massacre and to honor the 1½ million innocent men, women, and children who lost their lives between 1915 and 1923.

Throughout World War I, the Ottoman Turkish Government systematically and brutally murdered the Armenian people in one of this century's most appalling human tragedies.

The Armenian massacre set the stage two decades later for Adolph Hitler's slaughter of 6 million Jews in the Holocaust and the recent acts of genocide against Cambodians and Afghans.

Hitler himself emulated the Armenian massacre when he attempted the wholesale destruction of the Jewish race.

When confronted with the question of how history would consider his actions, Hitler reportedly said, "Who, today, remembers the Armenians?"

I will answer Hitler today, that we do!

By commemorating the memory of the Armenian victims, we can try to prevent history from again repeating itself.

For the sake of those still living who are survivors of this great tragedy, for the sake of the descendants of the victims, for the Armenians who live across our Nation and the globe, and for all mankind, we cannot forget the Armenian massacre.

Mr. Speaker, the vivid accounts of the torture, the deprivation, the cruelty, and the bloodshed that are related by the survivors bring tears to even the strongest of men.

It is a historical fact that 1½ million Armenians were slaughtered by the Ottoman Turks.

Yet the Turkish Government refuses to acknowledge this act of genocide that was perpetrated in Turkey.

The current Turkish Government has taken this act of denial further by actually rewriting the history of those years.

At the same time, Turkish leaders have pressured our own Government to deny that the Armenian massacre took place, using our strategic need for bases in the region as leverage.

Such pressure has accounted for our State Department labeling the Armenian tragedy as an "alleged genocide."

The Turkish Government has carried this denial to extraordinary lengths by refusing to concede that the grotesque murder of innocents even took place.

And President Reagan has opposed a resolution which I, and more than 200 other Congressmen, have cosponsored with TONY COELHO, of California, to designate April 26 as the "National Day of Remembrance for Man's Inhumanity to Man."

Mr. Speaker, the current Turkish Government has nothing to lose by acknowledging that the Armenian massacre took place.

Neither the current government nor the people of Turkey committed the heinous crimes against an innocent people.

By acknowledging the massacre, the current Turkish Government will gain moral statute in the eyes of all of us who have vowed to make sure that the Armenian genocide will not be denied or forgotten.

By keeping these painful memories alive and by facing the hideous truths, we can insure that the mistakes of the past will not be repeated.

Mr. Speaker, we must keep the memory of the Armenian genocide alive as a way of reaffirming our commitment to human life and dignity.

All of us who have lost friends and relatives to genocide must forever strive for truth and peace.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. PASHAYAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE HONORABLE JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. STRATTON] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in behalf of the New York congressional delegation to pay a tribute to our colleague, JOE ADDABBO, who passed away last week.

His funeral in New York City was a deeply moving one, with tributes paid by Speaker O'NEILL, by Cardinal O'Conner, and by Bishop Mugavero.

JOE ADDABBO always recognized his home surroundings. As a highly important and influential Member of Congress, he still lived in the same house in Queens and he was one of the few Members of the New York delegation who did not bring his family to Washington. It was only when there was, perhaps, a party at the White House when JOE brought his wife, Grace, to participate in that occasion.

Congressman ADDABBO was placed on the Appropriations Committee shortly after he had won reelection to the House. I do not know exactly what the procedure was, but remembering that former Congressman Eugene Keogh, was the highly influential Member in placing other Members of the delegation on committee, he was probably responsible for JOE'S elevation to that outstanding committee, the Committee on Appropriations.

JOE maintained his position on that committee, moving up slowly in seniority, until the distinguished chairman of that committee, and the former chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, George Mahon of Texas, retired.

JOE, I think, was probably recognized by other Members of the House because of the fact that he led an annual group of Members of the House of Representatives and their wives and families every year in the springtime to show them the great city of New York, to entertain them in theaters, to take the boat trip around New York City, and to visit the home of the mayor, Gracie Mansion. In fact, now that JOE has passed away, we in the New York delegation are going to have to scramble a little bit, I am afraid, to try to create for our colleagues the same outstanding trip that Chairman ADDABBO had led over so many years.

JOE ADDABBO was a highly responsible and highly influential Member of Congress because he was the chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense. We did not always agree, he and I, on some weapons systems, but he was always very helpful and willing to discuss any disagreement that might develop between the Appropriations Committee and the authorizing committee, the House Committee on Armed Services.

JOE'S major contribution, I think, not only to the House itself, but also to his State, was reflected in an item that came before the House today, the homeporting of a naval squadron in Staten Island. JOE ADDABBO was almost single-handedly responsible for that decision and the Secretary of the Navy recognized his insistance that that squadron was going to remain in New York City, even though, from time to time, there might be objections as to whether there were going to be nuclear weapons on those ships or not.

JOE was also strong in support of another item from New York State that, in his recent years, he felt deserved a much better reception from the Pentagon than it was getting. That was the T-46 Air Force trainer developed by Fairchild Republic Aviation Co. on Long Island. JOE, I know, hoped that we who remained on the delegation in a position of influence with the Pentagon would see fit to fund and to authorize the T-46. Those of us in that position intend to continue his fight because it was something that he was deeply concerned about and I think in a sense, it should be the one tribute, he never asked very much for himself, but the one tribute to his earnest efforts to try to provide more jobs for the people in his congressional district and for the people on Long Island.

JOE ADDABBO was always generous, always kind. His eulogy that the Speaker made in St. Patrick's Cathedral was a very moving one. The Speaker said we live in Congress by the bells. One bell would indicate that we are in session; two bells represent a vote; three bells are a quorum call; and four bells is the end of the session. He said, "JOE, we have rung these bells in your honor and you have completed a magnificent contribution to the Congress and to the American people."

I yield now to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HORTON], the vice chairman of the delegation of New York, as representing the Republican delegation from New York.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, as vice chairman of the New York delegation, and as the dean of the Republican delegation, I join Congressman SAM STRATTON, the dean of our New York delegation, and my colleagues this evening to pay tribute to our friend and colleague, JOE ADDABBO, who passed away earlier this month after a long bout with cancer.

I had the honor of knowing JOE and his wife, Grace, for nearly 25 years. Nancy joins me in expressing our deepest regrets and condolences to Grace and the Addabbo family.

JOE began in Congress in 1960; I joined him 2 years later. Nobody had a greater respect for JOE than I. His commitment to all that was right and fair was unequaled in this House.

JOE was best known for his tireless efforts as a voice of sanity when dealing with defense matters. He was an articulate and forceful opponent of excessive and wasteful military spending. Although he was often in the minority on his defense appropriations subcommittee, the respect for his beliefs by his colleagues was great. JOE was singularly responsible for several military projects being built in New York State. His role as a champion for the State was widely recognized and appreciated. We shall miss his leadership in defense matters.

In 1973, JOE sponsored the first antiwar resolution ever to pass the House—cutting off funds for the bombing of Cambodia. He was a leading advocate of accountability—fiscally and ideologically—within the Pentagon. The President called JOE "one of the leading players in the development of American military policy." My good friend Mario Cuomo called him "a great man, whose commitment to integrity and excellence has improved the quality of life for all New Yorkers." Those who knew JOE would be hard pressed to disagree.

Mr. Speaker, this House will not be the same without JOE. He will be sorely missed.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a great statesman, leader, friend and a truly outstanding American who was called from us April 10, 1986, at the age of 61.

JOE ADDABBO came to this venerable body 26 years ago from the Sixth Congressional District of New York and served the good people of New York for better than 2½ decades with direction, compassion, and clearheaded innovation.

His time in public office spanned many of the most trying, dynamic and exciting events of this century and his unique leadership met all challenges head on in the same perserving, selfless manner that he led his own life. This man was a tireless fighter for what he believed was right, and that effort will be remembered gratefully by all those who knew or knew of JOE ADDABBO.

JOE was a fair minded and dutiful man whether serving as chairman of the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense, as chairman of the Small Business Administration and Minority Enterprises and Franchising Subcommittee or just being a trusted friend. JOE'S optimism and belief in the god within all people brought a personal flair to all that he touched, but his relentless fight to reduce waste and fraud left many a tough challenger wondering "what hit them."

Those in the defense area knew that JOE ADDABBO watched for excess and fraud with a scrutiny that saved taxpayers untold millions of dollars and, in doing so, maintained the world's strongest defense. Controlling Federal purse strings, especially those for defense, is no job for the weak of heart and JOE ADDABBO distinguished himself with fairness and devotion.

This was a patriot in the true sense of the word. JOE ADDABBO was a man who believed deeply in the good of this country and spent a large part of his life working to ensure that all Americans could enjoy it.

As a friend of the small businessman, JOE worked tirelessly to ensure equal opportunity. A proponent of minority enterprises, he fought for fair and equitable treatment as aspiring minority businessmen and played an important role in bringing many new businesses to this country.

JOE ADDABBO, friend, patriot, Congressman, will be sorely and deeply missed.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN], the chairman of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, last week I sat with a large congressional delegation in St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York City at the funeral of JOE ADDABBO. We joined his family and friends, the Governor of the State, the mayor of the city and the people of New York in mourning his loss. In many ways the funeral service was a special thanks and an impressive tribute to the man who had served his home so well in the national legislature for over 2½ decades.

Anyone who knew JOE ADDABBO knew that he was every inch a New Yorker. Born and educated in Queens, he practiced law and lived in Queens all his life. Anyone who knew JOE ADDABBO knew how he loved Grace and his family and the people of his home. Anyone who dealt with JOE ADDABBO in the Congress knows how he listened and responded to the complaints and problems of his people—and how hard he fought to advance their interests. His people knew. And they let him know. The boundaries and the composition of his district changed over time. But the voters who first sent him to Washington in 1960 with a 53.5 percent margin of victory returned him 24 years later with a 68-percent vote of appreciation and confidence.

As chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I always appreciated JOE ADDABBO's strong advocacy of the people's branch of Government. He tirelessly asserted and advanced the role of Congress in handling its constitutional responsibilities and power over the purse. This cause never had a better champion. He came to the Committee on Appropriations in 1963. Over the years he mastered the legislative skills and built a formidable storehouse of knowledge about his principal area of responsibility—defense.

For many years we worked together trying to build a strong defense but at the same time trying not to waste money foolishly in the name of military spending.

JOE ADDABBO became chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee in 1979, and that position gave his legislative prowess full range. JOE was a staunch advocate of a strong national defense. But with JOE ADDABBO it was not "How much spending is good for defense?" It was "How strong a defense does the Nation have for the money we are spending?" He championed value for the dollar. And the defense appropriations legislation he wrote over the years reflected that spirit in every detail. The national defense and the taxpayer were well served by his work.

Not surprisingly JOE ADDABBO became a major player in the formulation of national defense policy. He moved early to get us out of Vietnam. He challenged the conventional wisdom that national security was best advanced by investing in additional carriers, that the Nation could afford two new bombers in one decade, and that the MX missile would contribute to a stabilizing deterrence. He believed that the single greatest threat faced by mankind was the uncontrollable building of nuclear weapons, and he worked to achieve an atmosphere conducive to arms control.

JOE ADDABBO was a career legislator and a public servant. He was an undaunted advocate, who fought with energy and tenacity for the positions he chose to support. Nobody who took him on ever forgot the experience. He was true to himself. He loved his family, and he was happy in his work. We all cared for JOE immensely. He will sorely be missed here in the House. He was an outstanding citizen who never failed to work as hard as possible for his Nation.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. NATCHER].

Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, it was with profound sorrow that I learned of the passing of my friend JOE ADDABBO. Mr. ADDABBO's service in the House of Representatives will continue always to be one of the bright spots in our country's legislative history. He was a good Member of the House in every sense of the word.

He established an outstanding record in the House of Representatives and served with distinction and honor He loved the House and he believed that our country is one of the greatest countries in the world. His concept of public trust was without parallel and never did he hesitate to speak out against any proposal which he felt was not sound and not in the best interests of our people.

One of the nicest things that has happened to me since I have been a Member of Congress is the opportunity that I had to serve with JOE ADDABBO and especially as a member of the Committee on Appropriations. After serving on our committee for a number of years, he was elected chairman of the subcommittee that appropriates the money for the Department of Defense. He believed that our country should remain strong at all times, but at the same time, that the Department of Defense, like all of the other departments of the Government, should not spend money that was not necessary. I have heard him say on many occasions that additional funds requested for defense were not necessary and that the money should be placed in the subcommittee bill that appropriates the funds for the Departments of Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education. Mr. Speaker, this is the subcommittee that I am chairman of and at all times, my friend JOE ADDABBO worked with us on our bill and especially on each and every occasion when the bill was before the House of Represntatives for final passage.

In every position he held, either public or private, he achieved distinction. His service in all of his assignments was marked by a high sense of conscience and duty. His character, his achievements, and his faithful service will be an inspiration to generations yet to come. He will have a high place in the history of our country and in the hearts of his countrymen.

His life exemplifies those virtues that make a great Congressman and those are fairness, generosity, willingness to listen and unyielding devotion to the principles of his party and to all matters which were for the best interests of our country. He left his mark on Congress; not necessarily through legislation which he succeeded in having enacted, but instead through his character itself. He was always a gentleman and always a strong leader.

Mr. Speaker, I have lost a true friend and this country has lost a great statesman. To his lovely wife and family, I extend my deepest sympathy in their bereavement.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman taking the time, too, as a personal friend, as well as a colleague. I sat next to him on the full committee and had an extended conversation with him just before he left for lunch, where the tragedy occurred that later resulted in his death.

JOE and I served together and we were the only two Democratic Members in Congress who did, on both the Committee on Small Business and the Appropriations Committee. I had an opportunity to know him and see him in action for a number of years and I can tell you this. On the Committee on Small Business, whenever there was some issue there where he could help some small businessmen that he did not even know, but he knew if the small businessman was going to be affected, he was always there. He found a way to get there and to make his mark shown and he did in legislation.

JOE was an excellent legislator. This House has lost a Member that will be very hard to replace. His wife, Gracie, and his family were a wonderful family. We knew them personally and Bea and I express our profound sorrow to them and hope that someway we can make it through without JOE, but it is going to be very difficult.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CHAPPELL], who is the acting chairman of the Subcommittee on Defense of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CHAPPELL. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in paying tribute to a powerful man who never forgot how to be sensitive and courteous. A man who mastered the art of politics and practiced that art at the national level but who never forgot where he came from and the constituents he represented.

A man who loved a wisecrack but understood in detail the extreme complexities of national defense. A man who was a good friend and a dedicated, selfless public servant. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor the memory of our colleague JOE ADDABBO.

At a time such as this there are no words that can adequately express the loss this House has suffered. Since first coming to the Congress in 1961, JOE ADDABBO has been a distinct and special individual. When he smiled he made you feel genuine friendship.

His good naturedness was not saved only for fellow Members but for all with whom he came into contact no matter what their capacity or station in life. As he gained in seniority he was always fair in his dealings with his colleagues whether they were on his side or not. While he could make an admiral or general uncomfortable through his direct questioning, we always knew he had the Nation's best interests in mind. He made us all ask how much is enough and by doing so fashioned this Nation's defense debate.

Beyond the defense arena, he maintained the interest he had as a young lawyer from Queens in the issue of human rights. He was a multidemensional Congressman who spoke with authority and conviction on a variety of subjects. He did his homework but remained open to opposing points of view. He was in effect the essence of what is good about being a U.S. Representative.

Mr. Speaker, this great body has been graced by many capable and committed individuals. I can think of none in our long history, however, who gave more of themselves than our friend and my chairman, JOE ADDABBO.

It has been a great and wonderful experience to have been a colleague of his on the Subcommittee on Defense of the Committee on Appropriations. I can think of none that we can honor anymore.

We are a poorer gathering with his passing but a stronger institution because of the time he spent with us.

I have lost a true friend and this country has lost a great statesman. To his lovely wife and family, I extend my sincere condolences. They can take comfort in the knowledge that in his 26 years in Congress, JOE, left his mark on the Congress and the Nation. He will be greatly missed in this Chamber.

□ 1835

Mr. STRATTON. I thank the gentleman.

I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BIAGGI].

Mr. BIAGGI. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, it seems like a good humor deed when JOE ADDABBO was born on St. Patrick's Day. JOE was named JOSEPH PATRICK ADDABBO, and each St. Patrick's Day, the party and the revelry in his office would equal that that was going across the Nation. A party that was conducted and arranged by a loving staff; loyal, faithful, and ever loving; and to the very end they remain thus.

JOE spent half of his adult life in the Congress of the United States, and we know he is gone; it is 12 days since he died. The loss is still difficult to measure and impossible to reconcile.

We know of JOE's special interest and feeling about a strong national defense. We also know that he was universally recognized as a watchdog. We know that JOE took on one President over Vietnam and another over Nicaragua. He had a different perspective but he stuck to his principles without yielding.

JOE won some and he lost some, but you always knew that when you tangled with JOE, it was a good, clean fight. The very essence of JOE; he could disagree but never be disagreeable.

As I have said in the New York Post, I considered myself blessed to be a friend of JOE ADDABBO's, and what a good friend he was. He was loyal, dedicated, always up. He was a man with a quick grin, a good story and the legendary little punch.

JOE made public service the profession it was intended to be. He did it by dedicating his heart and soul to it. He did it by blending his national prominence with his total commitment to constituent service.

The result was one the best Members ever to have served this institution. President Reagan called JOE ADDABBO one of the leading players in the development of American military policy. Speaker O'NEILL, who delivered such a moving eulogy of JOE ADDABBO at his funeral said upon learning of his death:

> Joe Addabbo worked diligently to ensure that America's defense was strong, efficient, and effective. He demanded quality for each defense dollar.

As the gentleman from New York [Mr. STRATTON] said at the close of Speaker O'NEILL's comment, he said: "The bells have rung for the final adjournment. God bless you JOE."

Such a moving experience. But one understands it. To have known JOE was to have loved him in every sense.

Governor Cuomo acknowledged JOE as a great man. Cardinal O'Connor said to Grace Addabbo, JOE's widow:

> While there is a great deal of sorrow in this cathedral, there is a great deal to be thankful for. I have never heard so many accolades as I have heard about your husband.

It was not a period of mourning: it was a period of joy, it was celebration, to know that JOE was finally released from his pain and sorrow in the last years of his life, and go on to a greater reward.

JOE was a special type of Member; he did so many deeds but never sought publicity. It robbed him, perhaps, of gaining proper credit for all his accomplishments; but in many ways, all JOE wanted to do is measure up to his constituency.

JOE, on the Committee on Appropriations, got important funding for serior citizens' programs; education, mass transit, and housing. He was always there when the people of Queens and New York needed him. It is an enduring mark of greatness about JOE, and we will miss him. Especially in these difficult times, New York will miss him grievously.

JOE was an unabashed liberal, and was proud of it. He saw Government's role as to help those in need and to provide opportunities for a better life. For millions in our Nation, we are grateful JOE was able to carry his philosophy to the position where he could, and did make a difference.

At this time, we struggle with feelings. We are in grief over his loss, yet we also celebrate all that was good about JOE. It is a celebration that would last a long time, since there was so much good about this wonderful man while he lived.

JOE was the epitome of so many virtues. He was a man of unparalleled integrity and commitment to basic decent values. JOE was a loyal and dedicated family man to his beloved wife, Grace, and his two sons, Dominick and Joseph, Jr., and daughter Dina.

JOE spent almost half his life here. He came when the Eastern shuttle was still a prop jet. He loved the institution. In turn, Members of both parties respected and had genuine affection for JOE. Few have served with greater distinction; few will be missed more than JOE.

Edmund Burke said: "Government is a contrivance of human wisdom to provide for human wants."

Thanks to JOE ADDABBO and his wisdom and his dedication and his service, there are fewer wants in this world.

As the New York Post article closed: JOE, go in peace. You helped make this world a more peaceful and restful place."

Mr. Speaker, the passing of JOE ADDABBO leaves a void in this House that may never be filled. That is a tribute to the caliber and the quality of this great man. At this point in the RECORD, I am inserting a series of articles from major newspapers noting the passing of JOE ADDABBO and his funeral in New York City.

NEW YORK REPRESENTATIVE JOSEPH P. ADDABBO DIES

(By Bart Barnes)

Rep. Joseph P. Addabbo, 61, a New York Democrat who as chairman of the defense subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee built a reputation as an articulate and forceful opponent of what he considered excessive military spending, died late Thursday night at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. He had cancer and recently had suffered a heart attack.

Mr. Addabbo, who had been in a coma since collapsing March 6, represented a district in Queens. He served for 25 years in the House of Representatives and since 1979 had been chairman of the defense appropriations subcommittee, the panel that acts on requests for all military spending. In that role he was often critical of high military officers who, he said, frequently shared with civilian bureaucrats a penchant for empire building and a narrowness of vision.

Despite his reputation as a critic of military spending, Mr. Addabbo always insisted he supported a strong military defense policy. "But I don't take the Pentagon at their word," he once said. "I don't like the attitude of some members, 'Well, let's give them $20 million to play around with this year. Let's give them $40 million next year.' Three years later, the weapon doesn't work, and there's $100 million down the drain."

But Mr. Addabbo often found himself in a minority position on his own committee, most of whose members tended to have more hawkish views than he. More often than not he was on the losing side of defense-spending controversies.

He tried in 1982 to block funding for the MX missile but lost, both in his own subcommittee and in the full Appropriations Committee. He prevailed when he took his case to the floor of the House, although the House later reversed its position and work began on the missile.

In 1973 Mr. Addabbo sponsored the first antiwar resolution ever to pass the House of Representatives—the cutting off of funds for the bombing of Cambodia. He had supported the war in Southeast Asia during the Johnson administration and in the early years of the Nixon presidency but he subsequently changed his mind. He also opposed the B-1 bomber and other major weapons systems.

In 1984 he castigated the Defense Department for what he called "a complete breakdown of control over millions of dollars." This followed a report that accused the military of scrapping valuable equipment, then turning around and paying higher prices to buy identical items.

President Reagan called Mr. Addabbo "one of the leading players in the development of American military policy." He said the congressman was "widely respected for his knowledge of defense issues even by those who disagreed with him. His genial style was in keeping with the best traditions of American politics."

House Speaker Thomas O'Neill said Mr. Addabbo "worked diligently to ensure that America's defense was strong, efficient and effective. He demanded quality for each defense dollar."

New York Gov. Mario Cuomo called him a "great man whose commitment to integrity and excellence has improved the quality of life for all New Yorkers."

Mayor Edward Koch of New York ordered flags on city buildings to be flown at half staff until after Mr. Addabbo's funeral. The congressman, Koch said, "always strove to ensure that people of every race, religion and ethnic origin had a fair hearing and full representation in the halls of the Capitol."

A native of New York City, Mr. Addabbo graduated from the City College of New York and St. John's University Law School. He practiced law in Queens, participated in civic and community organizations, and headed Italian-American committees for various candidates.

But he never ran for public office until 1960, when the incumbent Republican representative from his district retired. With the help of John F. Kennedy's drawing power among Catholic voters, Mr. Addabbo won with 53.5 percent of the vote.

In the ensuing years the district changed from a predominantly middle class Catholic suburb to an area more closely resembling the inner city with a population that was 65 percent black and Hispanic by the 1984 election.

During that time Mr. Addabbo established a record of steering defense contracts to Long Island-based industries and listening to constituent problems and complaints. He voted in favor of federal aid to education and the elderly, in favor of civil rights, and against measures to limit rights to abortion or allow prayer in public schools.

He won most bids for reelection handily, and in the campaigns of 1974 to 1982 had the Republican as well as the Democratic nomination. In 1984 he was challenged in the Democratic primary by Simeon Golar, a black real estate developer, who asked the voters to oust Mr. Addabbo on the argument that since the district had a black majority it should have a black representative. Mr. Addabbo won with 68 percent of the vote.

He is survived by his wife, Grace, and three children, Dominic, Dina and Joseph.

JOE ADDABBO, 61, LOSES CANCER BOUT

(By Frank Jackman and Stuart Marques)

Rep. Joseph Addabbo, 61, dean of the city congressional delegation and a fierce critic of military overspending, died late Thursday after a long bout with cancer.

Addabbo, a 13-term Democrat from Queens whose chairmanship of the House defense appropriations subcommittee made him a power in Congress, died at 10:48 p.m. Thursday in Walter Reed Army Medical Center, Washington, where he had been in a coma since March 12.

Addabbo kept a six-year struggle against bladder cancer a secret from even his closest associates though he was hospitalized for four months last year.

Addabbo, who lived in Ozone Park with his wife, Grace, and three children, Dominic, Dina and Joseph, will be buried Tuesday after a funeral service in St. Patrick's Cathedral.

Mayor Koch ordered flags on city buildings to be flown at half staff.

A genial, back-slapping politician in the clubhouse tradition who was more at home working behind the scenes, Addabbo, first elected in 1960, was well liked by colleagues in both parties.

Addabbo, who became chairman of the Defense Appropriations subcommittee in 1979, often began hearings by telling Pentagon brass to brace themselves for significant cuts in their budget. Most of the time he was outvoted.

His biggest victory was in December 1982 when he pushed an amendment through the House blocking production of the MX missile. The House later reversed its position.

He was a tenacious battler when it came to defense contracts for New York and was instrumental in the Navy's decision to homeport the battleship Iowa at Stapleton, Staten Island.

REPRESENTATIVE JOSEPH ADDABBO DIES; HEAD OF KEY DEFENSE PANEL

(By Ronald Smothers)

Representative Joseph P. Addabbo, a Queens Democrat who had a powerful hand in shaping national defense policy as chairman of a key House subcommittee, died last Thursday at Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington. He was 61 years old.

Mr. Addabbo, who served in Congress for a quarter of a century, had been suffering from cancer of the bladder and had been receiving treatment for six years. He slipped into a coma March 11, five days after he suffered a seizure at a luncheon on Capitol Hill.

Critics of Pentagon spending looked to Mr. Addabbo, an influential congressional insider, as their most important voice on Capitol Hill against what they viewed as wasteful arms projects.

Earlier, Mr. Addabbo was a main sponsor of what many consider the first anti-Vietnam War measure to pass the House, a 1973 amendment to cut off funds for the continued bombing of Cambodia. Later, as the subcommittee chairman, Mr. Addabbo opposed the development of the B-1 bomber and supported a nuclear freeze.

KEY FIGURE IN S.I. BASE PLAN

While his position gave Mr. Addabbo influence upon the national agenda, it also allowed him to look after the interests of his district and his state. He was able, through defense contracts, to bolster Long Island's aircraft industry, and he was a key figure in the Pentagon's 1983 decision to plan to base a seven-ship Navy battle group on Staten Island, a move that backers say will add thousands of jobs in the metropolitan area.

Yesterday, the Speaker of the House, Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., said Mr. Addabbo had "won the respect of members of Congress from both sides of the aisle." Governor Cuomo called him a "relentlessly committed congressman and leader."

First elected to the House of Representatives in 1960 from a district that now covers the southern portion of Queens, from South Jamaica to the Rockaways, Mr. Addabbo mastered the intricacies of the legislative process and became one of the more influential members on defense and foreign policy.

THE HOUSE IS MY CAREER

While other New York Congressional colleagues, such as Hugh L. Carey and Edward I. Koch, went on to win other elective offices, Mr. Addabbo stayed in the House, building the seniority that eventually earned him the chairmanship of the Appropriations subcommittee on defense in 1979.

"This is my career," he said.

"If he had a private agenda at all," said a fellow Queens Democratic Congressman, Representative James H. Scheuer, "it was improving New York's position in defense-related contracts.

But Mr. Addabbo was also, in the words another colleague, Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of Manhattan, a "credible critic" of the steady increase in defense spending in general and of certain weapons systems in particular. Whether arguing in the relative privacy of committee debates or in his rare but significant speeches from the floor of the House, many of Mr. Addabbo's colleagues credited him with turning the tide against such projects as the MX and Pershing missiles.

NO ORDINARY HAWK

Unlike many other members of Congress, he was not easily catalogued as a hawk or a dove—Mr. Scheuer called him "a chicken hawk."

By that I mean he was for a strong defense, but he wanted a lean and hungry defense," said Mr. Scheuer, who was second to Mr. Addabbo in seniority among House members from New York City. "Joe viewed the Pentagon generals as a bunch of bureaucrats and he took what they said with a large grain of salt. That made him a major force for rationality in defense spending."

What many called Mr. Addabbo's "credibility and knowledge';' on defense matters also drew praise from Republicans such as Representative Guy V. Molinari, of Staten Island, with whom Mr. Addabbo most recently worked on winning final approval on the home-port measure. Mr. Molinari said it had been Mr. Addabbo who had convinced him, a strong Reagan Administration supporter, and other Republicans to vote against the President's MX missile program.

Over the years, Mr. Addabbo also was a chief sponsor of legislation that helped poor families pay for household heat, assisted small businesses and steered funds to economically depressed areas.

LOSSES IN THE REAGAN ERA

Not long after he became chairman of the subcommittee, the Reagan Administration began and Mr. Addabbo faced a growing national mood more receptive to increased military spending. As a result, Mr. Addabbo frequently lost legislative skirmishes within his subcommittee—including those on the B-1 and a nuclear freeze. But his criticism of some of the programs—such as the MX missile—as wasteful and inefficient occasionally won out in votes by the full House.

Mr. Addabbo was born March 17, 1925, in Ozone Park. He attended public schools there, went to the City College of New York and graduated from St. John's University School of Law in 1946. He opened a law practice in Ozone Park, which he maintained until his election to Congress.

Unlike many members of Congress who move to Washington, Mr. Addabbo commuted to the capital weekly. He once said that he had moved only four times, all within the space of 10 blocks.

He began his Congressional career with a 1960 victory in his first try for elective office as the Democratic candidate in a conservative district that had been represented for many years by Albert H. Bosch, a Republican, who was retiring.

At the time, most observers attributed his victory to the large numbers of Irish and Italian Roman Catholics who turned out to vote for the Democratic presidential candidate, Senator John F. Kennedy. Whatever the reason, Mr. Addabbo converted that first victory into a string of successes, often running not only on the Democratic line but the Republican and Liberal Party lines as well.

He defied the vagaries of redistricting, which shifted and reshifted his district over the years. He also weathered a strong Conservative Party surge in the 1960's and early 70's along with changes in the ethnic makeup of the area, which went from an overwhelmingly Italian, Irish and German mix in 1960 to one that was nearly two-thirds black and Hispanic residents in 1982.

Mr. Addabbo conceded that his first real political scare came in 1982 when a black candidate, Simeon Golar, armed with a modern campaign-polling apparatus, nearly edged him out in the Democratic primary election.

In 1984, Mr. Golar, buoyed by the sweep of the district by the Rev. Jesse Jackson in that year's Democratic Presidential primiary, challenged Mr. Addabbo again. But this time, the incumbent hired his own battery of consultants and pollsters and won handily, with 68 percent of the vote.

Mr. Addabbo is survived by his wife, Grace; two sons, Dominick and Joseph, Jr., and a daughter, Dina, all of South Ozone Park.

A funeral mass is to be said Tuesday at 11 A.M. at St. Patrick's Cathedral, at Fifth Avenue and 51st Street.

ADDABBO PRAISED AT RITES—HELPED END VIET WAR, SAYS TIP

(By Robert Carroll)

U.S. Rep. Joseph Addabbo was remembered yesterday as a key architect of the anti-Vietnam War movement in Congress and a man "who loved and cared for people."

At his funeral at St. Patrick's Cathedral, Addabbo was eulogized by his long-time congressional colleague, House Speaker Thomas O'Neill (D-Mass.).

"Joe Addabbo believed it was his own personal duty that no more young Americans died in Vietnam," O'Neill told an audience that included Mayor Koch, Gov. Cuomo and dozens of other political notables.

Addabbo represented a district in southeast Queens for 26 years, rising in seniority and influence to the chairmanship of the defense subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee.

"Some people look upon political life as a sacrifice, a burden to be shed," O'Neill continued. "Joe Addabbo was just the opposite. 'Helping people was a joy to him. Politics was not only a great and worthy profession but a way of life."

Earlier in the Mass, Cardinal O'Connor and Brooklyn Bishop Francis Mugavero both praised Addabbo, who died April 11.

Directing his words to Addabbo's widow, Grace, seated in the first pew with her sons Dominick and Joseph and her daughter Dina, O'Connor told her that "while there is a great deal of sorrow in this cathedral, there is a great deal to be thankful for. I have never heard so many accolades as I have about your husband."

Mugavero referred to Addabbo as "this faithful Christian man" who had "love for the people he served and time for all."

"Joseph Addabbo approached issues and problems from his background of faith," said Mugavero. "In his service to the people, God was with him."

Burial was in St. John's Cemetery in Queens.

JOSEPH ADDABBO: 1925-1986

Death freed Rep. Joe Addabbo from the torment of illness Thursday night, but it robbed New York City of its most senior national legislator.

On today's Op-Ed page, his friend and colleague Rep. Mario Biaggi (D-Bronx) remembers the man from Ozone Park and Boys High School, from City College and St. John's University Law School, who gave a quarter century of service to the people of South Queens in the House of Representatives. His loss, says Biaggi, is "difficult to measure and impossible to reconcile."

That's the view of The Post as well.

ADDABBO'S BODY RETURNS HOME FOR FUNERAL IN ST. PATRICK'S

(By Pat Wilks and Larry Nathanson)

The body of Joseph Addabbo, dean of the city's Congressional delegation and a determined watchdog against wasteful defense spending, was brought home yesterday to Queens.

Addabbo, 61, died of bladder cancer Thursday night in Walter Reed Hospital after almost a month in a coma.

His body was flown to JFK Airport on an Air Force jet and taken with a motorcycle escort to the James Funeral Home at 89-01 Rockaway Blvd. in Ozone Park.

There will be no public viewing, at the family's request.

A heavy turnout of congressmen, senators, other public officials and military leaders is expected at a furneral mass for Addabbo next Tuesday at 11 a.m. at St. Patrick's Cathedral.

Addabbo lived all his life in Ozone Park, a blue collar neighborhood which changed from largely white to mostly black and which had proved him right when he said several years ago while fending off a primary challenge by a black candidate:

"The people in this district are color blind."

First elected to Congress in 1960, the affable Addabbo, at his death, was chairman of the House Defense appropriations subcommittee and perhaps the area's most influential congressman.

"An absolute tragedy for the American people," said fellow House Democrat James Scheuer of Queens. ". . . He was the voice of sanity in our defense strategy and tactics."

House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill said Addabbo had won the respect of congressmen "from both sides of the aisle" because "he demanded quality for each defense dollar.

N.Y.'s FRIEND—MY FRIEND

We have lost Joe Addabbo. It is a loss difficult to measure and impossible to reconcile, especially for those of us blessed enough to have been his friend.

The city has lost its most senior and powerful member of Congress. The people of the 6th Congressional district in Queens have lost a loyal and devoted public servant who gave so much of his time and energy to serving their needs.

Joe Addabbo gave our city, our state and our nation 26 productive, proud and principled years of service as a member of the House of Representatives. In those years he rose to national prominence as chairman of the all-important Defense Appropriations subcommittee.

Joe Addabbo took on the tough issues.

He took on one President over Vietnam, another over Nicaragua. He took on the defense establishment over costly weapons systems such as the B–1 bomber.

Joe won some and lost some. Yet when you tangled with Joe, it was a good clean fight. He was a leader who could disagree strongly with you but never be disagreeable in the process.

Many people will remember Joe for his work on the Defense Subcommittee. Yet his overall service on the House Appropriations Committee was outstanding but often overlooked.

Joe's imprint is on scores of important bills which became law over the past 26 years. He was an unabashed liberal Democrat who saw it as government's role to help those in need and to provide opportunities for a better life.

No program, whether Medicare, or higher education, or aid to mass transit or child nutrition, could get money unless its budget was approved by the Appropriations Committee and Joe Addabbo. Joe did this part of his work with a kind of quiet effectiveness that often kept him out of the limelight. On far too many occasions it caused him not to be given enough credit for all he did.

Joe Addabbo did not want headlines. All he wanted to do was to get the job done, and he did.

We struggle with our feelings at this moment. We are in grief, yet we are also relieved that Joe Addabbo is not suffering anymore.

Joe Addabbo, sweet, kind and totally unassuming, endured a silent six-year struggle with cancer. Did he let it slow him down? No. Did he let it get him down? No.

Joe was active until the final days. He loved his life, his work, his country and the people he represented too much to be any other way. He never wanted to burden anyone with his problems, no matter how serious they were. That was his nature, that was a measure of the greatness of the man.

Joe Addabbo was as good as he was because he mirrored the people he represented. A man of unparalleled integrity with high moral principles and values, he never let the trappings of power cause him to be removed from his constituents. He served them long enough that they were part of an extended Addabbo family.

He truly loved his constituents and it was genuinely reciprocated over a lifetime.

Joe Addabbo spent almost half his life as a member of the House of Representatives. He loved the institution and those who served in it. In turn, members of both parties respected and had genuine affection for Joe. Few have served in the House with greater distinction. Few who have served will be missed more than Joe.

Joe Addabbo is gone, but he will be remembered for his impact on our nation's development and for his countless deeds of kindness and charity over a lifetime.

Joe, go in peace. You helped make this world a more peaceful and restful place.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RANGEL].

Mr. RANGEL. I thank the dean for getting this time for all of us, in our small way, to pay tribute to a long and dear friend. It is strange how so many people felt the very special relationship to JOE, and I guess that is because he took the time out to be concerned about our problems, and struggle with cancer for so long that none of us really knew it; and yet even in the closing days of his life, he would come over and ask us individually about how some problem that we had was facing us.

We all have different special feelings for JOE; sometimes I think about the morning meetings, the afternoon meetings, the evening meetings; and we look at each other and wonder: why do we have to attend all of these meetings for special interests groups or groups that have come here from New York for some special reason?

And yet, JOE was one among all of the delegation that was always there; knew something about each and every one of the problems that people had.

So the gentleman is right; we are trying hard to try to replace in some small way the way JOE. opened up his heart in New York City to so many of the Members, to understand Broadway, to understand the poor communities, to understand Gracie Mansion, and I guess it is because that JOE was really New York City. He was everything that we would want people to think that New York City was: A friendly town; sometimes rough, but always having the compassion to understand other people's problems and to respect and recognize those differences.

I only hope that God gives the strength to Grace, to his sons, Dominick and Joseph, to understand that life would have been terribly different if we in the Congress did not have a JOSEPH ADDABBO, and some of us who have followed him now have a much higher standard to follow, and those to follow us will never forget that JOE ADDABBO walked through this House of Representatives and left his mark.

Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to my colleague and dear friend, JOE ADDABBO, who recently passed away after a long struggle with cancer. I would like to commend Congressman STRATTON for scheduling this very timely special order.

In his 26 years in Congress, JOE ADDABBO gained the respect of all who came into contact with him. He was one of the most effective legislators I have ever known. On Capitol Hill, he was a respected leader in making certain that our defense policy stayed within the bounds of the law. When necessary, he used the power of the purse to curtail what he thought were unacceptable expenditures on unneeded weapons systems. In this way JOE let the Pentagon know that it ultimately answers to the American people and their representatives.

On the domestic front, JOE ADDABBO delivered what was needed for his people back home. He grew up in the district which eventually sent him to Washington. The people knew him, and they trusted him. He was instrumental in preserving New York City's defense-based industry, creating jobs for the people who most needed them. His voting record was consistently humanitarian. When civil rights and community-oriented bills came to the floor, JOE ADDABBO could be counted on to cast his vote.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to conclude by saying that JOE ADDABBO was the kind of man who cared about people. He cared about them as individuals, not in the abstract as constituents. His breed is very rare, and very precious. I will miss him.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN].

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for arranging this special order and it is with deep regret and sympathy that I rise to join with my colleagues in paying tribute to our departed colleague and dear friend the gentleman from New York, JOE ADDABBO.

During his quarter century in the House, JOE ADDABBO served as an inspiration to his colleagues. JOE's dedication to his tasks, his even-tempered fairness, his gentlemanly demeanor earned for him the respect of us all.

JOSEPH P. ADDABBO was first elected to the House in 1960, to the seat vacated by the retiring Representative Albert H. Bosch. Representative Bosch was a Republican, representing a district that had remained in the Republican column for many years, and some observers thought that JOE ADDABBO's first election was a one-time fluke brought about by the presence of John F. Kennedy on the Democratic ticket. JOE soon proved them wrong, however, winning reelection 12 times, sometimes with Republican endorsement and sometimes despite dramatic redistricting boundary shifts.

JOE ADDABBO made it clear that his first love was his home district in Queens. He commuted to Washington weekly, and was proud to remind us that he moved only four times in his life—all within the space of 10 blocks in Ozone Park.

JOE ADDABBO's diligence eventually brought him to the chairmanship of the Subcommittee on Defense on the House Appropriations Committee in 1979. During the 7 years that he served in this position, he became the model of an outstanding legislative leader. He was vigilant as a congressional watchdog against Pentagon waste. Although JOE ADDABBO was adept at trimming the fat away from our defense appropriations, he was just as diligent in making certain that we didn't cut into any vital muscle of our Nation's defense.

In 1982, the residents of our mid-Hudson Valley of New York received the benefits of Congressman ADDABBO's skill and compassion. After years of private fundraising efforts, construction was finally ready to commence on the Jewish chapel for the U.S. Military Academy at West Point. But just as work was about to begin on this long-overdue project, an obscure law dating from the 1890's was found which would have prohibited the Jewish chapel from being connected to the utilities at West Point. The appropriation process for that fiscal year was completed, and it appeared that years of effort on the part of many dedicated people would prove to be for naught.

When this problem was explained to JOE ADDABBO, he took on the cause as his own. He found a legislative vehicle to allow an exemption to this law, and conducted a personal lobbying effort to ensure its passage. In many ways, the West Point Jewish chapel is a memorial to the leadership of Congressman JOE ADDABBO.

In recent years, the ethnic composition of JOE's district shifted dramatically. As a result, some observers predicted JOE's defeat. But JOE ADDABBO surprised them all, winning 68 percent of the primary vote, and 83 percent of the general election vote, in the last election. It became obvious that the high regard JOE ADDABBO held for his constituency was mutual.

To his beloved widow, Grace, to his two sons Dominick and Joseph, Jr., and to his daughter, Dina, I join my colleagues in offering our deepest condolences.

This Chamber, and our Nation, are better places because of JOE ADDABBO. We in the House are privileged to have known him and to have worked with him. JOE's shoes will be hard to fill. We will long miss JOE ADDABBO.

□ 1845

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCHUGH].

Mr. MCHUGH. I thank the gentleman for yielding and for giving us this opportunity to express our admiration and affection for our colleague, JOE ADDABBO.

Mr. Speaker, the recent death of our colleague JOE ADDABBO is a great loss for his family, for his friends, and for the people of Queens whom he represented so effectively for many years. His passing is also a real loss for the House of Representatives and the Nation at large.

The historical accounts of our time will surely credit the leadership JOE ADDABBO provided to Congress as chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee. At a critical period in our Nation's history, he brought to defense issues a rare combination of expertise and commonsense. He recognized the need for a strong, credible defense, and he worked hard to assure that our Nation had it. At the same time. JOE was willing to ask tough questions, to hold the Pentagon to sound management standards, and, when required, to oppose unnecessary or destabilizing military expenditures. Striking this kind of balance in defense policy was not always easy, but JOE had an unusual talent for doing so.

I had the privilege of serving with JOE on the Appropriations Committee, and of course we were both members of the New York delegation. For this reason I had many opportunities to observe and admire JOE's self-effacing, diligent, and effective service to this House and to the people of our country. He was a person of strong convictions which were the more persuasive because they were untinged by excessive pride or ego. And even with those with whom he strongly disagreed, he was a gentle, kind, and considerate man.

Mr. Speaker, we will all miss JOE ADDABBO. It was a privilege to serve with him in this House. His contributions and his example will long be remembered.

Mr. STRATTON. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LENT].

Mr. LENT. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness that I join my colleagues today in paying tribute to one of America's finest statesmen, former Congressman JOSEPH ADDABBO, who passed away earlier this month. JOE was always a fighter. Despite a long and difficult battle against cancer, he continued to work tirelessly here in Congress, serving his own constituents, New York State, and the Nation until the last.

As a fellow member of the New York State congressional delegation, I had the great honor of serving alongside JOE in the House for 16 years. Every weekend, JOE, would travel from Washington, DC, to his home in Ozone Park, Queens and, we'd often run into each other on the shuttle to New York's La Guardia Airport or on the return flight early Monday morning. Sharing the plane ride together many times over the years, I came to know JOE as a kind and compassionate family man who had a great sense of humor. As a politician, he was a knowledgeable strategist and worthy opponent in a debate. JOE ADDABBO was tough but he was always fair.

From his powerful position as chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense, JOE ADDABBO was admired and respected by Members on both sides of the aisle as a forceful advocate of a strong, but lean, national defense. Under his leadership, the Appropriations Defense Subcommittee successfully trimmed billions of dollars in excess defense spending.

Since 1979, when JOE assumed his subcommittee's chairmanship, he was a staunch ally for Long Island's defense and aerospace industry.

He played a key role in securing for Long Island several of its recent major defense contracts, including the upgrading of Grumman Corp.'s F-14 Tomcat fighter and the Fairchild Republic Co.'s T-46 jet trainer aircraft. He continued to fight for the T-46 even from his hospital bed where he was battling against cancer. JOE was committed to ensuring that New York received its fair share of defense dollars, and as chairman of the Long Island congressional caucus, I will always be grateful for his valuable help and support.

JOE ADDABBO was a public servant in the truest sense of the word. For over a quarter of a century, he served his Queens constituents and his country with honor and distinction. In losing JOE, we have lost a beloved colleague and one of the finest individuals ever to serve in Congress. This outstanding American has earned a place in the hearts of his countrymen and the history of our Nation. I know I speak for all who knew and loved JOE in saying that he will be sorely missed. My wife, Barbara, and I extend our deepest sympathies to his loyal staff, his beloved wife Grace, and his two sons and daughter.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, at this time I yield to the distinguished gentleman from New York, the erstwhile Speaker pro tempore, Mr. GARCIA.

Mr. GARCIA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to also command the gentleman for taking this time because I just think it is so appropriate for a man like JOE ADDABBO.

Mr. Speaker, we are here today to remember one of our own, JOE ADDABBO.

Mr. Speaker, he served his community and his Nation for over 25 years as a Member of this institution.

JOE ADDABBO had the appearance of being an ordinary politician, a product of his community, not a mover and shaker. But in reality JOE was both. He was very definitely a product of his community, which, I might add, he served with distinction. He was also one of the most influential Members of the House.

JOE rose to the top because he was willing to work hard. He was willing to make sure his constituents were taken care of, while he also kept a watchful eye on issues of national importance, such as defense spending. In facts, as chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, he always tried to keep military spending in line with what he thought the American people wanted. He made sure that defense appropriations did not completely overtake spending for necessary social assistance programs.

Yet, JOE ADDABBO was more than a good politician, he was a friend. JOE was down to earth; he was always approachable. He never forgot his roots. JOE worked hard to see that all men and women were treated fairly. He fought for civil rights legislation, to make sure that in the eyes of the law all men were created equal.

It is difficult to list JOE's many accomplishments. After 25 years, he achieved too much for us to mention in 1 hour. There is, however, one thing about JOE that made him stand out from the crowd: His humanity. JOE was always willing to lend a helping hand. He never had an inflated sense of himself. He never caught "Potomac fever."

Now, we must go on without JOE, without his warm smile and human touch. His passing has definitely brought saddness to many of us, but our memories of him will always bring us warmth. We will surely miss JOE ADDABBO.

You know, Mr. Speaker, there was just one quick moment during that period of time when he had been hospitalized for several months and then came back for a short period. He sat here and he said:

Bob, I have to tell you a funny story. You know, when I was over at the hospital, I had this young doctor taking care of me, and he came over to me and he was really terrific. He really hovered over me, made sure I had all of my needs taken care of. He was a person who I had helped get into the military academy. You know what, Bob, you know what his name was? It was Dr. Garcia.

And I really appreciated that because even today we passed a resolution dealing with Jewish heritage. That was a resolution that JOE ADDABBO passed every year. As chairman of the Census Subcommittee handling those bills I can remember his insistence, "Bob, are we going to get it out, are we going to get it out?" I can tell you even today with JOE ADDABBO gone for a couple of weeks, we are still today working on legislation and resolutions that he really treasured.

So I thank my colleague for giving me these few minutes to praise a great colleague.

Mr. STRATTON. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MANTON].

Mr. MANTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness that I mark the passing of my distinguished colleague and friend, JOSEPH P. ADDABBO. JOE leaves us a legacy of over a quarter century of service in the House of Representatives to his constituents, his city, his State, and his country. He stood out as an example of how one should carefully handle the public trust in order to inspire public confidence in our political institutions.

The people of the Sixth Congressional District of New York were indeed fortunate to have such a representative of candor, courage and integrity. JOE ADDABBO was a true representative of his constituents. Throughout his life he lived within a 10-block area. He spoke not only from his own ideology, but also on behalf of his constituency. The faith his constituents placed in him was reflected by the way he was returned to Washington 13 times.

Mr. Speaker, JOE ADDABBO was a leader in the great issues of his day in civil rights, education and senior citizens. However, his largest impact was in the area of defense. In 1973, he sponsored the first antiwar resolution ever to pass the House of Representatives, cutting off funds for the bombing of Cambodia. As chairman of the Defense Subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, he advocated a strong but lean and cost effective defense, objecting to projects he considered wasteful, such as the B-1 bomber and the MX missile.

When I was elected to the Congress in the fall of 1984 to the district next to his in Queens, JOE ADDABBO was always available to assist me in any way possible. He was influential in helping me obtain a seat on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee and also a seat on the Banking Committee. Both these assignments are important for the people of my district.

Mr. Speaker, JOE ADDABBO was a skillful legislator who was always a good friend and political adviser to me. He consistently aided those in our society who most need our concern and assistance. His accomplishments will survive as a fitting tribute to his long and outstanding career of public service in the House of Representatives. I join all my colleagues in mourning JOE's death, celebrating his life, and recalling his lasting contributions to New York and to America. My heartfelt condolences go out to Grace, the children and the entire ADDABBO family.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ACKERMAN].

Mr. ACKERMAN. I thank the gentleman very much.

I miss JOE ADDABBO. It is really hard to believe that he is not here with us in the Chamber at this time.

When I came here a few short years ago, JOE had already been here for two decades. He was a legend in the community. But we never really fully understand the power that he wielded here in the Congress and how much he meant to this institution and to the entire country. JOE was always there. He was the quintessential good guy. Everybody knew him, everybody liked him. He had a district in which if he walked down the street, there was not a person that he could not call by their first name and talk to them and tell them a story about what happened when they were kids or about their father or about their family.

We used to kid him back home in Queen in the political circles. JOE used to be able to walk into the largest of meetings, be they political, civil, social, and as we call it, "do the room." He would be able to work the room and shake hands with every single person in the room, to give them a good word, to pat them on the back, tell them a story, and to be out of the place within 20 minutes.

Nobody ever knew how he did it.

□ 1900

We used to try to compete with him and say, "JOE, I will be out of the room before you." And he sometimes would be out of the room before we got there, and everybody thought that JOE was still there because he had such a sense of presence, yet his presence was not overpowering, regardless of the power that he actually did have.

There was not a person who had a bad word for JOE. JOE was elected and reelected from a district that some people finally at the last two elections thought was impossible for him to accomplish. It was a district that changed racially. It was a district that changed because of reapportionment. It was a district that people suggested JOE possibly not run in, that he run in an adjoining district where he would have a better chance because of the statistics. But JOE, courageously and from his heart, said, "This is the place that I was born, this is the place that I have represented for the past quarter of a century, and this is the place that I am going to run." He did run and was elected overwhelmingly in the last two elections, despite what all of the pundits had to say.

All of the people that he was good to over the years were also good to JOE. He did not take anybody for granted. I feel kind of guilty, and I know that his constituents do, too, because we sort of took him for granted. We really never understood the full worth of the man.

Having come here to Congress a few short years ago, I have been privileged to realize the kind of things that JOE has been involved in. And as fortune would have it, JOE and I alphabetically were the first two names on the roll-call. I would always look up to the upper lefthand corner just to make sure that I would vote, and I would notice everybody else used to look up to that upper lefthand corner. They were not looking to see if I voted or not; they were really looking to see what JOE had done and what JOE thought on a particular issue. Such was his influence in this House.

When I got here, I remember he draped his arm around me with that great big teddybear grin of his, and he looked at me and he said, "This is what it is all about. How can I help you?" And help he did as he did with so many other people.

I would see him sit in different places in this Hall, whether it be on the Democratic side or the Republican side, it would make no difference to JOE. He had friends all over. Everybody loved him.

Mr. Speaker, I miss JOE. I know everybody in this House does. He leaves his mark here that is indelible, and he leaves a void that is going to be impossible for all of us, even collectively, to fill.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me, and I congratulate the gentleman for taking this special order.

I am here primarily to pay tribute to a fellow who was indeed a great man. He was the powerful chairman of the Subcommittee on Defense on the Appropriations Committee. But notwithstanding his power in that capacity, notwithstanding his many, many years as a U.S. Congressman, he also was a very nice person. He was a man of the people.

Mr. Speaker, I did not really know JOE in the first 8 years that I served here in the House of Representatives. I knew him casually, as we would come and go and would chat in the Halls or on the floor of the House. But it really was not until I came to have a chance to serve on the Defense Subcommittee on the Appropriations Committee that I got to know him, that I had the ability to watch him and to observe him, how he handled the committee with such grace and charm. Oftentimes he was even outvoted by the vast majority of the members of the subcommittee. We did not always agree. But when we did not agree, it was always in good spirit and good humor and in grace and in charm that JOE constantly possessed.

He was a gracious man and a nice man, but he was also a tough man. Evidently, the facts indicate that he had been sick for years without anybody really knowing the details of his illness. Yet, in only May of last year, with enormous grace and charm, he invited Members of the House and their families—and I think that is terribly significant that he brought their families, their wives and their children—with him to his city up in New York and showed them around with a great deal of pride and fanfare, and showed them the high spots of that wonderful Big Apple of his. I have to say that never, not one instance, during that trip did he ever indicate that he knew that he was ill, and he looked wonderful. He was charming and gracious and presented everybody with a perfectly wonderful time. It was a great pleasure for my wife and children to go on that trip with me and to be hosted by JOE and Gracie and his family and friends. I just want to tell you that that is a memory that I will want to take with me for the rest of my life, because it was not long after that trip that JOE's health started to decline and it became obvious that he did have a problem even then.

He was tough to the end. He never let on that it was as serious as it was.

As the speakers who preceded me, I will indeed miss JOE ADDABBO, because he was a fine man and a man with whom I personally am very, very pleased to have been associated.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RUDD].

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me, and I appreciate the fact that the gentleman took out this special order for our friend and colleague, JOE ADDABBO.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in eulogy to our friend and colleague, JOE ADDABBO. He repeatedly demonstrated an ability that was recognized universally here in the House of leadership in politics and in government, which he understood very well.

Mr. Speaker, it was a pleasure for me to know him and to call him friend. He will be missed by all of us.

I wish to extend greatest sympathy and assure his family and theirs that he is in our prayers and in my prayers.

It has been a privilege to serve with JOE on the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. REGULA].

Mr. REGULA. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me. I also appreciate the gentleman taking out the time for this special order.

Many before me tonight have discussed JOE ADDABBO's skill and dedication as a legislator.

I share the appreciation of these qualities.

One of JOE's great attributes was that he had his priorities right.

He loved his church, he loved his family, and he loved it's country.

We will miss him as a cherished colleague, we will miss him as a friend and we will miss him as a valuable Member of this body.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SCHUMER].

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and very much thank the gentleman for taking out this special order in memory and in great honor of JOSEPH P. ADDABBO.

Mr. Speaker, I first met Joe right after I was elected to Congress in 1980. I asked around and people said you ought to go see JOE ADDABBO. So I called him up. I never expected to talk to the man. I called him up at his office in Ozone Park, and he said, "Come on out. I am here at the office. It was a Saturday. I traveled out and there was Joe in his shirt sleeves, a kindly looking man, not the kind of man you would think was in the movies about how a Congressman would look. He was happy and smiling and just warm and genuine.

He sat with me for over 2 hours, and we talked over potential committee choices and everything else. I went away saying, "Boy, oh boy, what a nice man JOE ADDABBO is."

The second time I met him, the mayor of New York had a reception at Gracie Mansion—no. I think it was at City Hall. It was a meeting about some kind of thing. It was again before Congress started. I am walking over to city hall and who comes up from out of the subway saying, "Hi, SCHUMER," JOE ADDABBO. I said, "JOE, you took the subway?" He said, "Yes. When I go into the city out from Ozone Park, I take the subway in." Here was a man who was revealed to me to be one of the most powerful men in the Congress, and there he was coming up the steps of the subway with that big smile on his face.

Those were the first two memories of JOE, and they stick, because, as my good colleague from Queens mentioned before, JOE had a lot of power; not only power, by the way, that came from the authority of his position, power that came from his decency and his personality and his kindness and goodness.

But the humble ways of life never left him, and that created an aura about JOE. He was not somebody who was brandishing the chairmanship that he had or the perquisites of the office. He was somebody who genuinely cared and liked people.

So we have lots of people who have attained the statutory position and power that JOE did here in the Congress but very few had almost universal respect. JOE's power was augmented by the fact that he never, never lost touch with what real life was all about. In a sense, he was like the Greek mythology figure, who, every time he touched the ground, gained strength, and the only way Hercules could strangle him and kill him was to hold him up in the air. JOE gained strength from walking on the ground, from not being 20 feet up in the air. It made him more effective, it made him more powerful, but most of all, it spoke to the decency of the man.

We in New York, in New York City and New York State, have suffered a loss that will take years to replace, a man who could reach out to every Member of the Congress, regardless of party, ideology, or area from which they came, and again in a gentle and kind way, persuade them to his point of view.

We in America have lost a great leader—words that are sometimes used too casually, but words that are truly fitting of this wonderful, wonderful man.

Of course, the people of Queens and JOE's family have lost, in a personal sense, somebody who was among the best.

Being in Congress, Mr. Speaker, has really made me a patriot. It has made me a patriot because the Congress reflects the American people. When you look around and see the people in this body, you know what a good people the American people are. And if somebody typifies that to me, it is JOE ADDABBO. It is JOE ADDABBO, not was JOE ADDABBO, because he will walk with us for many, many more years to come in this body.

Mr. STRATTON. I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS].

Mr. WEISS. I thank the distinguished gentleman for yielding, and I want to express my appreciation to the gentleman for taking this special order so that we could join in honoring the memory of our late colleague and friend, JOSEPH P. ADDABBO.

Mr. Speaker, few Members have earned so much respect and affection from both sides of the aisle as JOE ADDABBO. His devotion to public life and his painstaking attention to detail made him one of the most effective legislators in the House.

I know that I share the sentiments of every Member of this body in mourning his passing and extend our deepest sympathy to his wife, Grace, and his sons, Dominic and Joseph, and the other members of his family, his many friends and his constituents.

In the House of Representatives, JOE ADDABBO leaves behind an untold number of friends and admirers who will greatly miss his genial and yet statesmanlike presence. He also leaves behind an important and continuing legacy in the areas of foreign policy and defense. As a Member of the Congress, JOE ADDABBO distinguished himself by becoming one of the first lawmakers to take a firm stand against the Vietnam war. He sponsored the first antiwar resolution to pass the House, a resolution cutting off funds for the bombing of Cambodia. It was an action that took courage, foresight, and determination.

Of course, JOE ADDABBO played his most important role as chairman of the House Appropriations Subcommitte on Defense. He understood that there was more to the security of our Nation than the size of the defense budget, and he earned the accolades of Members for insisting that defense dollars requested by the administration, any administration, be fully justified before being approved.

In doing so, he helped rein in the runaway policy of throwing dollars at the Pentagon and helped to forge our defense budget into more of a defense policy.

It was JOE ADDABBO who led many of the most important battles against wasteful and dangerous weapon systems like the B–1 bomber and the MX missile. He began these battles and pursued them vigorously, despite the fact that he often faced strong opposition from Members of his own subcommittee and from the administration. He did so because he was convinced that these weapons would not contribute to the security of our Nation.

The concerns of his Queens constituents were always uppermost in JOE's mind. He took the time to listen to them and to understand their needs. He insisted that the Federal Government play a role in protecting civil rights and in aiding the poor and the uneducated. He was also a staunch supporter of a woman's right to choose her own determination as to her body in regard to abortion.

But in recent years, JOE ADDABBO fought more than legislative battles. He also fought a long and difficult battle against cancer. In that battle, as in all others, he distinguished himself with courage, dignity, and perseverance.

In the Borough of Queens, throughout New York City and across this Nation, the memory of JOE ADDABBO will always serve as an inspiration to those who value excellence and believe in serving our fellow human beings.

On this occasion I wish to once again express my profound sorrow at the loss of our cherished colleague and to extend my heartfelt sympathies to the family and friends and constituents of JOE ADDABBO.

JOE, we will never forget you.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MOLINARI].

Mr. MOLINARI. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I guess what we have all been saying here this afternoon and this evening is how much we all loved JOE ADDABBO. I think the tragedy of life and death is that, unfortunately, after you die, you do not know the respect that your colleagues have held you and the country has held you. Attending the mass at St. Patrick's Cathedral was a terribly moving experience for me. I was sitting near Congressman SCHUMER, and we were looking about, at our colleagues, and we saw tears flowing down cheeks all over the place, and we knew that we were there to pay respects to that "teddy bear" that we all loved.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder how many of us could have carried on the battle as he did, suffering the torment that he did. I have thought a lot about this. I do not know how JOE could continue to smile, as he did, like there was nothing wrong with him.

I would like to just mention one experience I had not so long ago. I guess it was in January when JOE returned from a long absence. As Congressman ACKERMAN said before, he used to sit on the Republican side a lot. I think that said something. We would have welcomed him with open arms, needless to say. But I did not see him walk in, and he popped into the seat next to me and patted me on the leg and said, "How are you doing?" I turned around, and I was shocked because I did not know JOE was back. I looked at him, and he looked great; he had a tan, and he was wearing that ever-present smile. He asked me how I felt. At that point in time I felt good about JOE ADDABBO. I thought maybe he has turned the corner and now he is on his way back to us. But, no, he knew what he had. He knew what he had and it did not "buffalo" him for 1 minute. The courage of that man and the spirit of that man was never broken by that terrible illness, never broken for 1 moment. And I think that is the thing that touches me the most—it is at a time like that, when a person is dying and knows that he is dying and can carry on, performing his duties, and at the same time smiling to his colleagues and saying, "I am proud to be one of you."

I will close by saying that unfortunately throughout this land of ours those who serve in Congress and other legislative bodies are generally not held in high esteem, and I think that is a product of a lot of things—sometimes bad press, bad media coverage, and what not—but I wish to God that all the people of this Nation could have been in St. Patrick's Cathedral, could have witnessed three planeloads of colleagues flying in from all over the country to be there with the man in his final moments before interment. It was an incredible experience for me and something that I shall never forget.

He left his mark, all right. He left his mark for all of us. JOE is still here. JOE will always remain with us because of the incredible presence that he lent to us and the lessons that he taught all of us.

I thank the gentleman for taking this special order.

Mr. STRATTON. I thank the gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. VENTO. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I want to again rise and commend the gentleman from New York, the dean of the delegation, for having this special order and to share a few of my experiences with JOE ADDABBO. I first met him as a Member of this body in 1977. Of course, first and foremost, as a Member I might say that I think that the reason that this outpouring of support and recognition for him is forthcoming is because JOE was himself. JOE ADDABBO was a man who was natural and sincere and someone that we all shared a great deal of affection for. I knew him, of course, as a Member of this body and a member of the Appropriations Committee, and later serving as chairman in a distinguished manner of the Subcommittee on Defense Appropriations, where he fought and labored so much of the time during his service in this body. I think he had the quality of being able to disagree without being disagreeable. Often I found myself in agreement with him, I might say, on many issues. He was a great leader, from my perspective, on these defense-related issues that are so important to our Nation's history and our Nation's future; but he could disagree without being disagreeable. I think all of us respected that. He could fight the fight and make the argument for policy, and when it was done, that was the end of it—you had a good debate. I think that reflected well on him and on the quality of decisions that are made in this body.

As I say, I felt that he always had a good perspective and could keep things in perspective with regard to these issues, as well as representing the people.

In his final days we all recognized that he had a serious illness. It was not obvious when it began because he kept it pretty much to himself. But we recognized this, and he showed us again, I think, not just how to serve this body but, as the great person he was, I think he showed us how to leave this body.

I want to offer my condolences, of course, to Mrs. Addabbo, Grace, and the family, and I think he has made a great contribution at the national level and certainly has been a role model for many of us who serve here. He will indeed be missed but certainly not forgotten.

Mr. STRATTON. I thank the gentleman from Minnesota for his remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce that the New York State Legislature adopted a resolution yesterday in memory of our late colleague, JOSEPH P. ADDABBO. In both the State senate and assembly, Mr. ADDABBO was memorialized in a resolution sponsored by the leadership and the members of the legislature from the Borough of Queens. Congressman ADDABBO was well recognized and regarded by the legislative leadership in the State of New York. It was through his leadership in this House that many of New York's Federal programs received their sponsorship and support.

I am including in the RECORD a copy of the resolution which was adopted in Albany, NY, yesterday:

RESOLUTION MEMORIALIZING CONGRESSMAN JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

Whereas, Joseph P. Addabbo, Member of Congress, succumbed following a long illness on Thursday, April tenth, nineteen hundred eighty-six at Walter Reed Military Hospital, Washington, D.C. at the age of sixty-one after a quarter of a century of service in the Congress of the United States; and

Whereas, Mr. Addabbo was born March seventeenth, nineteen hundred twenty-five to Dominick and Anna Addabbo in Queens County, New York and resided in Ozone Park, New York; attended PS 59, Queens Boy's High School, Brooklyn; City College, New York; St. John's Law School, Queens. He was admitted to the New York State Bar in 1946; was a member of Queens County Bar Association, Columbia Lawyers Association; and

Whereas, Mr. Addabbo began his Congressional career in nineteen hundred sixty-one and served as the Chairman of the powerful House Defense Appropriations Subcommittee since nineteen hundred seventy-nine. His careful eye against wasteful budget expenditures was well-known. At the time of his death, he was also serving on the Subcommittees of the Small Business Committee: SBA and SBIC Authority, Minority Enterprise, General Small Business Problems, and General Oversight. Past committee assignments include Veteran's Affairs, and Post Office-Civil Service; and

Whereas, Mr. Addabbo was a tireless defender of the interests of New York State and was remarkably successful in protecting New York's defense industries and was instrumental in bringing the Battleship Group to Staten Island; the Intrepid Museum to Manhattan; the construction of the A-6 Training Plane and F-14 Fighter Jets to Long Island; and the Army to Fort Drum. The State and City of New York will be forever grateful to the Congressman for his efforts in providing vital assistance to New York's housing, economic development, transportation, and public assistance programs. He was a masterful public figure, and was well-loved by his colleagues on both sides of the aisle; and

Whereas, Mr. Addabbo is survived by his beloved wife, Grace Salamone, and three children, Dominick, Dina and Joseph; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this Legislative Body pause in its deliberations to acknowledge the life, career and contributions of Joseph P. Addabbo and to express its condolences to his family upon the occasion of his passing; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this Resolution, suitably engrossed, be transmitted to his beloved wife, Mrs. Grace Addabbo.

Mr. McDADE. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the House is taking the time today to honor JOE ADDABBO. I thank the Members of the New York State delegation for arranging this special order in his memory.

Congress has lost one of its most respected legislators with JOE's passing, and many of us in the House lost a good friend as well. I came to know JOE ADDABBO by serving with him many years on the Small Business and Appropriations Committees. We worked side by side over the years in a bipartisan fashion for objectives we believed would best serve this country.

When you work many long hours with a colleague, as I did with JOE, you get to know him well. I developed a professional respect and a personal friendship with JOE by working closely with him while he was chairman and I was ranking Republican on the Small Business Subcommittee on Minority Enterprise and General Oversight and, most recently, on the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee.

JOE ADDABBO will probably best be remembered for presiding over the Nation's defense budget at a crucial time in our Nation's history. He used his high-ranking position to fight tirelessly to cut waste and bureaucracy in the Department of Defense. JOE took on these battles because he felt the Nation and the world would be more secure, and because he believed that the tax dollars of our citizens should be used in the most efficient and effective manner.

JOE's prominence in the defense area makes it easy to overlook his enormous contribution in the small business area, particularly on belalf of minority businesses. I worked with JOE nearly a decade ago to establish the small and small disadvantaged business subcontracting program for Federal contracts. Five years ago, we teamed up to protect small and minority businesses when we protested provisions in the multilateral trade agreements that would have undermined the 8(a) setaside. It is not an exaggeration to say that our small business community is more economically viable and that new opportunities for minority business success exist today because of JOE ADDABBO's efforts.

JOE will be truly remembered for his achievements, but those of us who knew him will also think of his personal attributes. He was compassionate, understanding, evenhanded and kind man. I think the best tribute we can give to JOE ADDABBO would be to carry on in his absence with the same professionalism and humanity that were his trademarks.

To his wife, Grace, and to his fine children, our heartfelt sympathy.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to my friend and colleague, JOSEPH P. ADDABBO, a great New Yorker and a true gentleman. We served together in this body and as part of the New York delegation for 18 years. He bravely fought through 6 years of suffering and never made an issue of his troubles so that he could continue his important work here in the House. It is important to note that in his last 6 years he gained the most recognition of his fine work as chairman of the Subcommittee on Defense of the Appropriations Committee.

JOE tried hard to balance the best interests of his district, New York State and the Nation. He was always open minded and fair. When he was considering decisions of enormous consequence such as funding for the MX or B-1 bomber, he would always take the time to listen to the smaller concerns of Members not on his subcommittee. I will not forget his support for the development of a military component at Stewart Airport in my district and that it came at an especially critical time.

JOE will be sorely missed. I had the good fortune to work with him and was privileged to call him a friend.

Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Speaker, the opportunity to speak a few words about our dear departed colleague, JOSEPH ADDABBO, is an opportunity for me to reflect on what it means to be a Member of Congress, what skills and talents we bring to this splendid institution. All of us who served with JOE ADDABBO have been very fortunate, for he brought many gifts to the House of Representatives. He brought a strong sense of fairness and integrity which was reflected in all of his dealings with his colleagues. He brought a keen sense of vision as to the direction we should be leading the country. And he brought courage—first, in opposing the war in Vietnam and later, in confronting his final illness.

A St. John's Law School graduate, Mr. ADDABBO practiced law as a peoples lawyer in Queens before being elected to Congress. He was a man who never strayed far from his neighborhood and friends of the Sixth District of New York and also never strayed far from his deep personal convictions about how his constituents should be.

Representative ADDABBO, first elected to Congress in 1960, ranked 21st in House seniority. Mr. ADDABBO acquired his seniority via the usual mode of reelection, but over those years he also garnered respect and authority from his fellow Members, by his love for this great institution and his fundamental fairness. Congressman ADDABBO had gained a reputation for working closely with other Members, and being an effective strategist in shepherding legislation through the legislative process.

Congressman ADDABBO chaired the Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense since 1979, and was an esteemed and trusted adviser on all defense and military issues. He was an astute politician, a watchdog against waste, and an expert and specialist in all areas of defense related legislation.

His membership on the Small Business Committee and related subcommittees kept him dedicated and aware of all business concerns. Congressman ADDABBO worked in behalf of small business, especially minority businesses in his district. The thriving small business population in Queens can give testament to all of the Congressman's legislative accomplishments.

Congressman ADDABBO was a practical politician who sought to solve the problems of Queens by bringing employment in military and defense areas and by aiding the business population. Mr. ADDABBO was a true friend of the people, and he proved it, over and over again, by sponsoring legislation to aid his economically depressed constituents.

He was a humble man who was dedicated to the House and therefore dedicated to earnestly representing his constituents in and out of committee. He made it very clear that the House of Representatives was his calling in life, it was his career. His primary desire was to play an influential role in congressional affairs. The people of New York's Sixth District have lost a dedicated Representative. The House of Representatives has lost a respected colleague who will be sadly missed by all. He was a true friend who had left his mark on all those whose lives he touched.

Thank you.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I want to join with my colleagues in paying tribute to one of the most popular members in this Chamber, Representative JOE ADDABBO.

He set a very fine example of leadership in the House of Representatives for 26 years. He will be greatly missed.

JOE handled a very tough assignment in chairing the Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense. He did that job very effectively and earned the respect of Members on both sides of the aisles.

I also enjoyed the Congressional Prayer Breakfast with JOE. We talked about his health but he never complained about it. He fought hard against his illness, just as he fought for his beliefs and principles here in the House.

I am proud to have had a chance to serve with JOE ADDABBO. He worked hard for his constituents in New York and for the people of this country as chairman of the Defense Subcommittee. His leadership and expertise will be missed.

Mr. BEVILL. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to my good friend and colleague, JOE ADDABBO, whose leadership we will all miss.

JOE was a wonderful person. He was always pleasant and always seemed happy. He never let problems get him down. JOE also was one of the most respected Members of Congress—respected on both sides of the aisle.

As chairman of the House Appropriations Defense Subcommittee, JOE was the author of the biggest appropriations bill in the world. He was strong on defense, but he would not stand for wasteful military spending. He wanted to make sure that our hard-earned tax dollars were properly spent, at the same time ensuring that this Nation was properly protected.

JOE served 26 years in the House of Representatives with unflagging dedication to his New York constituents and to the Nation as a whole. He was a man of integrity. He stood up for what he believed in and worked hard to achieve those goals.

His talents will be missed. But, more than that, JOE will be personally missed by his many friends. I am proud to have known him, to have worked with him, to have called him a friend. We won't forget JOE ADDABBO.

Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my colleagues in expressing my deep sympathy on the passing of our distinguished colleague, Congressman JOSEPH P. ADDABBO. I know we all feel a great sense of personal loss now and, truly, one of our most respected Members and friends has left our Chamber.

JOE served in the House of Representatives for a quarter of a century and during that time he dedicated much of his time and work to defense policy issues. His thorough knowledge and understanding of the Pentagon and military spending earned him the respect of his colleagues and, in 1979, the chairmanship of the Defense Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee.

JOE was very dedicated to his constituents and was reelected time and again by wide margins. He was a kind and caring man, whose compassion and concern for others knew no bounds. Personally, I know we will remember JOE with great fondness. He was one of the most friendly and likeable Members and he had a tremendous affection for all of us.

JOE leaves a magnificent record of many lasting and important achievements in the House of Representatives. JOE will be deeply missed and forever remembered as an outstanding Congressman and American.

Mr. NOWAK. Mr. Speaker, it is with sadness that I join my colleagues in a tribute to a great leader and good friend, JOE ADDABBO, who passed away earlier this month after a long struggle against cancer.

JOE ADDABBO's 26-year tenure in the House of Representatives spanned six administrations, a wide range of complex issues, and an ever-changing national arena. Yet, JOE never lost sight of the well-being of his constituency, working tirelessly for adequate housing and heat for the poor, steering economic aid to depressed areas, improving education for our youth, and providing various incentives and assistance for small businesses. JOE's substantial election victories over the years clearly illustrates this remarkable ability to address the needs of those who he had been chosen to serve.

JOE ADDABBO will also be remembered for his great influence in shaping our national defense policy as Chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense. By mastering the intricacies of defense issues, JOE became one the House's most credible and rational critics of Pentagon spending, consistently opposing ineffeicient and wastful use of defense funds. Although JOE's many appropriations battles were often uphill and marked by heated debate, some even lost in his own subcommittee, he earned respect and admiration from both sides of the aisle.

JOE ADDABBO was a man of strong conviction, dedicated to his career as a public servant, accommodating, understanding and humble in his approach. Over the last several years fighting against the odds with cancer, he never allowed his personal health problems to interfere with his job. JOE'S leadership and vast knowledge will be sorely missed by his colleagues. However, his record as a Member of the House remains as a fine example for those who succeed him and an inspiration for all Americans.

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, a man of strong convictions—that's how I will remember my dear, departed colleague JOE ADDABBO.

The U.S. Congress always could count on this honorable gentleman to be one of the most articulate reviewers of Pentagon spending. As chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense, he would not hesitate to turn crimson and raise his voice in support of a strong yet lean defense. ADDABBO consistently managed to cut billions off the defense budget and even those who disagreed with him respected his knowledgeable viewpoint.

Mr. ADDABBO dignified New York with his devotion for 26 years, even through his 6-year battle with cancer. This loyal New Yorker was born and educated in New York, lived his entire life within a 10-block area of the Big Apple, commuted weekly to his office in the District of Columbia and did everything in his power to promote the city he adored to his Capitol Hill friends and colleagues.

I fondly recall weekends in New York when his son Joey and my son John would play together, while Mr. ADDABBO played "Mr. Hospitality" with us. In fact, the influential legislator instigated the now-famous congressional weekend in New York, which my wife Nancy and I enjoyed.

JOE'S death certainly will leave a gap in the established weekend event and in the lives of everyone he touched. My condolences to Grace, Dominic, Dina and Joey; the State of New York; and Congress; for the loss of this devoted man.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness in my heart that I rise today to join in this remembrance of our colleague JOE ADDABBO, who passed away last week.

I indeed felt a great personal loss as JOE and I had established a close personal and professional relationship during the many years we served together in this body. As representatives from neighboring New York and New Jersey, JOE and I spent many hours together working on issues affecting our metropolitan area.

Despite the national attention that JOE received as the leading spokesman in Congress against excessive military spending, he never forgot for 1 minute that his major role in Congress was to represent the interests of the people of the Sixth Congressional District of New York. And represent them he certainly did.

During his 25 years in the House, JOE truly became a "peoples" representative, devoting himself untiringly to his constituents' needs, worries and causes.

JOE ADDABBO loved this country and its people. He was a true patriot who wanted the best for America and would not settle for anything less. He was strongly offended by what he believed to be the wasteful spending of taxpayers' funds in our military procurement system.

JOE was an outspoken supporter of a strong military for America, but he insisted that every dollar spent on that program be accounted for to insure that the taxpayer was getting the most bang for his buck.

Among those of us who were privileged to personally know JOE, he will most be remembered for his kind manner and joyful sense of humor. We will remember him as a man of unparalleled integrity with the highest moral principles and values. His good cheer and bright mind will be sorely missed as we here who follow him attempt to solve our Nation's weighty problems in the years ahead.

I am sure that I speak for all of us, as I extend my most heartfelt sympathies to JOE's wife Grace and his children Dominic, Diana, and Joseph at this time of their sorrow.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, it is with deep sadness that we note the death of our colleague, JOSEPH ADDABBO, of New York's Sixth Congressional District. As chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense, he left his mark on this body and on our Nation's history. Although he was a strong supporter of national defense, he sponsored the first successful anti-Vietnam war resolution which cutoff funds for the bombing of Cambodia. In 1982, Congressman ADDABBO was able to secure a 245-to-176 vote for his amendment to block MX missile production. This was perhaps his most dramatic victory as chairman of the subcommittee and as well as a victory for his ongoing battle against what he saw as wasteful weapons systems.

Today we are all familiar with the ongoing battle against Department of Defense waste. Even as we try to control contract costs, revolving door employment practices between the Department of Defense and defense contractors and multitudinous wasteful practices, we must recognize that we are following in the path which Congressman ADDABBO opened. His pragmatic career of controlling waste while arguing for a lean and efficient national defense earned him the respect of those he fought as well as those who agreed with him. Perhaps a final tribute to him was the support that he gained from peace activists in New York who saw him as a bulwark against a bloated defense budget which would lead to foreign military adventures.

When the seriousness of Congressman ADDABBO's final illness became clear, it was hard to believe that this cheerful and good-humored man had long been laboring under the strain of a severe and finally fatal illness. We will miss his leadership on the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee and his presence among us.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join in paying tribute to the memory of the Honorable JOSEPH P. ADDABBO, who died on April 12 at the age of 61. Representative ADDABBO devoted the last 25 years of his life not only to his constituents in Ozone Park but also to the citizens of the Nation.

As chairman of the Defense Subcommittee on the House Appropriations Committee, Representative ADDABBO worked for a strong and efficient defense policy. A leader of opposition against wasteful arms projects, he did not hesitate to speak out against Pentagon officials. He held a significant role in limiting the spending for such projects as the MX and Pershing missiles. As President Reagan said, Representative ADDABBO was "one of leading players in the development of the American military policy."

The Governor of New York, Mario Cuomo, once called Representative ADDABBO a "great man whose commitment to integrity and excellence has improved the quality of life for all New Yorkers." He sponsored legislation to help poor families pay for household heat, assisted small businesses, and directed funds to economically depressed areas. He was in favor of civil rights and Federal aid to education and the elderly. He voted against legislation to limit rights to abortion and allow prayer in public schools. His role in defense also aided the interests of his constituents. He increased Long Island's aircraft industry and added thousands of jobs to the metropolitan area.

Representative ADDABBO played a crucial role in advancing an anti-Vietnam war measure that passed the House. This amendment put a halt to appropriations for the bombing of Cambodia.

Representative ADDABBO did not seek to run for other elected offices. Instead, he devoted himself to Congress, his "career", as he once said. He was respected by Democrats and Republicans alike. He was a warm and compassionate leader who acted fairly.

Representative ADDABBO was born and raised in New York. He went through public schools and then attended City College. After graduating from St. John's University School of Law, he began a law practice in Ozone Park where he remained until he was elected.

Representative ADDABBO will be sadly missed.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentlemen from New York, Mr. STRATTON and Mr. HORTON, for giving us an opportunity to pay tribute to our friend, JOE ADDABBO.

JOE did not seek publicity or personal attention, so I think he would have been a little uncomfortable with the fact that this time has been set aside to reflect on his life and his service in this House. But, as anyone who knew him is aware, the way in which he lived his life, and the manner in which he served in this body, were of such a character as to demand that special note be taken of his passing.

I had the privilege of serving with JOE on the Appropriations Committee. While he was perhaps best known in the House for his work as chairman of the Defense Subcommittee, within the full committee his was a highly respected voice on a wide range of issues, from the Vietnam war, to the plight of the poor and disadvantaged, to the needs of Federal workers. As was the case on the House floor, when JOE spoke in the Appropriations Committee, people listened. He was credible because the Members knew that JOE had done his homework, and that he knew what he was talking about. Although he never tried to conceal his political philosophy, admiration for the way that JOE practiced his craft as a legislator transcended the bounds of ideology or party affiliation. He had the ability to influence precisely because people trusted his judgment, and had confidence in the means he chose to translate that judgment into action.

JOE's skill as a legislator was prominently displayed in the last years of his life because of the role he played in battles over the defense budget. Make no mistake about it. JOE ADDABBO was for a strong defense. He just didn't believe our defense effort had to be gold plated to be effective. He was not afraid to challenge generals, admirals, or Presidents on the worth of particular weapons systems, and he never hesitated to call the attention of Congress to defense spending requests that he considered to be excessive. As competition for budget dollars became more intense, his dogged insistence that defense programs be subject to the same level of scrutiny being given to other programs forced officials at the Pentagon to take a second look at many of their budget requests, and thereby saved billions of dollars for American taxapayers.

But JOE will be remembered by his colleagues in the House for more than his legislative abilities. In an institution of working relationships, he made friends, and the size of the delegation to his funeral mass was a testament to the affection with which he was regarded in this body. We shared that sentiment with the people of his district, who took time off from their jobs to fill St. Patrick's Cathedral in his honor last week, and who knew him to be a man of courage and decency who never stopped being their neighbor.

And my, how JOE loved New York! The city had no better ambassador of good will in the Congress, and anyone who saw New York with JOE as their guide could never be satisfied with anyone else. The Big Apple always had a special gloss in JOE's eyes, and he leaves in the House of cadre of honorary New Yorkers who can testify to his ability to instill in others his feelings for his hometown.

Mr. Speaker, the people of the United States were fortunate that JOE ADDABBO chose to devote a quarter of a century to serving them in these halls. Those of us who served with him know how deeply his wisdom and counsel will be missed in the days ahead. We know too, however, that the contributions he made to his country, and the example he set for his colleagues in the House, will never be forgotten. I hope that certainty will offer some comfort at this difficult time for JOE'S wife, Grace, and their children, Dina, Joseph, and Dominic.

Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in paying tribute to my friend and illustrious colleague—the late JOSEPH P. ADDABBO.

JOE ADDABBO'S presence in this House was an example for all of us—from the most senior committee chairman to the newest freshman to follow.

JOE'S wit, his jovial sense of humor, and his relentless quest to do what was right put JOE ADDABBO in a class all by himself.

JOE ADDABBO probably was best known for his work as chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee. In that role, JOE was a voice of sanity in this era of extravagant and often unnecessary defense spending.

JOE ADDABBO had enormous clout in the whole military spending process. He was a staunch supporter of a strong national defense, but he felt strongly that our military stature should be lean and mean—with the emphasis on lean.

JOE viewed the Pentagon as just one more Federal bureaucracy—the only difference was that the bureaucrats at the Pentagon wore stars and bars. He refused to take the funding requests from the Pentagon at face value—preferring to put the military budget under close scrutiny to ferret out waste, duplication, and unnecessary fat. JOE often found himself at odds with many of the Defense Subcommittee members—but I assure you that every one of them had great respect for the man.

JOE ADDABBO'S legislative role actually extended far beyond the defense arena.

Over the years, JOE was a major factor in passage of important legislation to help the poor, assist small business, and steer funds to economically depressed areas.

JOE ADDABBO never forgot his constituents, insuring that the needs of the Sixth District were met and taking the time to solve the individual problems that plagued his Queens neighbors.

As senior member of the Queens delegation and a senior Member of the House, JOE ADDABBO worked hard to make sure New York received its fair share of Federal funds.

With the unfortunate death of JOE ADDABBO, I now find myself in the position of senior Member of the Queens delegation. Although it will be very hard to fill the shoes left by JOE ADDABBO, I hope to carry on in the spirit of JOE—with an eye toward unity and compassion.

JOE ADDABBO'S presence in this House will be missed greatly. But those of us who knew him well will try to carry on his work—secure in the knowledge that his legacy will live on.

Mr. MILLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, with the passing of JOE ADDABBO the Nation has lost an untiring and highly principled public servant, the Congress a dependable, personable Member, and each of us a dear and loyal friend. JOE ADDABBO gave full meaning to the term "trusted colleague." When JOE told you he was going to do something, you considered it done. When JOE cast his vote you knew he did it after full consideration of the issue, you knew he did it on the basis of principle not partisanship.

JOE'S long battle with cancer proved to be a telling reflection of the way he lived. His 6 year fight with this dreaded disease was one he carried on courageously and confidentially. He didn't want anyone's sympathy, he didn't want anyone making any excuses for him.

Though JOE and I sat on different sides of the aisle, I never sensed our differing political philosophies to be an issue. As the chairman of the Defense Subcommittee on which I serve, he always carried out his responsibilities with a sense of fairness and openness. Though we often differed on issues, JOE never let his work get in the way of his friendships.

The Congress will be a lesser body without him. To his wife, Grace and his children, my wife, Helen, joins me in extending our deepest sympathy. The Congress has lost a true gentleman and a scholar, a fighter who fought the good fight, a man who by his lifestyle epitomized all that is right with our society.

Mr. RUSSO. Mr. Speaker, it is with a sad heart that I join my colleagues today to pay a final tribute to an outstanding Congressman and beloved person. Congressman JOE ADDABBO will be greatly missed, by his countless friends here, and by this country.

In his years of work with the Congress, JOE won the respect of his colleagues regardless of opposing views on an issue. He was diligent, concientious, and you knew where he stood. I particularly remember how nice he was to me my first year here, going out of his way to help a newcomer. It's the kind of thing no senior Member is required to do, but JOE was that kind of person—helpful and one who took the time not only to do what needed to be done, but to do a little extra as well.

Certainly in his legislative work here he went well beyond what was merely required. I credit him for bringing some sanity to a complicated and inflammatory area like defense policy and spending, and I think we'll all remember JOE during the floor debates on this subject. We are indeed going to miss him, and his constituents have lost a fine representative.

I join with others here today in commending the work and life of Congressman JOE ADDABBO, a man who in the end demonstrated so much grit and courage to us all, and in offering my prayers and sympathy to his family. I hope it is a comfort to them to remember the lasting mark that JOE has made on this Congress and the Republic, and to know that he will not be forgotten by any who were privileged to know him and call him friend.

Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday April 17 of this year, the residents of the State of New York and the entire Nation suffered a great loss with the death of Congressman JOSEPH P. ADDABBO. JOE served in this Chamber for 26 years and constantly helped to improve the fiber of this country.

In my years as a Member of this body, and as a lifelong resident of a community bordering his congressional district, I have been proud to call JOE a friend and a colleague. JOE was respected throughout the Metropolitan New York area for his strong leadership on defense issues and countless other serious matters affecting our region and the Nation as a whole. Congressman ADDABBO never lost sight of his responsibilities to his constituents and his constituent achievements earned him the right to serve in this Chamber for 26 years.

The residents of the southwest part of Queens have been fortunate to call JOE ADDABBO their Representative. His tireless support for community development in the Jamaica business district, his efforts on behalf of St. John's Law School, and countless other activities have made JOE'S name a household word in his district and in surrounding communities.

Congressman ADDABBO was at his best when acting as chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee. He served through the Vietnam crisis and fought against waste in defense contracts. Even though Congressman ADDABBO was not afraid to disagree with a colleague, he always handled himself as a professional and a gentleman.

Last month legislation was passed to name a Federal building in Jamaica, NY in JOE'S honor. This great tribute is more than deserving for a man who worked for over two decades to help improve the district in which the building will stand. The building will serve as a constant reminder to the community he has served with honor and distinction.

JOE ADDABBO will live on with us forever in spirit and his example should serve as an inspiration to us all.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I am deeply saddened by he death of JOE ADDABBO. We served together on the Appropriations Committee for 22 years. JOE and I were good friends. He was wise, diligent, and witty and I admired him greatly.

JOE understood the issues involved in national defense. He knew the budgets, the programs, and the military mind and he was so right when he told us, as he did many times, that lavish budgets for exotic weapons do not make the Nation stronger or safer. JOE'S understanding of national security included an educated and healthy population with a balanced and varied economy. He worked, voted, and spoke to achieve that end, and we are in his debt.

We are now in a period when the Nation is beginning to understand what Joe has been saying for years, and it is a real tragedy that he has left us at this time. I know that I will miss him greatly. We need his wisdom and guidance.

His contributions are real and lasting. He made the United States a stronger, better Nation, and I am proud to have known him. I extend my most sincere sympathy to his wife and family.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to say thank you to the ADDABBO family, Grace and their children, for sharing JOE with us those many years. I also thank the people of the Sixth District of New York for sending him to Congress that the people of the rest of the country could share in his service to our country.

Very early in my service on the Appropriations Committee I found that JOE was a person that was willing to take time to help others. His district was much different from mine. He, from a large city, more liberal in their political and economic views. Mine, a rural and more conservative, yet we became good friends. He was always understanding when someone had to take a different position.

My wife and I became better friends after we had gone with him and Grace on congressional investigating trips for the Appropriations Committee. I did not serve on his subcommittee, but he asked us to join his subcommittee on several occasions. We were hard on those trips, but here again, he was always very kind and generous to include us in all the activities of his subcommittee.

There are so many nice things that could be said about the service of JOE ADDABBO. He was a good public servant, represented his people well, and a nice guy always.

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to a man who would probably have been embarrassed if he knew that colleagues were paying special attention to his passing. JOE ADDABBO was that kind of man: genuinely humble and self-effacing, while hugely competent and capable in his work within the House of Representatives over the past quarter century.

JOE ADDABBO came to Congress from his beloved Queens in the usual way. He was an eminently convivial man who practiced law after graduating from St. John's. He joined local organizations like the PTA, civic groups, Sons of Italy, and the local Democratic club. As time went on, he helped out behind the scenes with congressional campaigns. And when the Republican incumbent retired in 1960, JOE ran and won by 10,000 votes.

Politics came naturally to JOE, because he loved people. He was a model to all new Congressmen about how one represents a district. One of his opponents is said to have remarked in disbelief, "He attends every wedding, bar mitzvah, and wake in the district." JOE did this, of course, because people and their hopes and dreams were important to him.

JOE ADDABBO came to Congress with that attitude and served all his days, without changing a scintilla of his generous perspective. He was a successful legislator because he paid attention to his constituents. And his constituents respected JOE's judgment when it differed from theirs. I think we would all agree that JOE always followed his conscience, no matter the political cost.

JOE was a successful legislator who could pry loose money for an important mass transit project back home, change his mind about the wisdom of the Vietnam War after supporting it, and foster an amendment to cut off funds for it. And, as chairman of the powerful Defense Subcommittee, he was the scourge of the military as a foe of the B-1 bomber. But he also argued for a strong defense, properly understood.

JOE ADDABBO was, above all, a man with a burning desire to do the right thing: To be reasonable, to understand, to be compassionate, and, where possible, to accommodate. He was loved by his constitutents and his colleagues, and therefore he will be missed.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join with my colleagues in the House of Representatives in paying tribute to Congressman JOSEPH P. ADDABBO, whose untimely death on April 10 was a tremendous loss to his constituents from the Sixth Congressional District of New York and to all the people of this Nation.

JOE was my close and trusted friend during the period we served in Congress together, and I am proud to have had the honor to work with him. I shall always cherish the wise counsel, advice, and good will that he so often generously extended to me.

Congressman ADDABBO was elected to the 87th Congress, and for 25 years as a Member of the House of Representatives dedicated his life to the service of his constituents. He compiled an oustanding record of achievement as chairman of the Subcommittee on Defense of the House Appropriations Committee and as a member of the House Small Business Committee.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Defense, he was a guiding force in Congress for a strong, efficient defense policy, while at the same time eliminating wasteful and excessive military spending. He courageously took an early stand against the Vietnam War, sponsoring the first antiwar resolution to pass the House of Representatives in 1973, which cut off funding for the bombing of Cambodia.

Congressman ADDABBO, as one of the most respected Members of the House of Representatives, was even-handed and well-liked by his colleagues, and was one of the most knowledgeable and effective legislators in Congress. His dedication to the highest standards of excellence was an inspiration to his friends and fellow citizens, and he will long be remembered by those of us who had the privilege to serve with him in the Congress of the United States.

Mrs. Annunzio and I extend our deepest sympathy to his wife, Grace; his children, Dominic, Dina, and Joseph; and to the other members of his family.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend my colleagues from New York for requesting this time today to honor my good friend JOE ADDABBO for his 26 years of dedicated work in behalf of the people of our Nation.

Although JOE and I didn't agree on every issue, I held the utmost respect for this great American, who despite suffering from cancer, continued to valiantly serve the American people and his constituents from New York. It was a privilege to have served under his chairmanship as a member of the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense. He was a fair and honorable chairman who rightfully took great pride in his long hours of preparation and work to fulfill his responsibilities in overseeing our national defense programs.

We shall miss JOE ADDABBO'S leadership in this House as well as the dedicated spirit with which he served here for more than a quarter of a century. I shall also miss JOE'S friendship. He will always symbolize for me what is so great about our Nation and our democratic Government. Despite differences of viewpoints—whether they be Democrat or Republican, liberal or conservative—we are first and above all else Americans who represent the American people to the best of our abilities. Few have served in the U.S. Congress with greater distinction than JOE ADDABBO.

I share the sorrow of JOE'S wife Grace and their three children, because with JOE'S passing we have lost a great American statesman. He served our country with honor until his final hours, and for that we shall be forever grateful.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of sadness and loss that I join my colleagues in paying final tribute to our respected colleague, JOE ADDABBO.

All of us who had the opportunity to work with JOE will always remember it as a true learning experience in effective management of our Nation's resources. As one of the prime forces in the shaping of military policy over the last two decades, he represented his district, and his country, with the highest degree of competence and legislative ability.

JOE impressed his colleagues not only with his tenacious management of our Nation's defense resources, but also with his compassion for those in need of help, opportunity, or protection. He believed deeply in the Government's obligation to assist the disadvantaged, and throughout his years in the House of Representatives, he remained dedicated to the expansion of human dignity and equal opportunity. JOE ADDABBO truly cared about people as individuals, and in caring about them, he took the trouble to understand them, to know their problems, and to do everything he could to help them.

All of us who knew JOE will deeply miss his leadership, courage, and commitment. I am proud to have had the opportunity to serve with him, and wish to extend my sincere condolences to his family.

Mr. ST GERMAIN. The congressional paths of Congressman JOE ADDABBO and FRED ST GERMAIN often crossed. Our congressional careers began together on January 3, 1961, when JOE and I raised our right hands to take our oaths of office for the first time. We were the only Members of the present Congress who shared this date as the beginning of our congressional service.

Our legislative endeavors were guided by the same philosophies and convictions. We shared strong feelings that Government retain a people perspective and only in rare cases would we cast our vote on opposing sides of any issue.

The residents of New York's Sixth Congressional District will miss his genuine concern for their well being. His colleagues in the Congress will miss his warm smile and friendly manner, but you can be certain JOE ADDABBO has left his mark on the Congress and the Nation. His life journey has concluded but the goals he set for our Nation remain. Congressman JOE ADDABBO simply wanted the United States to be a great place to live. Because of people like JOE ADDABBO, it is.

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Speaker, the House lost an outstanding an compassionate Member 2 weeks ago when JOE ADDABBO passed away after a long and courageous bout with cancer.

As a member of the House Armed Services Committee, I always respected JOE ADDABBO'S tenacity in probing the Pentagon's spending plans. JOE ADDABBO was committed to a strong military and he dedicated his career in the House of Representatives to the identification and elimination of waste and extravagance.

While many of us on the Armed Services Committee often disagreed with JOE on specific issues, all of us respected his skill in exposing needless spending that would have done nothing to serve our national defense.

JOE ADDABBO will be remembered as a gentleman and a sincere public servant who defeated his fatal illness by refusing to let it rule his life.

Admired in life and in death, we will all miss JOE ADDABBO.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the gentlemen from New York [Mr. HORTON and Mr. STRATTON] for reserving this time for Members to pay tribute to my distinguished colleagues in the House of Representatives, the late Congressman JOSEPH ADDABBO.

Those of us who worked with JOE ADDABBO through the years will sorely miss his leadership, his thoughtful, intelligent approach and style, his congenial nature and his tireless dedication to serving the public to the best of his ability.

Mr. Speaker, I had the good fortune to work with JOE on the Appropriations Committee, and had the opportunity to observe his exceptional leadership as chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense. While he supported a strong defense, JOE led the fight to prevent the Department of Defense from squandering the taxpayers dollars. Through his skillful leadership, he provided Members with the opportunity to implement a strong national defense while at the same time rejecting wasteful spending.

Mr. Speaker, JOE ADDABBO was also extremely supportive of the efforts of the Congressional Black Caucus to provide encouragement and financial assistance to minority businesses through the Fair Share Federal Procurement Contract Program. His appearance at a press conference held by the Congressional Black Caucus in support of that program was demonstrative of his commitment to the development of minority business.

However, Mr. Speaker, my most fond memories of JOE ADDABBO come from our personal friendship. He was a congenial man, a friendly person, an individual who had the ability to put people at ease. He always had something nice to say about everyone and was admired and respected by virtually everyone who met him. Like many other Members, I was the recipient of JOE's warm hospitality during a "weekend in New York" sponsored by the New York State congressional delegation. I was impressed by his organizational skills and ability to make everyone feel welcome.

Mr. Speaker, I also had the opportunity to travel with JOE and his lovely wife, Grace, overseas with a congressional contingent. While we worked hard, we had a very enjoyable time and I observed firsthand the deep love and devotion shared by JOE and Grace ADDABBO. They were a great couple, and all I have are fond memories of the time spent with them.

Mr. Speaker, JOE ADDABBO was truly a pillar of the House of Representatives. His dedicated service as chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense may be imitated, but will never be duplicated. JOE's careful, intelligent approach to the defense question, an issue that in recent years has become highly emotional and often irrational, has forced the House of Representatives to take a closer look at the issue of defense spending and to consider future ramifications of unrestrained spending. That "closer look" will definitely save money—and may quite possibly save lives.

Mr. Speaker, I send my heartfelt condolences on the passing of my good friend and colleague JOE ADDABBO to his wife, Grace, and his family, to the people of the Sixth Congressional District of New York and the members of the New York congressional delegation. Again, I thank the gentlemen from New York, Mr. HORTON and Mr. STRATTON for reserving this time to remember a very special man—JOSEPH ADDABBO.

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, we have lost an important ally and a cherished friend in the House of Representatives, our distinguished colleague, JOSEPH ADDABBO. We missed him during the months of his hospitalization. We were acutely aware of his absence, as the House considered complex and ever-controversial defense bills. We needed his leadership and guidance on many tough and intricate questions and we hoped for his return. Now we feel a profound sense of loss knowing that he will not be back to fight future battles with us.

JOE ADDABBO has done much for his Nation, his district, and his colleagues. How many of us, when we leave these Halls, will be able to look upon a list of accomplishments as worthy and solid as those of JOE ADDABBO's? How many of us could command our colleagues' love and respect, as JOE did? How many of us are assured of the good will and friendship of those that disagree with us on policy questions. JOE had all those things.

He carved his place in this House by understanding all the subtleties of the complex issues of defense policy. Few could match his expertise. He used his knowledge to define national security goals and to help shape and advocate a sound defense policy. He above all knew how to separate wasteful defense spending from the defense necessary for national security. He then effectively lobbied for his position using the full force of his personality—the force of his integrity, the force of his leadership, and his formidable skills of persuasion. And when the battle was over, no matter how heated, he would still be liked and respected by his most ardent opponents. That was the kind of man JOE ADDABBO was. That is the JOE that we will sorely miss.

The loss of his guidance and leadership will be felt not only during this year's difficult defense and budget debates, but in all years. We will always be guided by the principles JOE set forth and we will always miss him.

Thank you.

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of sadness that I join in this tribute to our departed colleague, JOE ADDABBO. We all miss him dearly.

It has been an honor and privilege to have JOE as my chairman on the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee for over 7 years. He always conducted the subcommittee in a fair and equitable manner which was respected and appreciated by the Members on both sides of the aisle.

Chairman ADDABBO took very seriously the responsibility to insure that we not only approved the resources needed to provide for the common defense, but that we did not waste money in the process. He was tireless in the detailed review of obscure audit reports to find any instance of unneeded expenditure. I remember many occasions when he had to direct program managers to read the Pentagon's own audits of their programs so that they could do their jobs more efficiently.

Each year, under his able direction, the subcommittee would recommend reductions in literally hundreds of items. And just as the old saying goes, a million here and a million there and pretty soon it was real money. Some people have criticized the Congress for micromanaging, and some of that criticism is deserved. But the kind of scrutiny that JOE ADDABBO applied to the defense budget was just the kind of oversight that is the duty of the Appropriations Committee. A true measure of his effectiveness is the very large portion of the committee's recommended cuts that the Pentagon would eventually concede were fully warranted.

On many occasions, it was my pleasure to work with Chairman ADDABBO on the issues of national defense before the Congress. On occasion we disagreed. Let me tell you, I would much rather have him on my side because he was an aggressive and forceful advocate for his point of view, which he held with very deep and sincere conviction. His courage in facing his illness without complaint and without shirking his duty is an inspiration to all of us.

But my sadness with JOE ADDABBO'S passing is tempered by the joy of the memories he has left with me and with this body. His sense of humor, his fondness for wisecracks, his occasional Italian temper, were all uniquely JOE'S. They were a part of a personality that lifted our hearts and reminded us of the special opportunity we have to serve in the House of Representatives.

I want to compliment my colleagues from New York [Mr. STRATTON and Mr. HORTON] for arranging this opportunity for all of us who were touched by the magic of JOSEPH P. ADDABBO to pay one final tribute for his service, and most of all his friendship.

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Speaker, as I gathered my thoughts tonight getting ready for this special honor for our friend JOE ADDABBO, there was so much called to mind. JOE was an honorable man who loved and served his country well, a true friend, a delightful colleague, and one of the hardest working and most respected Members of Congress. He is sorely missed.

For his quick wit and generous laughter, most certainly. For his insight, knowledge, and tenacity in fighting for what he believed was right, of course. Few will forget his leadership during the critical decision points of the Vietnam war. But mostly, and I believe I speak for many people on both sides of the partisan aisle that so often divides us—mostly for his manner of doing the business of this august body. With his heart, his facts and figures fully marshalled for a good fight, and a true love for the work.

Proof of his outstanding character came from what some would think an unlikely quarter just the other day—but you'd only think it unlikely if you didn't know JOE. And that was from his frequent adversary, Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger.

Before he started his testimony, Secretary Weinberger called attention to something all of us in the committee room felt deeply. JOE's absence. It just didn't feel right without Chairman ADDABBO being there to conduct a ritual sparring match rich in humor but also bottom line fundamental debates about which direction our country should be going.

Secretary Weinberger paid tribute to JOE, acknowledging his great knowledge on defense issues, and the way he went about jousting in such a friendly way that it was always fun to appear before him. He couldn't let the moment slip by without sharing publicly the great admiration he had for a very special chairman. For any of you who have seen JOE at work giving the Secretary the third degree, that says it all.

When JOE first asked me to join the Defense Subcommittee, I was given one of the greatest opportunities of my career. And that was to get to know JOE. To serve on his committee. To learn from him. And my respect for the kind of man JOE was because of having been on his committee is probably without parallel.

It's a testament to his gifted sensitivity to others and to his political skills and rare judgment that he worked so well for so long with the ranking minority members of the committee he chaired. He created a very unusual partnership in getting a tough job done year after year. Where others would have used the power of the chairmanship above all else, JOE used the powers of reason, persuasion, and fairness to push ahead.

JOE and I were often in the minority on the committee in voting against a particular weapons system. But it didn't stop or deter JOE. He just went right back at it, often succeeding. Without hostility, bitterness, or vindictiveness to those who did not stand with him.

He worked unflaggingly on minutae that many of us would have thrown our hands in the air over. And if you've seen the thousands of line items of budget notes he presided over in conference after conference, you know what I'm talking about.

His mission was to guarantee a top-flight defense for this country, but not to waste a single nickel. And his contribution to this end is truly significant.

What we didn't know was that for many of the last several years JOE was fighting a horrible and painful disease. Never a word. Never a complaint. Never a failure to do what had to be done regardless of enormous physical pain. Who among us would have guessed what he was going through?

Even after a long absence away from this Chamber last fall to fight that disease, JOE came back in December with his spirit intact to preside over a contentious conference on the defense portion of the continuing resolution. And we all gave a great sigh of relief to have him back pounding his fist on the table and cracking jokes to set us straight.

His great courage and dedication throughout his battle makes me think of the words of John F. Kennedy in "Profiles in Courage": "For without belittling the courage with which men have died, we should not forget those acts of courage with which men . . . have lived. The courage of life is often a less dramatic spectacle than the courage of a final moment; but it is no less a magnificent mixture of triumph and tragedy. A man does what he must—in spite of personal consequences, in spite of obstacles and dangers and pressures—and that is the basis of all human morality."

I think this describes the profound humanity of JOE ADDABBO. And there's little more I could add to relate what kind of an individual, and a public servant, JOE ADDABBO was.

The State of New York has lost an able and gifted Congressman, the country has lost one its true leaders, and we have lost a great man and dear friend whom all admired. To his wife Grace, and to his children, my deepest sympathies and sincere hopes that their grief will be somewhat diminished by the pride and joy of having been the greatest love of such an exceptional statesman.

Mr. CARR. Mr. Speaker, JOE ADDABBO was my friend. As a young Congressman he gave me guidance. He helped me understand the greatness of this legislative body. He explained its strong points, he told me of its failings. With his help, I became a better Member of Congress.

I will miss his wise counsel. I will miss his friendship. The House will miss his leadership. The Nation will miss a great Congressman.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, the passing of an esteemed friend and colleague is the occasion for which I rise to speak today, and it is with personal sadness that I pay final tribute to the memory of a man who for more than a quarter of a century was one of the most influential statesmen of our time—JOSEPH ADDABBO.

A presence on our national stage, JOSEPH ADDABBO was one of the leading players in the development of American military policy—a man widely respected for his knowledge of defense issues—a man whose genial style was in keeping with the best traditions of American politics.

His was a consuming conviction that vexing problems could be solved, and expansive goals could be achieved through planning and activism. His occupancy of office was never merely visionary for JOSEPH ADDABBO was a man who constantly sought to translate vision into concrete realities.

Throughout his long and illustrious career spent in service to the people of New York and the Nation, JOSEPH ADDABBO exemplified the virtues of dedication and concern leaving his mark and vision in our Nation's defense programs. We will remember him—for his belief in the worth and dignity of the individual; for his conviction that the United States has a moral mission in the world; for his leadership in international affairs; for his commitment to a strong yet efficient and effective defense posture to insure continued U.S. freedom and influence.

I will sincerely miss JOSEPH ADDABBO just as I know all of my colleagues who worked with him will. To his wife and family I extend my heartfelt sympathy during this time of great sorrow.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sorrow that I address the House today to pay tribute to a dedicated and respected Member of this body and a good friend, JOE ADDABBO.

As chairman of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, he attained a reputation as a critic of wasteful military spending and was often at odds with his own committee, nonetheless, he maintained his integrity and fought for what he thought was best for the Pentagon and for the country.

As chairman of the Small Business Committee, on which JOE served with vigor, I came to know him as a man committed to helping small and minority businesses gain a foothold in the economic structure of this society. JOE, with his low-keyed but tenacious manner was effective in amassing support for unpopular but necessary loan programs and set-asides for minority contractors doing business with the Federal Government.

At a time when it was popular to look the other way, JOE ADDABBO spoke out on discrimination in public schools, in the workplace, and at the voting booth. He opposed apartheid in South Africa and cosponsored legislation to impose economic sanctions against that repressive regime. JOE fought for the special needs of the elderly and the handicapped, education enhancement, safeguards for the environment, and in short, improving the way of life for all Americans.

JOE's accomplishments in the House are too numerous to catalog, but suffice it to say, his leadership on the tough issues of the day made him a Member who will be sorely missed by all who really knew him. But most of all, he will be missed because he was a kind and decent human being.

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to pay tribute to our late colleague, JOE ADDABBO. After having bravely fought a courageous battle against disease, Congressman ADDABBO succumbed to cancer last week at the age of 61. He left behind him a quarter-century of public service to the people of New York—and to the citizens of the United States. His leadership and commitment will be sorely missed.

As the chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense since 1979, Congressman ADDABBO presided while the Pentagon received its largest peacetime budget in history. While he supported a strong defense, he was also an enemy of waste and abuse, especially within the Defense bureaucracy. As a result, JOE found himself a leading critic of President Reagan's growing military budget. He is credited, however, with paring $50 billion from the President's budget requests of the past 4 years.

A compassionate and understanding man, Congressman ADDABBO won the respect of all his colleagues and constituents. He was a pillar of the House and an inspiration to those who knew and worked with him. We honor this man's longstanding dedication to public service, his wisdom, his leadership, and in the end, his great personal courage. We will all be the worse for his loss.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness that I join my colleagues in paying tribute to JOE ADDABBO.

When JOE ADDABBO passed away, I lost a friend and a colleague whom I deeply admired, Congress lost a Member with unquestionable integrity and dedication and this Nation lost a great American.

JOE ADDABBO worked endlessly on behalf of his Sixth District in New York during his 25 years in the House. But his district was not the only one to benefit from his public service.

To every American who wanted a guarantee that tax dollars were being spent wisely, JOE ADDABBO was the one person we could count on to scrutinize defense spending. To Americans who pursued the dream of owning their own small business, JOE ADDABBO was one Member who played a key role in making that dream become a reality. And to Americans grateful that no more young men died in the jungles of Vietnam, JOE ADDABBO was one person who deserved thanks because he was the first to successfully sponsor an antiwar resolution.

The quality I remember most about JOE ADDABBO is his courage. When he was faced with his painful illness never once did he ask for sympathy. He carried on his duties with dignity and of course, still possessing a big, warm smile.

The void left by JOE's departure will be difficult to fill. However, his legacy will remain with us. We are all richer because JOE ADDABBO touched our lives.

Mr. HUTTO. Mr. Speaker, JOE ADDABBO will be missed not only by his loved ones and friends but also by the Congress of the United States. JOE was a very effective representative of his people, and his impact was felt well beyond the borders of his New York district.

Although there were many who disagreed with JOE on certain issues, especially defense spending, I do not know of anyone who personally disliked JOE ADDABBO.

I came to know Congressman ADDABBO very early in my first year in Congress. It was with fear and trepidation that I went to see the distinguished chairman of Defense Appropriations about a problem in my district. From the first moment I met JOE, I felt completely at ease. The warmth of his smile and his friendliness helped me emerge from the meeting not only with a commitment to help with my problem but also with a good feeling of having met a true friend.

During the 7½ years I had the privilege of serving with JOE in the House, there were many times when I found it necessary to talk over issues with JOE. I always found him to be understanding, concerned and responsive to my needs. I know that other Members found JOE to be the same way with them in their problems. JOE ADDABBO was a friend to everybody.

The funeral service at St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York City, which many of us had the privilege to attend, beautifully expressed the affection that thousands of people had for this man. Yes, JOE was a great American who served his country well. He will be greatly missed.

I add my sincerest sympathies to his family in their loss. May God comfort them in their bereavement.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I want to join my colleagues in paying tribute to JOE ADDABBO. JOE was a leader of the House in every sense of the word, and he was a man of great courage. We will truly miss him.

In this institution, with its committee structure, there is enormous pressure on each of us to conform to the accepted attitudes of those who have the greatest interest in our specific committees. As chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense, JOE was always under enormous pressure not just to work for a strong defense but to provide the Defense Establishment—both the Pentagon and defense industries—with everything they asked for, which was generally far too much in a time of $200 billion deficits.

JOE resisted that pressure. He fought for a strong defense, but he opposed waste and he opposed excess. He won as often as he lost, and when he won, it was the American people who were the true victors. He was a thoughtful, tenacious battler for his constituents and for the broader public, and he did the same for the House in its disputes with the other body. The House and the entire Nation owes him a debt of gratitude for his work.

Of course, we cannot define JOE only by his role as a Member of Congress. His life, and particularly the latter years of his life, stand for more than just integrity and competence in Government. They stand for human courage, the will to live, and the will to make one's life meaningful to the end. We are all aware now that JOE struggled with cancer for several years. It became obvious only recently. JOE never wanted to be treated differently; he never wanted sympathy. He wanted to continue to be effective and to make a significant contribution. He succeeded in that. And in doing so, he was an example to all of us of human courage and strength. We will never forget his bravery.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the New York delegation for taking the time for this special order. I also want to extend my sympathy to JOE ADDABBO'S family. I am proud to have known him, and I hope that their grief is eased at least a little bit by the genuine emotions being expressed by his colleagues today.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleagues for participating so eloquently in this special order.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

SUPPORT FOR CONTRA AID

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, today, I made a 1-minute speech calling attention to Honduran President Azcona's public support for United States military aid for the Contras. His statement was contained in an interview with two European reporters.

Excerpts from that interview follow:

TEGUCIGALPA.—"The Sandinists should bug off [no jodan los Sandinistas] and take care of themselves," President Jose Azcona Hoyo said when referring to the reports that the Army is not doing anything to evict the contras from the national territory they are occupying along the border with Nicaragua.

Azcona Hoyo was interviewed by two European reporters. He admitted that he agrees with his predecessor, Roberto Suazo Cordova, concerning foreign policy. Azcona Hoyo emphasized several times that the Central American conflict will be resolved when President Daniel Ortega decides to talk with the opposition. He advised the reporters to convince Ortega that he can save Nicaragua by speaking with the contras.

"He (Ortega) should not be dreaming, thinking that he will be able to consolidate a Marxist revolution in Nicaragua," he warned. The full test of his conversation with the European reporters is as follows:

Reporter: What is the Honduran stand concerning the U.S.-Nicaraguan conflict?

Azcona: We want a political solution to the Nicaraguan conflict. We think that the final decision on this is in the hands of the Nicaraguan Government. It should respect the commitments it has with the OAS, and should give freedom to the Nicaraguan people. We are sure that if the Nicaraguan Government adopts these decisions it will not be difficult to achieve the pacification of Nicaragua. They should talk with the armed opposition as well as the unarmed opposition. They should promise true elections.

Reporter: Would you describe this Honduran position as neutral?

Azcona: I would say that Honduras is neutral, but we always harbor the hope that the Nicaraguan problem will be solved through a democratic solution.

Reporter: It is said that the most recent Contadora meeting was a failure due to the Nicaraguan attitude that seeks a commitment from the United States that it will not continue supporting the contras following the signing of a document. Do you not understand Nicaragua's stand?

Azcona: I believe that Nicaragua should honor its commitment with the OAS, that is, giving full freedom to its people and seeking a solution to the Nicaraguan problem so that it will lead to a truly democratic system. If this should happen, there is nothing the United States can do, and I do not think it would do anything against the Nicaraguan Government.

If they insist on upholding their determination to lead Nicaragua to a totalitarian system, I think the United States will not give up in its endeavor to oust [botar] this government. Why should we calmly think that the United States is afraid that this type of government can continue to grow in the hemisphere until it reaches its own border? Then, in reaction that might even be considered logical, it will struggle so that this may not happen.

Reporter: But would Honduras be willing to convince the United States not to continue supporting the FDN if Nicaragua fulfills the conditions stipulated in the Contadora Document?

Azcona: The United States supports that position. It has clearly stated: If Nicaragua fulfills the commitment it made to the OAS, which is practically the same as what is being established in the Contadora Document with the addition of calling for a halt to the arms buildup, the reduction of military advisers, etcetera, the United States would accept that situation.

Let the Nicaraguan people decide internally if they agree with the Sandinist system or if they are against that system. However, this should be done in full freedom and not like in the past elections where FSLN had to win.

Reporter: Now then, I understand that in the United States there are various sectors. Would you as a liberal feel closer to the sector that is opposed to the President, that of the Democratic Party? Are you in favor or against the $100 million for the contras?

Azcona: I think that it is more advisable for Honduras that the $100 million be approved. However, what Honduras thinks at this time is not important. What is important is what will happen if the $100 million is granted or if it is not granted. I do not think President Reagan will stop pressuring Nicaragua because the $100 million is rejected. I think the pressure is going to continue because he has clearly stated this. I repeat: The solution to the Nicaraguan problem is in the hands of the Nicaraguans and no one else.

Reporter: But if it is believed that this pressure could be military and in view of the geographic situation, the aid to the contras would have to pass through Honduras.

Azcona: Not necessarily.

Reporter: Then through where?

Azcona: There are many ways. The latest aid has come from other places. It has not passed through Honduras. There can be flights from any other Central American country or even from the United States.

Reporter: President Daniel Ortega said in a press conference that there is a type of no-man's-land. Do you agree with this?

Azcona: No. We do not accept that. No way. A no-man's land does not exist in Honduras. In Honduras, all the zones are under Honduran sovereignty. That is not true. We reject that. What exists is an extensive zone on the border that is quite uninhabited and through which the counterrevolutionaries enter Nicaragua and cross to Honduras.

It is very hard for Honduras, which does not have a large Army, to guard all of the border which is approximately 700 km long by placing border posts, let us say, every 50 or 100 meters because that falls outside all our economic capacity. We would have to double the number of our troops. Just to guard that border we would need all the Armed Forces that we currently have.

Reporter: Although in the last conflict the exact location of specific contra camps was demonstrated, wouldn't it be possible, through political or military measures, to exert pressure so that at least they will leave?

Azcona: Well, what the contras want is to go to Nicaragua. That is what the contras want. The contras do not want to be here in Honduras. They want to go to Nicaragua and in fact they do go to Nicaragua but return later. As I said, we would have to have a large Army protecting the Sandinists' rearguard. I do not think they are going to protect our rearguard when they consolidate themselves. I do not think they are going to prevent the entrance into Honduras of subversive elements.

Reporter: Then are you denying the reports by former FDN members that there is some cooperation—even close cooperation—between the Honduran Army and the contras?

Azcona: That is not true. We know that the contras come in and out of Honduras, but we will not have our Army face a situation like that.

Reporter: Is it also false that the Honduran Army has virtually let the contras take control over a portion of the border area?

Azcona: That is not true.

Reporter: Can you visualize, Mr. President, the possibility of peaceful coexistence between two countries with different ideologies, namely, Nicaragua and Honduras?

Azcona: On our part there can be coexistence. I ask you: Is there any place in the world where Marxism has not made attempts to extend its reach? * * *

Reporter: How do you explain that over the past several weeks there were numerous reports on developments in Honduras that originated in the United States, while in Honduras there were only comments and not direct information?

Azcona: We wanted to maintain control over the information so as not to alarm the population. The United States released a letter I sent to President Reagan. That is a way of proceeding over there. We did not want to alarm the population by exaggerating the problems. That is why we appeared on television to explain how everything happened and to say everything was under control. We said we requested help from the United States. That help will have to be requested as often as it is necessary because Honduras does not have many resources to spend on that kind of operation.

Reporter: Would you use the opportunity to get the United States to increase its economic assistance?

Azcona: We will not blackmail the United States. It is clear that they are helping us and will continue to help us. However, we will not take advantage of this situation. We are not offering our territory as a springboard for an invasion against Nicaragua, nor do I believe the United States is planning to invade Nicaragua. If the United States wants to invade Nicaragua there are two beaches it can use for that.

Reporter: What good is it to have U.S. troops in Honduras?

Azcona: I would say the same good it does to have U.S. troops in Spain, or at the naval base in Greece, or in West Germany; I do not know if there are any in Austria. We have treaties with the United States, and besides there are not that many troops here.

Reporter: Was there political tension between Honduras and the United States following the statements made by Secretaries Shultz and Weinberger that Honduras will support the contras?

Azcona: No, there was not a great deal of tension. We did not like the statements very much because there was much truth in them; however, not everything that was said was true. There was no tension.

Reporter: Did your government answer the U.S. request to explain the statements made by an alleged high-ranking government official who reportedly said there were pressures to state there had been an invasion?

Azcona: As far as I am concerned, no one has asked me to explain. Perhaps the press, because I have not been able to identify them. [sentence as published] Perhaps it was a person who identified himself as a high-ranking official without really being one. The United States has not asked me for any explanations. The trouble is that there is a yellow press there, and the press exaggerates any statement made by anyone concerning these issues. Maybe a fool tried to make himself important by saying he was a person close to the president of Honduras. They have neither asked for explanations, nor have I given any. * * *

Reporter: As for the meeting that is being planned in Guatemala, will Honduras present a stand that might be the stand of the entire area for solving the conflict?

Azcona: I think that the position will be the same one that we had at the last Contadora meeting: conciliatory, broad, democratic, liberal; striving to reach a solution to the Central American problem.

Reporter: In other words, you do not think that what Contadora has not been able to reach will not be reached?

Azcona: I think not, because it depends on Nicaragua's position. That is where the problem lies. If Nicaragua wants to reach an understanding among the Nicaraguans . . . I think that it is very easy for them to achieve it, just as we Honduran are doing. Why are there no contras in Honduras? Why are there no refugees in any country in the world? Why are there no political prisoners? Why do reporters say what they wish in Honduras? Why does television and radio report what they want and no one bothers them? [paragraph as heard] * * *

Reporter: Would it be according to the six points that you have set forth?

Azcona: The problem is that the United States is much more respectful and civilized than the Russians. In a similar case the Russians would have already invaded Nicaragua, like they invaded Czechoslovakia and Poland. They are much more civilized, empire for empire. I prefer the U.S. empire over the Russian.

Reporter: Here there is no awareness because the Soviet Union is not well know, while the United States is.

Azcona: We know because we saw what happened in Cuba, and we are seeing what is happening in Nicaragua. The country or government that neglects its citizens with its actions is not a good government. That is fascism. No one likes to live outside his or her country unless it has been a voluntary move.

Reporter: However, aren't there 1 million Salvadorans outside their country also?

Azcona: Yes, but that problem arose as a result of unjust structures. When the change came it was already too late. A very strong armed opposition had already been formed. However, there are not as many Salvadoran exiles as Nicaraguan exiles. There is a guerrilla force operating inside its borders.

Reporter: Are there more Salvadoran refugees?

Azcona: Yes. However, most of them can return to El Salvador without anything happening to them.

Reporter: Couldn't it be against the principle of nonintervention in the domestic affairs of a country to ask Nicaragua to change?

Azcona: No one is attempting to change Nicaragua. That is a hope that Honduras has. I can believe and think and want. However, I will not do it or demand that they do it. I would like Nicaragua to take the democratic path and I support the position of Nicaragua's political parties. Who can prevent my sympathies with various things? That is not intervention. I am certain Commander Ortega wants and would be very happy to see a revolutionary government like the one in Nicaragua establish itself in Honduras. This is also not intervention in Honduras' domestic affairs.* * *

Reporter: What could West Europe do or what would you like it to do for Honduras?

Azcona: I would like to tell them that here in this small country we are living in a real democracy, that we are learning to live in democracy, that the citizens' freedoms are respected here, that we are a good and noble people who want to live in peace, that we are not warmongerers or lackeys of the United States. However, they should understand that we are in Central America and without seeking it, we are in the zone of conflict. Even though they are thousands of kilometers away and much more powerful than we are, they have to choose sides and they have decided to be friends of the United States. With much more reason, we have to do the same.

Mitterrand has not sought to be friends with the Soviet Union. Neither did Felipe Gonzalez. He voted to remain in NATO. Not even the Greek prime minister, being a Socialist has eliminated the base of the Sixth Fleet. So then, why are they alarmed, and why do they make a great to-do if there are U.S. sailors in Greece, if there are U.S. pilots at the Torrejon base and the other bases in Spain, if there are U.S. soldiers in the FRG and all those countries are NATO members, and they have air missiles, why are they so self-righteous, that the boys of Nicaragua must be helped in a gesture, for one side, for a complex? [sentence as published]

Reporter: Then the difference is that in those countries there is no situation of imminent conflict with a neighboring country?

Azcona: There is no conflict? Isn't Berlin divided?

Reporter: There is another system there.

Azcona: Well, Nicaragua has another system also, or is it that we do not want to include Nicaragua in that? Do we want Somoza to return to Nicaragua? Do we want the achievements that they say they have given to the people—they say they have carried our agrarian reform—to be irreversible? No. We have agrarian reform here. Here we have very strong unions, very strong teachers' organizations, in one of which leftists are the leaders. We have student fronts, we have leftist fronts, and there is no problem.

Why must they put in uniform all Nicaraguans who must be in agreement with their beliefs? Why? Why do they have weapons? Why did they oust Somoza? They did not oust him. The Nicaraguan people ousted him. It was not them alone.

Reporter: You say you do not want a return to Somozism in Nicaragua?

Azcona: Of course not; I was anti-Somozist.

Reporter: But it is known that there is much Somozism among the contras. Do you believe the FDN can be an alternative?

Azcona: There is no need for there to be an alternative. It is sufficient that this regime opens up . . . and if they are the majority of the people, and they are going to win a free election, then they should go ahead; but they should rule within a constitution. That is the important part, no one should feel he is the owner of a country or a group.

Reporter: What if, in theory, you should have to channel your liberal, social democratic position concerning Nicaragua in a conflict with someone who said: I am a contra? [sentence as published]

Azcona: I am not saying I am a contra. What I am saying is that the Nicaraguan Government should open up; it has to respect freedom and honor what it promised at the OAS. It has not fulfilled any of the promises; it has no credibility. However, then the Germans, and the French, and the Italians say I am a dictator, or some one who sells out to the gringos, and Ortega is described as a redeemer. There is a very big difference. I would never harm a Honduran, I would rather leave; but they want to stay in power, regardless, because they are dogmatized [as published], they are not democratic. That is the difference. Then, it is said that Honduras does not have a good reputation abroad; a country that has no political prisoners and persecutes no one for his ideas, a country with full freedom of the press, a government that has high morals, a government with political morals. I really cannot understand that.

Reporter: No. I do not think the world thinks you are a dictator!

Azcona: No, but it is said I have sold out to the gringos, yet they say nothing of Mitterrand, or of Felipe Gonzalez. Didn't Felipe Gonzalez say during his campaign that they should vote no to NATO? Why, if he is a Socialist? What then? Does the Spanish Army carry out joint maneuvers with the U.S. Army?

Reporter: Perhaps because it is easier to listen to Ortega?

Azcona: Oh, there comes the European complex with the United States: We are always going to be against the United States, but the United States has never gone to Europe to defend a fascist system. It first went to oust the German kaiser that represented harshness and skill against Hitler. However, Stalin was able to call the United States when it was invaded by Germany. Yet I cannot ask the United States to lend me some helicopters when Nicaraguans are entering my country.

Reporter: Are there a great deal of anti-Sandinist feelings?

Azcona: No, but I do something else. Stalin or Russia called on the United States to become involved in the war to defeat Germany and Austria, but I am not allowed to ask the United States to lend me two helicopters to dispatch a few soldiers to Honduran territory. That is a sin.

Reporter: Do you really think that, if it were not for the United States, Nicaragua would come over here?

Azcona: I don't know. What I do know is that the communist countries and worldwide Marxism would spread Marxism throughout the world through subversion if they could, or through indoctrination, or whatever.

Reporter: But that is combat by other means, not just with helicopters.

Azcona: One does not fight with helicopters? Then why does Nicaragua have helicopters?

Reporter: Why does Honduras need helicopters?

Azcona: To transport the Army to oust the Sandinists from the territory they were occupying in Honduras. We have not occupied Nicaraguan territory.

Reporter: Was the Honduran Army there?

Azcona: Of course. We took the Honduran Army there.

Reporter: Was there a clash with Honduran soldiers?

Azcona: There was. The thing is that the Nicaraguans fled. They left prisoners; they left their dead, and they fled. They are not going to make me flee, nor are they going to make me change my position. My position is clear, and I would like those Nicaraguan gentlemen to understand this and to act more flexibly and more intelligently. Ortega can remain there for 2 years . . . he might win or share power, but he cannot deny others the right to also attain power. What those people want is to convert Nicaragua into a huge jail like Cuba. Of course, the Nicaraguans happily sign an agreement and look . . . let us patrol here, and let no one enter and later, with Costa Rica, and inside we will do what we want. [sentence as published] Is this morally right?

Reporter: One element of international law is that it obliges any state to prevent attacks on another state.

Azcona: I am not attacking Nicaragua.

Reporter: Yes, but this can also be done by omission.

Azcona: What do you mean, done by omission? The Honduran soldiers are not going to enter Nicaragua.

Reporter: I am referring to the contras.

Azcona: What do you want? Do you want me to spend millions upon millions here to guard their backs? Who is going to give me those millions to deploy 20,000 or 30,000 men? Should I spend the millions that I need for medicine, schools, and to pay teachers? Just to guard their rear? Hell! Let them guard their own backs.

Reporter: Is it an economic problem then?

Azcona: It is an overall problem. The problem is the Nicaraguans. Why do the contras exist? Why do the refugees exist? Because they are not satisfied with that government, and that is very clear, as was the case with Somoza. Why did they oust Somoza? Why did they disagree with Somoza? What about us? Is it our duty to guard their rear while they are doing as they please in Nicaragua? That is not my duty.

Reporter: There have been perhaps even worse situations of conflict on the Salvadoran border.

Azcona: Yes, but they did not involve ideology or territorial expansion. We are not going to neglect the problem with El Salvador. We know that we have to mark the border as soon as possible. If we look at it from the perspective of time, we are more concerned about the problem with El Salvador, because the Nicaraguan problem is of the moment, while the other problem will be permanent as long as the border issue remains unresolved. What we will always reject is the demand that Honduras guard Nicaragua's back. We have no obligation to do that.

CENTRAL CATHOLIC: THEY ARE NO. 1!

HON. DON RITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, as the representative in Congress from the Lehigh Valley, Pennsylvania-15, which encompasses Allentown, Bethlehem, Easton, and such areas, I would like to bring to your attention the following editorial which appeared March 24 in the Allentown Morning Call.

CENTRAL CATHOLIC: THEY ARE NO. 1!

"We played as a team again as we have all season and that is why Central Catholic is the state champion."—Central Catholic basketball coach Bob Schlosser.

Who's No. 1? There is just no question about who reigns supreme in Class AAA high school backetball in Pennsylvania—the green and gold Vikings of Allentown Central Catholic High School. Coach Schlosser took his juggernaut East Penn Conference winners to their second PIAA championship in three years on Friday night, and the boys from Fourth and Chew established themselves as one of the class acts in local sports. They are all stars.

Central Catholic took control of the game with Aliquippa and with poise and cool teamwork made it look a lot easier than it really was. A short definition of the word "team" reads: "A number of persons associated in some joint action, as one of the sides in a game or contest." Central Catholic on Friday night—and throughout the basketball season—provided the definitive illustration of what a team is and what a team can do. The Vikes have been giving basketball clinics all season long to their opponents with their grace, their stylish play—and especially their teamwork.

As they enjoy the feverish aftermath of their triumph, the boys from Central Catholic should file away for the future the impact of what they have accomplished, and how it was accomplished. There is another, much longer game awaiting these young men. It's called "life" by some; "the real world" by others. Except for a special few, success there will not be determined by sure-handed dribbling and quick moves. But the dedication, the determination and the will to be the best are qualities that are movable—from basketball to studies to careers.

Being No. 1 at age 16 or 17 or 18 is heady stuff. The cheers and rallies and parades for the returning champs are tributes to a collection of young men and their coaches who have done themselves, their school and the entire Lehigh Valley proud. Enjoy it, Vikings, 'cause you earned every bit of it!

A TRIBUTE TO BEN GROSS

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, the 25th of April, it will be my honor to take part in a tribute to one of labor's true heroes, Ben Gross. I want to take a moment to apprise my colleagues here in the Congress of Ben's important contributions to American workers. His advocacy on their behalf spans 40 years. The fight for equal rights for minorities in America has been fought on many fronts—economic, legal, educational and civic. Ben Gross has been a leader and a doer in all of these important areas.

A veteran of the labor movement, Ben first joined the UAW in 1946, becoming a member of Local 560 at Ford Motor Co. in Richmond, CA. Ben quickly became active in all facets of the union.

In 1948 he became a member of the Fair Practice and Anti-Discrimination Committee. Two years later, in 1948, he was appointed chairman of this committee. In 1953, his commitment to the union cause resulted in his election to the executive board of his local and the following year to the position of trustee.

In 1955, he became chairman of the Local 560 Housing Committee and embarked on a project that would eventually lead to the creation of a model community in Milpitas, CA—the Sunnyhills Cooperative Housing Development.

Working in close coordination with William Oliver, aide to UAW President Walter Reuther, Ben fought successfully for a number of years with banks, developers, politicians, and the State of California, to establish Sunnyhills as an integrated community for workers at the Ford plant in Milpitas. Although primarily motivated by a desire to make housing available for black Ford workers, Ben could proudly point to the fact that by 1958 Sunnyhill's 420 homes provided housing for people of Japanese, Hawaiian, Irish, German, native American, and many other national and ethnic minority backgrounds.

Ben and his wife Clara also played a major role in establishing the Sunnyhills United Methodist Church. In fact, some early services of the church school were held from the back of Ben's pickup truck. Ben was instrumental in obtaining a UAW local hall in Milpitas to serve as the temporary home for the church until larger quarters could be secured in 1964. He served as lay-leader for his church from 1965 to 1970.

Ben's civic involvement did not go unnoticed. In 1961, he was elected to the Milpitas City Council were he served for 4 years. In 1966 he was elected mayor of Milpitas—a fitting tribute to Ben for his tireless work in behalf of the entire Milpitas community. He received an "Outstanding Citizen Award" from the San Jose, CA, branch of the NAACP for his role in convincing Pacific Southwest Airlines to hire black stewards and ticket agents.

He did not allow his active political and civic life to come between him and his union activity. In 1956 he was elected as a shop committeeman for Local 560 and was later appointed the chairman of the Education and Political Action Committee.

Ben's political activity extended throughout the State of California. He also served for 7 years as the chairman of the Northern California Fair Employment Practices Council. He served as a member of the County Democratic Council of Santa Clara County where he helped to coordinate Democratic clubs, platforms, candidates and programs for the California State Democratic Party.

In 1964 he was a delegate to the Democratic National Convention in Atlantic City, NJ. He also served on the campaign committee of many prominent California Democrats from 1958 to 1966. In 1967 he was selected by the board of directors of the League of Cities of California as one of the outstanding mayors of California and was selected to make a "goodwill tour" of Europe. He visited London, England; East and West Berlin, Germany; Moscow and Leningrad, Russia; Warsaw, Poland; Budapest, Hungary; Prague, Czechoslovakia; and Paris, France.

In 1963 he was appointed as an international representative to the Fair Employment Practices staff by then President Walter Reuther. Reuther had worked with Ben on the Sunnyhills projects as well as on other projects. In 1971 Ben moved to Detroit to work out of Solidarity House. His many years in service to the cause of equal rights and fair practices was recognized in a special way in 1976 when Ben was appointed as coordinator, and later, assistant director of the Fair Practice Department.

The accomplishments I have mentioned in this short space are only sufficient to give a flavor for what Ben's life of contribution has been. All his activities have been characterized by a deep devotion to eradicating injustice. I think Ben is so deeply respected, so deeply loved because he has been guided in his life by an overriding confidence in the basic goodness of his fellow human beings. He is respected because he has respected others. His long and fruitful career in the UAW is a shining example for us all.

JUSTICE FOR FEDERAL RETIREES

HON. EDWARD F. FEIGHAN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, from the moment he took office, President Reagan has railed against the vices of the Federal Government: its wastefulness, its sluggishness, its stifling effect on economic activity. In his first inaugural address, the President, with a simplicity that appeals to simple minds, declared that "Government is not the solution to our problem; Government is the problem." Within hours, the President had begun to make good on his pledge to curb the size of Government. As his first official act, he chose the imposition of a hiring freeze on civilian Federal employees.

This first act was typical of the President's strategy for shrinking Government activity. Not content to root out wasteful or unnecessary spending, the President has sought to undermine Federal operations by attacking the rights and benefits of the workers who faithfully carry out the Government's business. Unable to achieve all the domestic spending cuts he desires, the President has tried to contain Government activities by demoralizing the workers, both current and retired, who sustain those activities. These assaults, unwarranted and inhumane, Mr. Speaker, must be stopped.

In his fiscal 1987 budget proposal, the President called for the elimination of this year's COLA for Federal retirees and the restriction of all future COLA's to 2 percent below the rise in the consumer price index. This COLA cut would come on top of the denial of their COLA that Federal retirees have already suffered in fiscal 1986.

The President's budget would also have reduced benefits for those retiring before the age of 62. And it would have replaced the high-three average formula for the retirement base with a high-five average formula.

Many of these proposals are familiar. The President has offered them before and the House has rejected them before. In his fiscal year 1984 budget, the President called for the elimination of the Federal retirees COLA, for the reduction of early retirement benefits and for the establishment of the high-five average retirement base. I was proud to be part of the majority in the House that defeated these proposals.

Again in his fiscal 1985 and 1986 budget plans, the President pressed his attacks on Federal retirees' welfare. Again I joined with a majority of my colleagues in the House to defeat these efforts.

Just a few week ago, the President's proposals for cuts in federal retirees' benefits met defeat on the House floor once again. This time, with the fiscal 1987 budget under consideration, both the House and the Republican-controlled Senate overwhelmingly rejected the President's plans.

The President claims that the elimination of Federal retirees' COLA's is necessary to satisfy the deficit targets established by the Gramm-Rudman balanced budget law. Nothing could be further from the truth. The Republican-controlled Senate Budget Committee has constructed a budget resolution that meets the fiscal 1986 Gramm-Rudman target of $144 billion without touching the civil service retirement system.

Along with more than 200 of my colleagues in the House, I have cosponsored H.R. 4060 to make sure that the Federal retiree's COLA will be paid in full.

Mr. Speaker, Federal workers serve their country every day. They do so despite often harsh treatment in the press and despite lower than average compensation. The one way in which the Federal Government attempts to redress these inequities is by providing a reasonable and secure retirement system for Federal employees. That retirement system represents a solemn obligation between the citizens of our country and the employees who carry out the public's business. It is an obligation that we must not allow the President to violate.

QUESTIONNAIRE RESULTS

HON. WILLIAM F. GOODLING

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, I recently received results of my districtwide questionnaire distributed throughout the 19th District of Pennsylvania. My office received back some 9,000 completed questionnaires. I urge my colleagues to study the results of this questionnaire.

(1) Do you agree that federal funding for abortions should be permitted in instances where the life of the mother is endangered?

Yes—67.4 percent; No—29.2 percent; Not answered—3.4 percent.

(2) Do you feel government support to farmers should be reduced?

Yes—52.0 percent; No—44.8 percent; Not answered—3.2 percent.

(3) Do you believe the government should continue to provide assistance to individuals wishing to attend college?

Yes—55.6 percent; No—41.0 percent; Not answered—3.2 percent.

(4) Would you support an increase in the FICA tax to maintain COLA's for Social Security recipients?

Yes—41.0 percent; No—49.6 percent; Not answered—9.4 percent.

(5) Should the Federal Government continue to fund Amtrak?

Yes—27.2 percent; No—67.0 percent; Not answered—5.8 percent.

(6) Should the Federal Government sell its share of Conrail to Norfolk-Southern Railroad if it is the highest bidder?

Yes—74.4 percent; No—18.4 percent; Not answered—7.2 percent.

(7) Now that the undamaged reactor at Three Mile Island has been restarted, do you feel officials have the situation safely under control?

Yes—38.6 percent; No—54.4 percent; Unanswered—6.8 percent.

(8) Do you believe the cleanup of hazardous dumps (Superfund) should be a TOP government priority?

Yes—79.2 percent; No—18.0 percent; Not answered—2.8 percent.

(9) Although the House passed a tax reform bill which needs action by the Senate before the President can sign it into law, would you prefer a flat-rate tax bill with no exceptions?

Yes—60.4 percent; No—32.6 percent; Not answered—7.0 percent.

(10) Do you think relations between the Superpowers are improving?

Yes—53.0 percent; No—38.6 percent; Not answered—8.0 percent.

(11) Should deficit reduction be a priority for the U.S. Government?

Yes—90.8 percent; No—2.0 percent; Not answered—7.2 percent.

If yes, how: Less domestic spending—7.4 percent; Less defense spending—16.8 percent; Tax increases—1.6 percent; Less spending across the board—43.4 percent; Reduced Federal spending—16.0 percent.

(12) Do you favor allowing countries to export their goods to the United States, including automobiles, when they restrict the importation of our goods to their countries?

Yes—9.2 percent; No—88.4 percent; Not answered—2.4 percent.

(13) Do you think the Strategic Defense Initiative is a good investment of our tax dollars?

Yes—53.4 percent; No—33.2 percent; Not answered—13.2 percent.

(14) Campaign spending has skyrocketed in recent years with the rise of political action committees. Would you favor a proposal which puts a ceiling on total Congressional campaign spending by PAC's?

Yes—93.0 percent; No—5.4 percent; Not answered—1.6 percent.

(15) What do you consider to be the most important issue facing the country in 1986?

Deficit—47.6 percent; Taxes—1.2 percent; Trade—8.6 percent; Unemployment—6.8 percent; Social Security—2.8 percent; Defense spending—23.2 percent; Not answered—1.6 percent.

75.1 percent of respondents were male; 24.9 were female. 7.9 percent of respondents were under 30 years of age; 32.7 percent between 30-49; 31.0 percent between 50-64; and 28.5 percent were over 65 years of age.

REFORMING OUR TORT SYSTEM

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, the Illinois delegation to the 1986 White House Small Business Conference has focused its attention on the need for reforming our tort system. The insurance task force of the delegation, chaired by my appointee to the conference, George Noyes of Winnetka, IL, recently completed its report and recommendations for action. I urge my colleagues to review the following findings of the insurance task force:

REPORT

The civil justice system in the United States is not meeting its citizens' needs. The scales of justice are grossly unbalanced. We need to have rational standards of conduct expected of us. If an injury occurs because we fail to meet those standards the injured party must be compensated promptly and with fairness to all. If the present situation continues we predict an ever escalating crisis for millions of Americans. They will be increasingly affected because of the inability of insurance buyers to obtain or afford adequate liability coverage. Change is necessary. It should be accomplished at the Federal level to attain consistency and because the problem is national. If any of our recommendations to correct the imbalance is within the purview of only the States, then the Federal Government must encourage the State Governments to deal with it. If necessary a carrot or stick approach would not be inappropriate.

Some ideas that have received support cause us concern. We suggest that neither changes affecting attorneys such as regulation of contingency fees nor changes affecting insurance companies such as repeal of the 1945 McCarran Ferguson Act are appropriate now. It is questionable that they are a major cause of the problem we face because they are no different now than they were twenty and more years ago.

There is significant risk of overreaction to the current situation because extreme change has occurred in such a very short time. We considered that risk and followed these criteria: Fair, Sensible, Effective and Possible.

RECOMMENDATIONS IN ORDER OF PRIORITY

1. Return to fault based verdicts and awards and limit a non-economic award to $300,000 or the economic award whichever is the lesser.

2. Require that the losing party pay the legal expenses of the winning party.

3. Abolish joint and several liability which will eliminate the injustice to the "deep pocket".

4. Establish an optional non-judicial resolution of disputes with the objective of saving time and costs.

5. Abolish the collateral source rule. It prevents the introduction of evidence showing that a plaintiff has been compensated by another source.

6. Enact products liability legislation including a statute of limitations and a state of the art defense.

7. Limit class action suits to those with provable economic loss.

GOLETA BEAUTIFUL

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues, it's my pleasure to call to the attention of the House the work of a civic-minded group in my district, Goleta Beautiful.

Goleta Beautiful is a nonprofit organization formed in 1974 for the purpose of promoting the beautification of the Goleta Valley. By working as a coordinating agency, encouraging assistance from citizens, public and private organizations and State and local governments, Goleta Beautiful develops, educates and promotes activities for a clean, attractive well-designed community, beautiful roadways, and environment with a heightened appreciation of the Goleta area's natural beauty.

In its first years, Goleta Beautiful was responsible for the placement of the corrugate rock trash containers in downtown Goleta. A master plan was designed for old town and given to the Goleta Downtown Business Association. Goleta Beautiful was instrumental in securing underground services on Hollister and coordinated this Edison project. Goleta Beautiful was active in promoting the acquisition of the Goleta Union School for the Goleta Community Center.

In its early years, Goleta Beautiful organized youth groups in cleanup activities, such as the Boy Scouts cleaning up on San Pass.

In November 1981, Goleta Beautiful moved the old Goleta Depot to its present site at 300 N. Los Carneros. The saving of the Goleta Depot was the most challenging project undertaken by Goleta Beautiful in the early 1980's.

Goleta Beautiful is responsible for the planting of the medians near the airport, a project shared with the city of Santa Barbara, and the continuous planting of medians in Old Town Goleta and at Hollister and Patterson.

In 1982 September was Cleanup Goleta Month and many volunteers help Goleta Beautiful ready the sidewalks and streets for "Goleta Valley Days."

Goleta Beautiful holds an annual award banquet each May to give recognition to owners, architects and gardners of exceptionally well cared for properties.

Goleta Beautiful has declared March as Goleta Beautiful Month as a stimulus to the public to participate in the beautification of the area.

I'm proud to extend the commendations of the House to Goleta Beautiful and its members for their work in making the Goleta Valley an even nicer place to live.

EASTON (PA) AREA HIGH SCHOOL GIRLS GYMNASTIC TEAM HONORED

HON. DON RITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to honor the Easton Area High School girls gymnastics team. The team recently won the East Penn conference, District XI, and State championships in their category. The winning team includes coach Linda Fisher, assistant coach Kelly Kreitz, team managers Kate Kreitz and Kevin O'Brien, and team members Ann Zingales, Lori Rush, Paula Cavan, Deanne DeBellis, Tara Rissmiller, Anne Blandeburgo, Tracy Tomaino, and Keely Huff.

CONGRATULATING JAMES F. CAHILLANE ON BEING RECOGNIZED BY THE NORTHAMPTON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE AS "CITIZEN OF THE YEAR"

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this moment to acknowledge the lifelong dedication which James F. Cahillane has exhibited toward his community of Northampton, MA and to congratulate Mr. Cahillane for being recognized by his fellow citizens as Northampton's "Citizen of the Year," an honor well deserved.

Mr. Cahillane has made an invaluable contribution of his time and business talent in promoting the economic growth of his community and providing permanent employment for hundreds of Northampton residents. He has served as president of Cahillane Motors, Inc., since 1964. Recognized as a leader of the local business community, Mr. Cahillane was appointed to the Northampton Redevelopment Authority in 1970 and soon thereafter became its chairman.

James Cahillane understood that urban renewal and industrial park development were necessary to provide the incentive for businesses and industries to settle in his community. He pursued the establishment of Northampton's industrial park at a time when the idea was both novel and controversial. Nonetheless, his foresight proved fortuitous for his community. Fourteen businesses have settled in Northampton's industrial park. Two more will establish themselves there by the end of the year. Altogether, the Northampton industrial park represents several million dollars of local investment and 800 jobs.

Mr. Cahillane has also been instrumental in fostering the entrepreneurial spirit from his position as director of the Northampton Development Corp. This corporation has financed the expansion and renovation of several existing community businesses and has aided the founding of new businesses in the area.

In addition, Mr. Cahillane has served on ad hoc redevelopment committees concerned with the rehabilitation of Main Street and Pleasant Street in his hometown. The efforts of these committees have led to the rejuvenation of Northampton's center as a vital and thriving small business area.

Mr. Cahillane has devoted himself to the enhancement of the economic welfare of Northampton and its residents. Through work and dedication to his community, James F. Cahillane has truly earned the title of "Citizen of the Year."

CONGRATULATIONS TO MR. POTIER AND PERRY MORRICE FFA

HON. BILL SCHUETTE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. SCHUETTE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Perry Morrice Future Farmers of America Chapter on its 50th anniversary, and also to commend Mr. James D. Potier, retiring vocational agriculture instructor, on his 26 years of service to the Perry Public School system.

Throughout his years at Perry Schools, Mr. Potier has distinguished himself through his dedication to furthering vocational education. He has been the recipient of the Honorary Chapter, State, and American Farmer degrees. Mr. Potier's service in the field of agriculture is admirable, and he has been an inspiration to many young future farmers.

Also, the Perry Morrice Future Farmers of America Chapter deserves commendation for its excellent record in promoting agricultural excellence. The chapter has had several agricultural judging teams that have won State competitions and six teams which, in the past, have been selected to participate in national competition. On the eve of the chapter's 50th anniversary, I would like to congratulate its members, both past and present, and wish the organization an equally successful future.

KOREA MAKING TRADE PROGRESS IN TENNESSEE

HON. DON SUNDQUIST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. SUNDQUIST. Mr. Speaker, I want to take a moment to call your attention to the promising discussions now taking place between representatives of the United States and one of its most important trading partners—the Republic of Korea. Business and government leaders from my State—Tennessee—and from other Southeastern States have been meeting with their counterparts from Korea, a delegation headed by Minister of Trade and Industry Jin-Ho Kum, to explore forging new economic ties.

The Southeast is rich in opportunities for exports to Korea—from manufactured goods to agricultural products. The ground breaking talks between representatives of our two countries hold significant promise. They could lead to new trading agreements that would provide a major boost to the economic well being of our region.

We are encouraged to see Korea, the eighth largest customer for United States products, undertake plans to expand and intensify its trading relationships with our country. Korea is a nation whose continued economic strength is of strategic importance to us in the Pacific. It shoulders an immense defense burden and has the fourth largest international debt in the world.

Through our discussions with the Koreans, we have taken some important first steps in developing mutually beneficial trading relationships. These initiatives could serve as a model for dealing with each of our good-faith trading partners. Thoughtful, cooperative efforts of this kind are certain to gain more lasting benefits than what might be produced by short-sighted confrontational policies.

GEORGIA STATE SENATOR GLENN E. BRYANT LAUDED FOR OUTSTANDING ACCOMPLISHMENTS

HON. ROBERT LINDSAY THOMAS

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. THOMAS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, it is my great honor to call to the attention of the House a milestone of great significance which will be celebrated in my congressional district on April 24. The event will be the observance of the 40th anniversary of the establishment of Coastal Utilities, Inc., under the leadership of the Honorable Glenn E. Bryant of Hinesville, GA.

It will be my privilege to participate in the anniversary occasion along with our Governor, Lieutenant Governor, State legislators, city and county officials, and private citizens.

As important as the Coastal Utilities organization is to our community, the real reason for our gathering will be to pay tribute to a man, not a company. We will be joining to salute State Senator Bryant.

Senator Bryant purchased the Hinesville Telephone Co. in 1946, and changed the name to Coastal Utilities, Inc. Under his guidance and leadership, the company has grown from an operation with about 200 customers to more than 18,000 today. It is one of the most modern independent telephone companies in America with exchanges in the communities of Hinesville, Midway, Richmond Hill, and Keller.

In that process, Senator Bryant has also been a pioneer in cable television in our area, in banking, and in many other fields of business and commerce. But his great success as a businessman has always been surpassed by his great generosity with his resources.

He is among our most active community philanthropists, and has been especially recognized for his contributions to the Boy Scouts of America, Georgia Southern College, Brunswick Junior College, and many other organizations.

Those accomplishments alone would make Senator Bryant one of our most notable and distinguished citizens. But his career and his contributions go far beyond the field of business. He has served in public office for nearly 30 years in posts including the office of mayor of the city of Hinesville, chairman of the Liberty County Commission, and now in his fourth term in the Georgia Senate.

In short, Glenn Bryant is an individual who typifies the very best in America—a citizen who takes the responsibilities of his citizenship seriously. He is a man who is generous with his time, his money, and his energy. He is not one who sits back and takes the blessings of this great country for granted. Instead, he is a man who has made a difference in the quality of life in his local community, his State, and his Nation.

On behalf of the Georgia Congressional Delegation and the people of the First District of Georgia, we salute Glenn Bryant, we recognize his accomplishments, and we look forward to his continuing service in behalf of his fellowman.

MORE POWER TO THE PEOPLE

SPEECH OF

HON. ROBERT A. YOUNG

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 21, 1986

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my strong support for the action the House took yesterday by passing H.R. 44, the Electric Consumers Protection Act of 1986.

Currently, hydropower provides over 13 percent of the total amount of electrical power our country produces—almost as much as that provided by nuclear energy. Much of this capability comes from federally owned and operated dams. Historically, the primary developers of large, multiple-purpose dams have been the States and the Federal Government. A substantial number of dams, however, are owned by private investors who must still license their facilities with the Federal Government.

Part I of the Federal Power Act, enacted in 1920, grants what is now the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission [FERC] with the authority to issue licenses for the construction and operation of hydroelectric projects. The act requires the FERC to give preference in licensing to States and municipalities over private utilities in issuing original licenses if the State or municipality has developed plans which are "Equally well adapted" to "conserve and utilize in the public interest the water resources of the region." There has been substantial debate, however, as to whether this initial preference in licensing also applies to the relicensing of projects.

When the original license expires, the Federal Government has the option of taking over the project. If the Government does not elect to do so, then FERC can issue a new license to either the original licensee or to another license applicant.

Because licenses issued during the surge of dam building in the 1930's and 1940's were issued for a maximum of 50 years, many are now coming up for relicensing. Of the 366 investor-owned hydropower projects, 177 licenses will expire by 1993. In most cases, existing licenses have made substantial investments and devoted considerable resources to utilize a given project site efficiently.

Since the mid-1970's, the FERC has relicensed 95 projects. Of these projects, 16 have resulted in increased generation capacity totaling over 1.4 million kilowatts. According to FERC testimony, more than 6 percent of the relicense applications proposed installation of new capacity of over 100,000 kilowatts each. Of the 95 relicensed projects, 79 were major licenses; 15, or 19 percent of the 79 major relicenses resulted in additional capacity. The average increase in capacity was 60,000 kilowatts. Also according to the FERC, if 19 percent of the 250 relicense applications for major licenses to be filed in the next 15 years are capable of adding 60,000 kilowatts, over 2.8 million kilowatts of additional capacity could result.

Mr. Speaker, this gain to all the consumers in this country stands to be lost unless the question of municipal preference in the relicensing procedure is resolved. Because private utilities serve approximately 74 million customers—76 percent of all electricity customers nationwide—while States and municipalities serve relatively few, the application of a municipal preference to relicensing could result ultimately in concentrating the benefits from most of the hydroelectric power projects in the country into the hands of a relatively small number of "preferred customers."

Furthermore, if the license is not issued to the original licensee, under current law the new licensee is required to pay the owner of the original license an amount equal to the original licensee's net investment, plus severance damages. Some have argued that this should be interpreted to mean the original cost of the plant minus accrued depreciation. Thus, concern has also focused on whether private utilities and their customers will be adequately compensated for a loss of a project since the market value of hydropower projects often greatly exceeds the original cost of construction.

Mr. Speaker, common sense would tell us that if competing applications are in fact "equally well adapted," demonstrated good performance by the existing licensee should be given considerable weight. Good performance should be rewarded with license renewal because many licensees have invested substantial financial and human resources to develop and operate hydropower sites efficiently to provide least cost electricity to their customers. The primary consideration in relicensing should not be based on who owns the utility operating the dam, but on the most efficient allocation of resources—FERC's historic concern.

In short, Mr. Speaker, adopting or continuing a municipal power preference in hydroelectric relicensing is both inefficient and unfair. H.R. 44 is absolutely necessary in order to provide the most power at the lowest cost to the greatest number of customers.

I would also like to add that I am very pleased by the provisions added to this bill regarding fish, wildlife, and other values to be considered at relicensing time in addition to the utility of power generated.

Specifically, the report accompanying this bill notes that in recent years there has been increasing recognition of the environmental problems caused by industrial, commercial, and residential development, and that this recognition extends to a heightened awareness of the dangers to fish and wildlife from hydroelectric development. This bill seeks to address these concerns and provide greater protection for fish and wildlife. The bill also enjoins FERC to place greater value on safety, recreation, and water quality when relicensing. More stringent environmental protection and controls will only enhance the relicensing procedure and ensure that the utilitarian decisionmaking process of relicensing will not exclude consideration of safety factors and environmental conditions.

As the committee report plainly states, under this bill the original act would be amended so that basic environmental considerations are given "equitable treatment." With these amendments power development is no longer considered an absolute priority. For the first time, the FERC would have the authority to deny an application on environmental grounds.

Moreover, the FERC would be asked to apply these so-called nonpower values in all its projects, whether licensed or exempted, original or otherwise. This bill would clearly upgrade the status at FERC of critical recommendations of the National Marine Fisheries Service, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, and applicable State fish and wildlife agencies under the Coordination Act. It would require FERC to rely heavily on the advice and informal approval of these expert agencies.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, allow me to congratulate the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SHELBY], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARKEY], and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL] for their diligent and painstaking efforts. The Committee on Energy and Commerce has been keenly aware of the variety of interests on this issue and has fashioned a bill which protects those interests. The result, which we passed yesterday, ensures we will meet both the need for least cost electricity and the need for equitable consideration of nonpower values.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON COMPETITIVENESS

HON. FRANK HORTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, this past weekend I had the pleasure of joining 11 of my colleagues at a National Conference on Competitiveness. This meeting, sponsored jointly by the Northeast-Midwest Congressional Coalition, the Business-Higher Education Forum, and the Congressional Clearinghouse on the Future, was the culmination of an 18-month process that included discussion sessions around the country. The conference brought together a bipartisan group of Members of Congress and chief executives of many of the Nation's leading corporations and colleges and universities to identify specific steps each sector can take to enhance the nation's economic competitiveness.

If one thing has become clear in the last year, it is that greater cooperation between the business and education sectors and the Federal Government is necessary if the United States is to reverse the drastic decline in its competitive position in the world economy. For this reason the coalition, the forum, and the clearinghouse have performed a valuable service by organizing this unique effort. The leadership and vision of Edward Donley of Air Products and Chemicals, Inc., who currently chairs the forum, has been particularly important in bringing us to this point, and he is committed to pursuing the recommendations we agreed upon.

And speaking as a cochair of the coalition, I can promise you that our organization will follow up on those recommendations and lead the way in forming a bipartisan consensus on appropriate actions for the Congress. A report on the conference detailing an action agenda for all three sectors will be prepared in the next several weeks. When it is finished, the coalition will host a meeting for Members of Congress who have been involved in the cooperative effort and leaders of the foremost business and higher education groups to release it. We also will distrubute it to all Members of the House and Senate so they can see the range of actions upon which we agreed.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I would like to introduce into the RECORD a speech delivered to the conference by Ruben F. Mettler, the chairman of TRW, Inc. Mr. Mettler was one of the driving forces behind the effort to bring the business and higher education leaders together with Members of Congress, and cochaired the steering committee that planned our regional meetings and the conference. His speech clearly and succinctly lays out the challenge facing our Nation and the need to make competitiveness one of our top priorities. It should be required reading for every policymaker whose decisions in any way affect our economic future.

The speech follows:

COMPETING EFFECTIVELY: A CHALLENGE TO ALL AMERICANS

The underlying proposition for this conference is that we Americans face a major challenge to our national will and our national capacity—a challenge that is not receiving the attention it deserves.

The challenge is to rebuild and maintain an American competitive position in the world marketplace . . . to sustain strong, noninflationary growth, with high levels of employment, and a rising standard of living for an expanding population.

How well and how quickly we meet that challenge will largely determine our ability to meet our national defense and foreign policy goals . . . as well as our domestic social, political, and economic aspirations. Thriving cities, renewed rural areas, new job opportunities, upward mobility, aid to the disadvantaged, security in old age, a healthy environment, superior educational and cultural institutions—all depend upon a competitive economy.

And today, as never before, we must act in a worldwide context. The world's problems are our problems. We can't wish them away. We must deal with them, because our domestic economic health and vigor have become dependent upon world markets.

At the moment, our alarming fiscal and trade deficits suggest that we can no longer pay the combined costs of our social welfare commitments, military defense, foreign aid, environmental protection, let alone maintain the vast infrastructure on which our society depends. Either we have overcommitted our economic resources, or our economy is failing to perform as it should. Which is it? In my view, it is both. That means we must both restrain the demands on our economy, and improve its performance. At stake are millions of American jobs—as well as the long-term growth and vigor of our entire economy—and all that depends on it.

With the stakes so high, why are we losing our competitiveness? We have so many strengths! . . . the world's greatest industrial capacity, the biggest marketing networks, science and technological capacities that lead all other nations in scope and depth, a work force that is one of the best educated and most skilled; and superb managers. What's our problem?

I believe one of our fundamental problems is that too many Americans, and unfortunately many in leadership positions, don't fully accept the need to be fully competitive on a worldwide basis. Our easy economic superiority of prior decades has created a dangerous national sense of economic isolation and invulnerability. Perhaps we think the issues will solve themselves. As a result, we give competitiveness a low priority in domestic policies and politics.

Competitiveness means hard work—sustained over many years, even decades. We are in a marathon, not an annual 100-yard dash. It means tough choices. It means working together . . . changing antiquated attitudes and practices.

It means thinking and acting with the understanding that the global competitive battle is no longer just between industry and industry, or company and company; with each seeking a competitive advantage on its own, but rather a matter of what the entire society does—government, managers, employees, unions, educational institutions, consumers and taxpayers, all together, all part of the action, for better or worse.

It means giving weight to the often substantial consensus as the center, and not allowing the small, but vocal, minorities at the fringes—the 10 or 15 percent at both ends—to dominate policy debates and deter action.

It is not unusual to hear people say: "I know that. Of course, we must be competitive." My point is we have had too much rhetoric about competitiveness and too little action. Priorities and policies are revealed by the actions that are taken, not by rhetoric.

For decades, both the private and public sectors have failed to make competitiveness a test of merit in developing our policies. Too often, competitiveness in world markets is not even at the policy-making table in government, business, and educational institutions.

Winning or losing in today's world markets is a combination of many factors—government and company policies, currency exchange rates, cost of capital, human skills, wage and salary levels, science and technology, product quality, productivity, location, and competent management.

In this intensely competitive environment, very small margins of advantage or disadvantage in any of these factors often spell the difference between winning or losing.

It is not difficult to find examples of actions that demonstrate the low priority we place on competitiveness. They can be found:

In our national macroeconomic policies;

In dozens of laws, policies, regulations and programs which have embedded side effects that work against American firms and workers and favor foreign competitors—a legacy of prior decades;

In the strategies and actions of American companies;

In the curricula and research of our academic institutions.

I do want to say that the actions taken in the past 6 months to get a significant movement in some currency exchange rates is a major positive step.

But it is vital that we not fall into the trap of believing that currency exchange rates are the whole ball game.

Now, quick examples that illustrate the low priority to competitiveness.

The tax bills proposed by the Administration and under consideration by the Congress, do contain some economically worthwhile features—a broader tax base, and lower marginal rates, for example. But they are not designed with a high priority on competitiveness. Quite the opposite. If enacted as they stand, they would be a boon to our foreign competitors.

A little noticed provision in the current tax code substantially reduces taxes for multinational companies if they will move their research and development out of U.S. labs and universities and into overseas facilities.

Despite the rising importance of skill training and worker mobility in making the adjustments necessary to improving competitiveness, federal and state training programs and employment services operate in a conflicting, overlapping, and ineffective maze.

To help resolve the divisive issue of taxation of multinational companies at the state level, a federal tax force several years ago arrived at the so-called "water-edge" solution—in competitive terms that means tax American companies but exempt their foreign competitors operating in the same states.

The available protection for the intellectual property of American companies—patents, copyrights and know-how—is weak and relatively ineffective against foreign competitors. In addition, there is a clear asymmetry between the U.S. and Japan in the reciprocal access to scientific and engineering research in the two countries.

A succession of public policy changes have led to a serious under-investment in the nations scientific and engineering infrastructure.

Current U.S. antitrust statutes and their interpretation do not recognize the reality of worldwide competition, and work to the disadvantage of U.S. companies in our own domestic markets. In addition, the extraterritorial application of U.S. antitrust laws in foreign countries works as a competitive handicap to American companies in foreign markets.

The strategies, plans and thinking of too many U.S. companies focus on domestic markets and ignore the reality of worldwide markets and foreign competitors. And too often, our standards of product quality and productivity, and our investment in new technology and upgrading employee skills don't match those of foreign competitors.

Most economics departments and business schools still teach the 18th century wine and wool concept of comparative advantage in international trade based on climate and natural resources. Yet in the modern world, comparative, or one now could say "competitive" advantage, is being created by technology, investment, and worldwide marketing, as demonstrated by Japan and other Far Eastern nations. The two concepts lead to very different public and private policies.

Despite the rich source of economic performance data around the world, most university courses in comparative economic systems (if taught at all) are limited to the U.S. and the Soviet Union, omitting any study of the competitiveness of the U.S. as compared with Japan or other Far Eastern countries or countries in Western Europe. Indeed, it is possible to get a graduate degree in economics in most universities without ever studying the issue of worldwide competitiveness.

Clearly, I'm suggesting that we recognize and move together to meet the global competitive challenges we face . . . that we work to put America's competitive performance at the top of our national economic agenda . . . that we make competitiveness a test of merit in developing new policies, and in correcting old policies . . . indeed, in all that we do.

As Ed Donley mentioned last night, our approach in this important venture has been to seek the best ideas and recommendations from previous studies, to seek consensus and then identify what is needed to translate consensus into action.

Our challenge today and tomorrow is to reduce our agenda to a few actionable items and then identify what must be done to make politically feasible that which is economically necessary. I repeat to make politically feasible that which is economically necessary.

And as Ed said last evening, the very important macro issues—tax, budget, defense, monetary policies and the like, vital as they are—are not the focus of this particular conference.

Most of us are addressing these very difficult issues in other forums and through other means.

Rather, our purpose is to focus attention on four subjects where we can make a difference: R&D infrastructure; trade policy; worker education and training; and science and technology policy. Taken together, they can have a profound influence on U.S. competitiveness.

Many of the most important problems identified in the regional seminars could be corrected as a matter of policy, with no, or only small federal or state budget implications. Others would require new funds.

Most important, we are seeking actions that can readily be pushed through to completion. Actions that we can take back to our own institutions, where we have a special measure of influence or control, and invite a widespread participation.

OPPOSED TO PAY RAISE

HON. WILLIAM F. CLINGER, JR.

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to strongly protest recent action by this House in sneaking through what amounts to a pay raise for Members of Congress.

On Tuesday, April 22, with no more than a handful of Members present on the floor, the leadership of this House allowed a surprise resolution to be brought up and passed, without the benefit of a recorded vote, which increases the total amount of outside income the Members of Congress are allowed to receive.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that this was both a shameful and cowardly act. The leadership of this body knows full well that I, along with the large majority of my colleagues, would never have voted in favor of this blatant, self-serving bill.

This country is facing a $200 million deficit and there are tens of thousands of hard-working Americans who cannot find a job. These are critical problems * * * these are the things that we were elected to fix * * * this is the business that we should be focusing on.

Instead the leadership of this body chooses to spend its time raising its own salary * * * without any debate and without the requirement that each Member go on record with their vote.

I am here to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I am vehemently opposed to this pay raise, and that's what it really is * * * a pay raise, that I would not have voted for it, and I will not take it. Quite frankly, Congress does not deserve this increase.

And now I am supposed to go back to the fine people of my district and tell them that we haven't balanced the budget, we haven't solved the terrible problems of unemployment, but we did give more money to ourselves * * * no way!

Mr. Speaker, I pledge that I will help lead the fight to have this thinly veiled pay raise revoked. The people of our districts didn't elect us to take care of ourselves. We were elected to work on the tremendous problems that face this country * * * unemployment, inflation, high taxes.

These are the problems that should receive our full attention.

I urge my colleagues, on both sides of the aisle, to reject this frivilous measure and return our attention to the pressing issues before this House. This is where our duty lies.

FUNDING LEVELS IN H.R. 4356

HON. HAMILTON FISH, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, yesterday Attorney General Edwin Meese wrote a letter to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, PETER W. RODINO, Jr., discussing H.R. 4356, legislation authorizing appropriations for the Department of Justice for fiscal year 1987. Mr. Meese's letter included a thoughtful analysis of the impact on the administration of justice of funding levels in H.R. 4356.

This morning, the Committee on the Judiciary marked up H.R. 4356 and responded to some of the Attorney General's concerns. The committee adopted an amendment offered by Mr. MOORHEAD to authorize the administration's requested funding level for the Federal prison system and an amendment offered by Mr. LUNGREN to authorize most of the administration's funding request for U.S. attorneys. H.R. 4356, as originally introduced by Chairman RODINO, recognized the special needs of the Immigration and Naturalization Service and the Drug Enforcement Administration. Those needs remained protected during our markup.

The administration is committed to the funding levels included in the President's budget submission. The letter from the Attorney General is a useful document that discusses the Department of Justice's budget. I am pleased to commend it to the Members of this body.

The letter follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, DC, April 21, 1986.

Hon. PETER W. RODINO, Jr.,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR CHAIRMAN RODINO: I am writing to advise you of my significant concern about the 1987 funding levels proposed for the Department of Justice in H.R. 4356—a bill to authorize appropriations to carry out the activities of the Department for fiscal year 1987, and for other purposes.

When I testified before your Committee on March 12, 1986, we had not yet completed review of H.R. 4356. I therefore request that you include my comments on H.R. 4356 in the record of the hearing.

I regret that the Administration's proposed 1987 Appropriations Authorization Bill for the Department of Justice had not yet been forwarded to the Congress at the time of the hearing. However, the Committee had been provided detailed justification material in support of the President's 1987 budget for the Department of Justice. On April 16, 1986, our proposal was submitted to the Congress.

As you know, the President's FY 1987 budget request addresses the need to meet the FY 1987 Gramm-Rudman-Hollings maximum deficit target of $144 billion.

In reaching this target, the President decided to fund certain core functions the Federal Government must perform. Among these essential functions is the administration of the federal justice system. The President recognizes this and his budget decisions confirm his views about important programs within the Department of Justice. In essence, the President's 1987 budget continues and, in many cases, enhances the resource levels for the Department's federal mission related programs.

H.R. 4536, on the other hand, proposes to freeze the majority of the Department of Justice's 1987 appropriations at the 1986 enacted level. Given that the Department of Justice performs essential functions of the Federal Government it is not prudent for your Committee, the Congress or the Administration to plan on freezing the majority of the Department of Justice at our 1986 appropriation level.

The Congress enacted the laws that the Department of Justice enforces. The people expect these laws to be enforced. For example, one result of our vigorous attack on major drug trafficking organizations and on organized criminal enterprises has been a 50 percent increase in the federal prison population since 1981. Federal judges sentenced these people for having violated laws that this and previous Congresses enacted. It is my responsibility to house and care for the prisoners in a humane manner. The freeze level you propose for the Federal Prison System will not accommodate the major facilities expansion we need in our Federal Prison System. Nor will it allow us to provide adequate food, medical care and necessary inmate programs for a continually growing federal prison population.

This Congress and this Administration cannot abdicate from the core federal responsibilities we must perform—defending the public interest in criminal and civil court proceedings, operating correctional facilities, and protecting the integrity of our judges and other judicial officials—even in times of severe fiscal constraint.

As the President's 1987 budget recommends, the Congress must find the necessary savings in other less essential federal programs in order to fund the Department of Justice at the level requested by the President in his 1987 budget.

Some of the important initiatives H.R. 4356 would curtail in 1987, should our 1987 appropriations be limited to the amounts proposed for authorization are:

Federal Prison System. Our current federal prisoner population is 46 percent greater than our rated bedspace capacity. The President's 1987 budget proposes funding for three new federal prison facilities which we plan to locate in Bradford, Pennsylvania, Sheridan, Oregon, and Marianna, Florida. These three new facilities would add 2,250 critically needed bedspaces.

In addition, the President's 1987 request would fund the construction of two camps at the existing Marion, Illinois and Phoenix, Arizona facilities—adding another 250 bedspaces. Another critical portion of our request for the Federal Prison System would provide the funds to staff new housing units which will be ready for activation in 1987. Further, there is a significant increase in the 1987 request, compared to 1986, to provide funding for the dramatically growing average daily population of our Federal Prison System. The level of funding proposed in H.R. 4356 would not provide the funds necessary to feed and care for the existing and growing federal prisoner population.

The federal prisoner population is the end result of federal criminal justice system actions taken by the three branches of our Federal Government—law making, law enforcing and law adjudicating. The Congress and the Administration must exercise our mutual responsibility to ensure adequate funding to house and care for in the growing federal prisoner population.

Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI). Your proposed appropriation authorization would bring to a halt a critical Presidental initiative within the FBI. That is the continued, measured enhancement of our Foreign Counterintelligence program. The 1987 request represents the fourth year of this essential initiative. The FBI has been providing significant results from the investments in our Foreign Counterintelligence program. This vital national security initiative must be continued as planned for 1987.

We also need the funding requested ($10 million) to add clerical support to our FBI field investigative programs. Extreme backlogs are developing in transcribing tapes and typing reports in the field offices. The federal criminal justice system will suffer unless this problem is resolved.

Further, there are important technological initiatives proposed for funding in the FBI for 1987—including continued expansion of our voice privacy radio network, which is vital to the security of our field operations and the safety of field agent personnel, and funding for new uses of artificial intelligence in our field investigative programs.

Drug Enforcement Related Initiatives. While H.R. 4356 recognizes the need to add additional resources in 1987 to the Drug Enforcement Administration, there are drug enforcement related initiatives proposed in several other appropriation accounts which are also important. These include the U.S. Marshals Service request for additional support to our Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Forces (OCDETF) initiative and our request for additional prosecutors in the Tax and Criminal Divisions and the U.S. Attorneys. We also need, in 1987, funds for the full costs of the staff added to the U.S. Attorneys in 1986 for the OCDETF initiative.

General Legal Activities. Billions of dollars of federal funds are at risk in civil litigation. The Department of Justice must defend the Federal Government and we simply must be provided adequate resources to cope with a growing defensive caseload. The requests we have proposed for the Civil and Land and Natural Resources Divisions and the U.S. Attorneys are essential if we are to defend the Federal Government successfully in 1987. In order to preclude extensive future growth in staffing and to make current staff more productive, it is also critical that the President's request for a $10 million Legal Activities Office Automation initiative be supported in 1987. To allow effective and efficient use of all our attorney resources, I urge the Committee's support of the President's 1987 budget proposal to merge the U.S. Attorneys into the General Legal Activities appropriation.

I hope these highlights of our 1987 initiatives will cause you to reconsider the appropriations authorization levels proposed for the Department of Justice in H.R. 4356. I urge you to propose amendments, during full Committee mark-up of H.R. 4356, which would authorize 1987 appropriation levels in line with the President's 1987 budget request for the Department of Justice. These levels are provided in the enclosure.

As mentioned earlier, I would appreciate your including this letter as part of the Committee's hearing record on the Department of Justice's 1987 appropriations authorization request.

Sincerely,

EDWIN MEESE III,
Attorney General.

Enclosure.

A CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO LUCY GUILD TOBERMAN

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, it is my distinct honor to rise and pay tribute to Lucy Guild Toberman, who has worked unselfishly for the past 50 years to help our community through her profound dedication to local government, civic activities, and philanthropies. Mrs. Toberman will be honored as the Harbor Area YWCA Woman of the Year at a dinner at the Princess Louise Pavilion on May 1, 1986.

Following 2 years of study in the graduate school of social work at USC, Lucy Guild Toberman dedicated her life to improving and enriching the world in which she lives. Contributing her immense talents and time to the city of Los Angeles, Mrs. Toberman served for 4 years under Mayor Yorty as a member of the social service commission, where she was vice president. In addition to being on the city planning commission and serving as vice chairman of the mayor's advisory board, Mrs. Toberman was president of the Municipal Art Patrons for 18 years, helping promote the building of the present municipal art gallery. She is also a founder and member of the junior philharmonic committee, as well as chairman of Los Honores of the Hollywood Bowl and a member of the bowl volunteer committee.

Continually responding to the needs of others, Lucy Toberman has founded 31 organizations, among which are the Colleagues of Big Sisters, Les Amies, ABC's of Children's Bureau, the Los Angeles Supper Clubs, and Las Floristas, which combined have raised several million dollars for charity in our community. While serving on the faculty of Los Angeles City College, Mrs. Toberman raised $52,000 for needy students and founded the school of public relations. Additionally, she has for the last 18 years been a member of the inmate welfare commission, assisting in resolving county and jail problems.

Over the years, Lucy Guild Toberman has been recognized throughout our State and across the Nation for her countless contributions to community life, culture, education, and charity. Among her many awards, Lucy Toberman was California Mother of the Year in 1973 and, that very same year, was chosen one of the four outstanding members of Kappa Kappa Gamma fraternity in the entire United States. In 1976, Mrs. Toberman was selected the Los Angeles Times Woman of the Year, and in 1977, received the silver cup for Outstanding Volunteer of the United Way Central Committee.

Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that my wife, Lee, joins me in congratulating Lucy Guild Toberman on the occasion of her being deservedly selected the Harbor Area YWCA's Woman of the Year. We wish Lucy, her husband Homer, and their children—George, Erik, John, Lucy Ann, and Patricia—all the best in the years ahead.

A TRIBUTE TO MIKE HORN

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join the citizens of New Jersey in paying tribute to one of New Jersey's most dedicated and committed public servants, Michael Horn.

Mike has recently left State government to return to the private practice of law. His talents and leadership will be sorely missed in our State capital Trenton. During his tenure in the Kean administration, Mike served initially as the State's Commissioner of Banking. In that position he gained the respect and confidence of the banking industry, his colleagues in the administration and the dedicated professional staff which surrounded him.

His efforts in that role so impressed our Governor that when the office of State Treasurer became vacant, he turned to Mike as the logical choice to fill that important job. While heading the Department of Treasury, the State of New Jersey has been at the forefront of our national economic recovery. In fact the State ran a budget surplus last year, a situation many Members of Congress find hard to imagine.

I know it is with great regret that Governor Kean accepted Mike's resignation. I would like to take this opportunity to join with him, and the people of New Jersey in paying tribute to Mike and his wife Gerri for the outstanding example of selfless service they have given all of us, and wishing them the best in all their future endeavors.

DEPUTY SECRETARY OF STATE JOHN WHITEHEAD TALKS ABOUT COUNTERTERRORISM

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the President for confronting the mounting threat of Libyan terrorism. Early on in the administration, President Reagan promised the American people that our country would face up to the terrorist threat. He is to be commended for a tough but necessary decision.

We all know that terrorism is a complex international problem which can only be solved through international cooperation and joint efforts. Over the years, the administration has been encouraging our allies to work with us to confront terrorism. Although many of our allies lost citizens in terrorist attacks and have suffered a massive decline in tourism in Europe as a result of terrorist activity there, many of them refused to take the significant political and economic steps that were necessary in order to effectively isolate Colonel Qadhafi.

Our Government was quickly running out of options to use against that terrorist-supporting country. When intelligence reports revealed numerous Libyan-backed terrorist plans against American targets, the President sent two high-level missions to Europe for more consultations with our European allies on possible joint responses to Libyan terrorism. Deputy Secretary Whitehead, from the Department of State, headed the mission in January and presented highly sensitive intelligence information linking Libya to the airport bombings in Rome and Vienna. Two weeks ago, the U.S. delegate to the United Nations, Vernon Walters, conducted a similar mission to Europe. He presented intelligence showing Libyan involvement in the planning of the night club bombing in West Berlin. Although our allies took some measures against Libyans in Europe substantive actions were not forthcoming.

In essence, the failure of the Europeans to act decisively gave the administration few options to take in order to protect our personnel. A military operation had to be conducted in order to defend American personnel and facilities.

In the aftermath of the military operation, the European Community agreed on April 21 to reduce the number of Libyan diplomats accredited to Libyan People's Bureaus and restrict the number of other Libyan national allowed into their countries. A British proposal for stronger economic sanctions against Libya was not agreed to. Regretfully, our Government had to goad our allies into taking action against that terrorist-supporting country.

I want to share with my colleagues excerpts from Secretary Whitehead's recent comments about our counterterrorism policy before the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

EXCERPTS FROM THE TESTIMONY OF THE HONORABLE JOHN WHITEHEAD, DEPUTY SECRETARY OF STATE, BEFORE THE HOUSE FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE, APRIL 22, 1986

Libya is not the only state which supports terrorism, but it is the most flagrant violator of international law—in its organization and direct support of terrorist activities and in its use of surrogates, such as Abu Nidal. More than 50 Libyan diplomats have been expelled since 1981 by the United States and its allies for reasons of terrorism, an astonishing statistic. Earlier this year, Libya's support for terrorism was the subject of a State Department White Paper. That White Paper is already outdated due to continuing Libyan terrorist acts with even more direct official involvement, including the bombing of La Belle discotheque in Berlin, probably the shooting of an American Embassy employee in Khartoum and the killing of two British professors who were innocent hostages in Lebanon.

The threat from Libya is not new, but it has increased dramatically in recent months. Our initial reactions were to improve security, and to work with host governments where we faced specific threats. The response from host governments was universally good from these governments—with one exception. In Berlin, we advised both the East German Government and the Soviet Union of the activities of Libyan Peoples' Bureau members accredited to East Germany. Both governments noted our concerns and stated their general opposition to terrorism; but they undertook no actions to curb the activities of the Peoples' Bureau members. And it was that Bureau which delivered the bomb to La Belle discotheque that killed and injured 250 people. I am not accusing the Soviet Union or the East German Government of complicity in the bombing of the La Belle discotheque, but these governments did not use their influence and legal position to stop illegal activity on the part of Peoples' Bureau members accredited to East Germany.

Our military response to Libya's continued policy of terrorism against us was measured. It was based on the objective of demonstrating that Qadhafi's continued pursuit of his policies would not be without direct cost to Libya; that the United States was prepared to use force to fight terrorism along lines repeatedly and carefully defined by the President; and that the United States reserves the right to defend itself and its citizens against aggression by any state, even when that aggression takes new forms, such as terrorism.

Our right of self defense is more than just a right. It is also our duty to protect our citizens. In the months and years preceding our most recent action in Libya, we saw risks increase abroad for our military and diplomatic personnel, for American businessmen, and for tourists. All have been innocent victims of terrorists.

We are more convinced than ever that effective prevention of terrorism requires multilateral cooperation. It is no secret that we have had differences with European states over what measures were necessary to deter Libya and other states from supporting terrorism. We have engaged in a long-term effort to deter Libyan support for terrorism through peaceful economic and political measures. In 1979, we designated Libya as a state supporting terrorism. In 1981, we decreed unilateral economic sanctions that decreased U.S.-Libyan trade from five billion dollars to a few hundred million. In January, we invoked legislation that virtually cut all remaining economic and political ties to Libya. In January, I emphasized to European leaders that Qadhafi needed to understand that he could not support terrorism and enjoy normal relations with civilized nations. We recognized that our allies would have to take similar measures for our sanctions to be fully effective. We also recognized that our allies would have to make Qadhafi understand that Libya could not continue to have normal political and economic relations with civilized nations, if peaceful measures were to be effective. The measures adopted were uneven; Qadhafi's attacks increased in number, geographic range and deadliness. As a result, America decided it would no longer stand idly by, that the time had arrived for a carefully designed military action.

Some of our European allies did not provide the support we would have liked to see. However, having just returned from extensive meetings with European leaders at the OECD meeting in Paris and from a meeting with NATO allies in Brussels, I would urge that this is not the time for recrimination. We have had extraordinary contacts on counter terrorism cooperation with the EC through our Ambassador-at-Large for Counter Terrorism, Robert Oakley, and through Attorney General Edwin Meese. European states agree that multilateral cooperation must be made dramatically more effective. In the past week and a half, EC states have been engaged in intensive sessions on counter terrorism. We welcome this development and we welcome the invitations we have received to cooperate with European states as a group. Our allies have also gotten the message that the economic costs to them of allowing terrorism to continue can be very high, as American tourists plan their vacations elsewhere. Our strike against Libya may have helped to open a hopeful new chapter in multilateral cooperation between European states and the United States.

We also need to do a better job of handling the flow of information regarding terrorism. Due to the sensitive nature of much of this information, I suggest that together we devise a way of providing that information directly to members that need to know. Mr. Chairman, I would be happy to go into the details of how we are cooperating with the Europeans and how we might better inform you and members of the Committee in closed session.

Aviation security is a key strand in the fabric of multilateral counter terrorism cooperation. The Department of State has actively supported improved security for international aviation. We have raised aviation security to a top priority issue within the International Civil Aviation Organization and have established contact with all of our bilateral aviation partners to meet the goals established by the Foreign Airport Security Act.

Our other major bilateral effort has been to work with the FAA and DOT to implement the Foreign Airport Security Act. U.S. Embassy officers worldwide have paved the way for the FAA's foreign airport inspection program, and have negotiated arrangements to allow armed U.S. Air Marshals to fly overseas. No formal warnings have yet been issued under the Foreign Airport Security Act, but FAA inspectors have identified areas for improvement in a number of countries which have been rectified following strong though discreet FAA and Embassy representations.

A TRIBUTE TO DR. C. ALBERT HENSON, PASTOR OF ZION BAPTIST CHURCH

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, February, 27, 1986, the Members of this body were privileged to have our invocation delivered by the Reverend Dr. C. Albert Henson, who for the past 23 years has served as pastor of Zion Baptist Church in Compton, CA. Dr. Henson's moving eloquence has long been a source of spiritual sustenance to the members of our community, and I was overjoyed when he was able to visit this Chamber to add meaning to our day's activity.

On Saturday of this week the Women's Auxiliary of the Providence District Missionary Association will be honoring Dr. Henson for his past work as moderator of the association. I thought it appropriate to inform my colleagues of the sterling civic and religious record which has won esteem for Dr. Henson as he has labored in the Lord's field over the past third of a century.

Dr. Henson is one of those wise individuals who recognized early on that a true spiritual leader must see to not only the spiritual but also the corporal needs of his flock if he is to lead them safely to an eternity of happiness in the presence of their Maker. Dr. Henson is a life member of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. He is also a member of the board of the Western Christian Leadership Conference.

While his work within the NAACP represents a commitment to national civic leadership, and his WCLC membership has involved him in regional activities, Dr. Henson has been equally cognizant of the need for leadership at home in our own immediate community. He is a member of the Los Angeles County District Attorney's Advisory Council, a role of critical importance to the stability and the development of Los Angeles County. Dr. Henson has a special concern for those in ill health, knowing that the strength of the spirit can often be a decisive factor in the rapid restoration of the body to strength. This concern is reflected in his work at Martin Luther King Hospital where he is coordinator of chaplain services.

In religious affairs, Dr. Henson has been active not only nationally, but internationally as well. He is a member of the World Baptist Alliance, and has traveled extensively over the past 30 years throughout Europe, Asia, Africa, and the Holy Land. He was an active participant in the 1975 World Baptist Congress in Stockholm, Sweden. He was a group leader for the World Baptist Youth Congress in Beirut, Lebanon, in 1963, and served a preaching mission with the Southern Baptist Convention in Japan in 1972.

Dr. Henson has been active in Christian education throughout his ministry. He is a board member of the National Baptist Congress of Christian Education, and has served as supervisor of the Minister's Wives Division of the National Baptist Congress of Christian Education. Within the State of California, Dr. Henson has served as director of Christian education for the State Baptist convention.

Dr. Henson's skill as a preacher is nationally known. In recognition of his accomplishment, Dr. Henson has served as president of the California-Louisiana Crusade for Christ. He was honored as guest speaker for the 1971 California Southern Baptist State Conference on Evangelism. He has come to be so well known for his overall leadership within the black community that he was listed in the very first edition of "Who's Who Among Black Americans." And the State of California has officially honored his work with a unanimously adopted commendation by the California State Assembly in recognition for the service he has rendered to the people of California and the people of the United States. Dr. Henson, our congratulations to you for a life of dedication to the people of God.

MADELEINE'S GIFT

HON. DEAN A. GALLO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to call my colleagues attention to the thousands of Americans who devote their energy and effort as volunteers. With National Volunteer Week approaching it is appropriate to take a moment to consider the seemingly endless numbers of activities Americans perform for the sole purpose of improving the society we all share.

With voluntarism alive and well, we should express our gratitude to those who selflessly serve organizations both large and small. The St. Vincent's Hospital and Medical Center of New York City has done just that. I attach a recent tribute, which appeared in the New York Times, to one such person who embodied the true spirit of volunteers all over this great land. I know that to this volunteer, like thousands of her colleagues, the rewards of friendship and accomplishment gained in that experience far outweighed any sacrifices made. The woman St. Vincent's Hospital has seen fit to honor, I am proud to say, is Madeleine Courter the late mother of our colleague from New Jersey JIM COURTER. I know she would be grateful to see that her example can serve to further a cause she believe in deeply.

[From the New York Times, Apr. 9, 1986]

MADELEINE'S GIFT

You could tell Madeleine Courter had been a real beauty. You could even imagine, as she bustled energetically about her work, that she had once been a dancer. At age seventy-eight Madeleine was still helping out two days a week at St. Vincent's Medical Center. She'd been a volunteer there for ten years.

Madeleine wasn't one to talk much of past deeds—she wasn't the boastful sort. But every now and then she could be persuaded by her co-workers in the Anesthesiology Department to reminisce. And after fifteen successful years on stage, there were plenty of stories to tell.

Like the first casting call she showed up for—uninvited. How she was selected out of 300 auditioners. And how one day she was singing in the church choir and the next, she was singing and dancing in the Ziegfeld Follies.

It was an exciting fifteen years. There were the bright lights, the elegant costumes, the eager suitors.

She'd tell you about the glamour days if you wanted to know. But, the truth was, she didn't really miss them.

Madeleine was glad to be where she was. And lucky, too. Because when she was sixty-four, Madeleine fell seriously ill. In fact, she nearly died. She contracted spinal meningitis. She was taken to St. Vincent's and treated. Happily, she recovered.

When she did, she decided to do volunteer work for the hospital. She said she wanted to give back to the world some of the goods it had given her.

Madeleine found volunteering tremendously rewarding. She looked on it as the most important work she had ever done. And she made some wonderful friends in the process.

Madeleine stayed with St. Vincent's until the year before she died. Now, with National Volunteer Week approaching, St. Vincent's pauses to remember Madeleine Courter and the hundreds of other men and women who give their time and energy volunteering at the hospital, and who provide something priceless—comfort to the sick, and humanity to the surroundings.

FOR TRADE TALKS WITH CANADA

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call my colleagues' attention to an excellent article written by my good friend and our colleague from the other body, Senator BILL BRADLEY, on the importance of the administration's proposal to negotiate a free-trade agreement with Canada.

As Senator BRADLEY points out, a free-trade agreement with Canada would provide tremendous benefits to American workers and consumers. Canada is our largest trading partner, with our two-way trade totaling almost $117 billion last year. A successful free-trade agreement would expand markets for U.S. manufacturing, agricultural, and service products, resulting in more jobs and higher economic growth in this country. Vigorous trade negotiations with Canada also offer a chance to resolve ongoing trade disputes, while setting an example for future trade discussions with our other trading partners.

I agree with Senator BRADLEY's argument that we literally cannot afford to pass up this opportunity to engage in wide-ranging trade talks with Canada. I commend the article, which appeared in the April 22, 1986, edition of the New York Times, to my colleagues and congratulations to BILL BRADLEY for his insights and leadership.

[From the New York Times, Apr. 22, 1986]

FOR TRADE TALKS WITH CANADA

WASHINGTON.—The Senate Finance Committee may well make a major foreign policy blunder by refusing to authorize the Administration to move forward quickly with proposed trade negotiations with Canada. Without such negotiations, Canada is almost sure to withdraw its request for a trade agreement. But that is not the only reason why the committee should vote to proceed with the talks.

First, American jobs are at stake. At a time when many fear the decline of industrial America, this country cannot pass up an opportunity to enlarge a major industrial market. The trade talks with Canada offer a rare chance to resolve festering disputes with Canada over patent protection, lumber, uranium, tariff parity and potatoes. At about $46 billion per year, the United States' exports to Canada are twice as large as its exports to Japan and equally as large as exports to the European Economic Community. Some senators have complained that we suffer under a no-action Administration when it comes to trade policy. A vote to scuttle Canadian trade talks would make us a no-action Congress on trade issues that matter to American workers.

Second, we would alienate a key ally. Canada has flirted with the idea of a trade agreement with us for 100 years. But at some political risk, the Canadian Government has courageously chosen to follow through with actual talks. Disapproval by the Finance Committee would be a slap in the face—especially at a time when Canada is one of only three countries that strongly support our response to Libyan terrorism.

Third, a "no" vote would damage the prospects for a new round of multilateral trade negotiations. Many of our trading partners have elaborate trade barriers that keep American products out of their markets. There has been little pressure on these countries to open their markets. But the possibility of a trade agreement with Canada, and the threat of other bilateral deals between like-minded countries, has begun to pull some of these reluctant trading partners to the bargaining table. They do not want to see Canada and the United States enjoy trade privileges in one another's markets that are denied to the rest of the world. Negotiations between the United States and Canada would thus strengthen both countries for a new round of multilateral trade talks that, if successful, would be a strong new force for worldwide economic growth.

Fourth, American trade strategy will be undermined. We have been trying vainly for years to get other countries to reduce trade barriers in services, investment and high technology. If we cannot agree to proceed on these issues with our closest neighbor, the chances of getting the 90 members of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade to discuss them become remote. Yet services, investment and high technology are precisely the sectors where we have the greatest natural advantages.

Finally, there is no need to fear, as some senators do, that the Administration would use the authority to negotiate a pact that ignores Congress's wishes. These talks would not be completed before current negotiating authority expires in January 1988. Congress must pass a trade bill extending that authority, and we are free to write in any provisions we please (including specific provisions on Canadian negotiations). Progress on the Canadian talks could be reviewed at that time with just as much leverage over the Administration as Congress has now.

Canada has taken a bold initiative to improve the North American economy and to strengthen its hand and ours in pursuing a new multilateral trade agreement. Every farmer and every worker in American export industries has a stake in making certain these talks do not stall. And as senators, we should welcome the opportunity to be active in resolving trade problems.

SANDINISTA REPRESSION OF RELIGION

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, perhaps the most insidious form of repression in Nicaragua is the Sandinista government's relentless efforts to strangle religion in that country. Not content with virtually eliminating political freedom, Nicaragua's Communist leaders are seeking to interfere with religious self-determination as well.

War has been declared on all religious denominations—catholic and protestant. Churches are burned, religious leaders are persecuted, priests and nuns are expelled and church properties are expropriated. The only reason why we hear little about persecution of Jews is there are so few of them left in the country.

The Catholic Church has been a particular target of Sandinista repression. It is by far the largest and most influential religious organization and it has traditionally been responsible for public education in Nicaragua. It has become increasingly clear that the Sandinistas seek to impose total control over the lives of the people, especially over the minds of the Nation's school children.

The Sandinistas, in typical Communist fashion, seek to direct and manipulate every aspect of life. Freedom, of any sort in any area, is a threat to their efforts.

Paradoxically, the Catholic Church was an important moral force that led to the overthrow of the Somoza regime in 1979. Then Archbishop Miguel Obando y Bravo personally intervened to protect Sandinista leaders captured by Somoza and some Sandinista leaders owe their lives to the archbishop's intercession.

In return, the Sandinistas have banned the church's newspaper, Iglesia; ordered Radio Catolica off the air; directed mob violence against church members and clergy; expelled priests and nuns; seized the church's social services agency, COPROSA; heckled the Pope as he celebrated Mass in Managua in March 1983, and conscripted seminarians into the military.

Now elevated to cardinal, Miguel Obando y Bravo has tried unsuccessfully to maintain a constructive dialogue with the Sandinista government. Instead, the government has sought to undermine the church by setting up a so-called "popular church" made up of a small minority of revolutionary-minded clergy.

Meanwhile, Catholic Church leaders in the United States and Central America have rallied to Cardinal Obando y Bravo's support. Cardinal Barnard F. Law, archbishop of Boston, and Cardinal John O'Connor, archbishop of New York recently sent the following letter to Cardinal Obando y Bravo:

Your Eminence: The present trials through which you and the Church in Nicaragua are suffering are a poignant reminder that the mystery of the Cross continues to be lived in the Body of Christ. During this Lent, your two brother bishops in the United States, who were called to membership in the College of Cardinals with you last May, have often thought of you and discussed the courageous efforts you make for the well-being of the Church and the people of Nicaragua. We have taken the extraordinary step of making this letter public so that the faithful in our Archdioceses and as many as possible in our country will know what is actually happening to their brothers and sisters in Nicaragua.

We share your deep pain when your people are denied the full opportunity to build a just, peaceful and progressive society based on the transcendent dignity of each human person. We know your suffering when attempts are made to violate the religious conscience of Nicaraguans by denying them access to the liberating teachings of the Church. This has been done by physical harassment, crude attempts at intimidation, and censorship. Priests have been summarily expelled from your country. Officers of your archdiocese have been raided by military personnel and remain under military occupation. The Archdiocesan newspaper, Iglesia, was confiscated after its first edition, and the Catholic radio remains closed. You are subjected to a barrage of distortions, slanderous insults and innuendoes at home and by some representatives of the government abroad.

In this ordeal, the Church in Nicaragua has been seeking to maintain a constructive dialogue with the government in an attempt to reach a climate of mutual respect so that the Church can play a role in the reconstruction of your country. We want to assure you of our solidarity with you. With you we are praying for that peaceful reconciliation necessary to rekindle the original hope of the resolution. For this to take place, it is essential that there be an immediate cessation of the present unjust restrictions suffered by the Church and other sectors of Nicaraguan society. This will undoubtedly provide a powerful impetus to the just resolution of the conflicts in your country and in that strife-torn region.

Be assured of our prayers and support, our brother Cardinal, through the intercession of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the "Most Pure," as the Nicaraguan people particularly venerate her.

Fraternally yours in Christ,

BERNARD CARDINAL LAW,
Archbishop of Boston.
JOHN CARDINAL O'CONNOR,
Archbishop of New York.

The Sandinistas have moved against the protestants as well. In 1982, at least 50 Moravian Churches were burned when the Sandinistas forcibly relocated 10,000 Miskito Indians into camps which have no facilities for religious worship. The only Moravian seminary in Nicaragua was closed.

Sandinista mobs seized 20 churches, and worship centers were seized from Mormons, Seventh-Day Adventists, Mennonites, and Jehovah's Witnesses. The National Council of Evengelical Pastors, the umbrella organization for protestant churches, has been repeatedly harassed, and the protestant radio station forced to submit to censorship.

The churches of Nicaragua have long been in the forefront of the struggle for human freedom and dignity and are an anathema to the Sandinista regime because of what they stand for. They are truly the "enemy" because they preach the freedom of the human spirit and oppose the iron fist of repression.

THURSDAY THE RABBI WENT TO PRISON

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, during the last several months, we have witnessed what I consider to be selective prosecution of peaceful demonstrators outside the Soviet Embassy in Washington. When five rabbis were sentenced to prison at the end of last year, I joined with some of our colleagues in cosponsoring legislation urging their pardon.

Since that time, more arrests and prison sentences have occurred. One of those who was similarly treated is my good friend and constituent, Rabbi Ralph P. Kingsley, who heads the congregation of Temple Sinai of North Dade in North Miami Beach, FL.

I regret that the U.S. Attorney for the District of Columbia has decided to prosecute those violating the 500-foot rule in front of the Soviet Embassy while overlooking the many arrests at other embassies in violation of the same ordinance. I believe that those arrested at the Soviet Embassy should be treated similarly to those arrested at the South African Embassy. Many of those demonstrators at the South African Embassy, including rabbis, were not given harsh sentences.

I want to place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article written by Rabbi Kingsley reporting on his experience in the D.C. jail. Despite the unfairness of these prosecutions, the sense of solidarity expressed in the article calls even more forcefully for attention to the worsening plight of Soviet Jewry.

THURSDAY THE RABBI WENT TO PRISON

(By Rabbi Ralph P. Kingsley)

Henry David Thoreau, the American writer best known for his study of man and nature called "Walden," is also the spiritual father of "civil disobedience," about which he wrote in 1849, saying that the state derives its power from the individual, and that the individual therefore has the right to challenge the authority of the state when he believes that the state is committing a moral wrong.

I don't know whether the story is true or apocryphal (probably the latter) but when Thoreau refused to pay poll taxes in 1840 to express his opposition to slavery, choosing to spend a night in jail (that part is true), it is told that his friend Emerson passed by and said: "Henry, what are you doing in there?" to which Thoreau replied: "Ralph, what are you doing out there?"

This Ralph who has been "out there" has now joined Thoreau, and thousands of others who have committed acts of civil disobedience, to protest an injustice, not with regard to slavery, but with regard to Soviet Jewrey. Together with 20 other Rabbis—one of them a woman—I violated Washington, D.C. Ordinance 2215—which prohibits demonstrations less than 500 feet in front of a foreign embassy, and was arrested, arraigned, and for several hours, actually imprisoned. Yes, if I may suggest a title to add to the list of Kemmelman books—"Thursday, the Rabbi Went to Jail." I must tell you—the experience is not one that I will soon forget.

On the one hand, all was carefully preplanned. The Washington D.C. police, who are used to this kind of activity, were in place with paddy wagons awaiting our entry. At 11:45 we gathered across the street from the Russian Embassy, where a vigil on behalf of Soviet Jewry takes place every day between 12 and 1. Promptly at 12:00 P.M. the police stopped traffic, allowing us to cross and stand directly in front of the Embassy gates where we made statements, read from the Megillah, sang songs and sounded the Shofar. There were several warnings by the police, asking us to stop and explaining that we were in violation of D.C. Ordinance 2215 and that we would be subject to arrest. After about 5 minutes we were removed, one by one, handcuffed, photographed, placed in the Paddy Wagon and taken to the police station where processing continued—and from which we were taken to the prison which attaches to the Federal Courthouse.

It was all very surrealistic at first. The police were friendly and we were all very relaxed and chummy, reunited with old friends, and discovering new ones—all the time knowing that in a matter of hours we would be out and on our way to our homes—in N.Y., N.J., Delaware, Maryland and then Florida (I had come from the farthest distance).

On the other hand, I must tell you it was very real. There were the handcuffs—behind the back—not very comfortable. There were, after the Police Station, the real cells, amidst real criminals—one open commode in the cell which, fortunately, none of us had to use, urine stains on the floor, having an iron gate slam shut behind you in a sub-terranian windowless environment in what seemed like the bowels of the earth and feeling suddenly very cut off from everyone—no telephone, no access, no way to call for help when a bureaucratic snafu almost caused us to be taken to yet another place for further processing. Our lawyer had warned us about Murphy's Law—that everything that can go wrong usually does—and it almost did. And we were not in control.

We had a taste of what it's like not to be free. We were body searched—just as you see it on T.V. and in the movies, spreadeagled against the wall. Our personal possessions were removed from our pockets. The inside of our wallets, our shoes, the linings of our coats were carefully examined, and our fountain pens were taken away from us—presumably they could be used as weapons, like a knife.

Plastic bracelets were attached to our arms and suddenly we became numbers, not names. I was L88.

It was all very de-humanizing, but also very humbling. Most of all, it was also very moving. Here we were—representing the three branches of Judaism, including the presidents of the C.C.A.R.[1] and the R.A.[2]—Rabbis Jack Stern and Alex Shapiro, making a statement together about our concern for Soviet Jewry—each sacrificing a day of his life, a sum of money, and subjecting himself—and herself—to less than a pleasant experience. We davened Mincha together in the cell, we sang together, we talked Torah together. Prison creates a unique kind of feeling between people. For those few hours there was "Achdut," the kind of Jewish unity that, alas, has become so elusive these days.

And it's not over yet. We were, of course, released on our own recognizance, but we've got to return in time for sentencing. If things proceed as they have before, there will be a guilty verdict, a suspended sentence and a fine. The U.S. Government, for some reason, has been playing hardball. They have not chosen to look the other way. When 5 rabbis refused to accept the terms of the sentence last December, they went to jail for 15 days—as some in our group are considering doing this coming June.

There is an appeal process being pursued by our attorney—Henry Asbill—who is handling the cases without fee, but the court has refused to stay the sentencing subject to appeal.

The defense is based on two legal principles. First, there is the "defense of necessity" which claims there to be a religious and moral imperative to violate the D.C. statute in order to prevent a greater harm from being done—namely the persecution of Soviet Jews. Our defense, in essence, questions the very constitutionality of that statute as well for it is an infringement on the rights of free speech.

The other legal issue is that of selective prosecution. The thousands that have protested in front of the South African Embassy have been arrested but not charged, for doing exactly what we did in front of the Soviet Embassy. On what grounds has the U.S. Government chosen to prosecute those of us who demonstrate in front of the Soviet Embassy while letting those picketing the South African Embassy go free? No one has satisfactorily answered that one.

With it all, however, the more important question that needs answering is, does it help Soviet Jewry?

I must admit that I did not get on the plane on March 27th with great enthusiasm. I went out of a sense of "noblesse oblige" because as Chairman of the C.C.A.R. Committee on Soviet Jewry, I couldn't not go. I can't tell you that I believe my small act of disobedience will get Jews out of the Soviet Union.

But having gone, I'm glad I went. And even if the direct benefits are not immediately visible, the indirect benefits are there.

The media was present, so that the issue of Soviet Jewry remains before the public eye.

The Soviet Embassy continues to get the message that the American Jewish community cares and will not be silenced. Embassy officials stood behind their gates watching. You can be sure reports of our activities are transmitted to Moscow, just as there is a clear signal the other way when we are not there. Keep in mind that it was the world's nonresponse to Krystal Nacht which gave Hitler the message that he could destroy Jews with impunity.

Thirdly, the U.S. Government knows and the Congress knows that the American Jewish community, especially its leadership, is not sitting on its hands. Even the U.S. Marshalls who frisked us know. At one point, I heard them speaking to each other about those "Jewish guys." And when we finally left the courthouse, another black officer asked us: "Why were you arrested? Demonstrating for Soviet Jewry?" Even as we went on the way to the demonstration, a black doorman wished us luck and held up his thumb as a sign of support. "I'm with you all the way" he said.

We Rabbis did, of course, walk out of jail and our captors—if not exactly our best friends, did not treat us badly. But as we walked out, we couldn't help but think of those who can't walk out: Yosef Begun, serving his third extended sentence; Vladmir Lifschitz, recently convicted, after having been beaten before his trial, and his wife Anna, now in jeopardy because she refused to testify against her husband; Ida Nudel, not in jail, but also "imprisoned," as are 400,000 other Jews who are not free to leave the Soviet Union and to go to a land of their choice where they can live as Jews. In January, Ida sent an urgent appeal to the 27th Congress of the Soviet Communist Party asking to be allowed to leave in order to be at last reunited in Israel with her sister, Ilana Fridman, from whom she has been separated 14 years, a request she first made in 1971 and which was denied because she allegedly "may have heard something" of a confidential nature. She wrote: "Is there anybody among sane and educated people who could believe that rumors which I may or may not have heard or things said could still be "matters of state interest."

Had the brief sojourn in prison done nothing else but give me, personally, a little more strength to continue the task that some of us pursue with such fervor, and others of us tend to take far too lightly, it would have been worthwhile. I think it did much more, but it did at least that.

In the language of our Torah, as alluded to by my cellmate Rabbi Alex Shapiro, who never got to finish his thought because he was interrupted by our jailers, it was Joseph's brothers who put him into a pit, only to take him out and thus to save his life. The young Joseph is the Jews of Russia. Though we, his brothers and sisters did not put him into the pit, who is there but us, to help him climb out, and to see once more the light of freedom? God help us if we forget that. And thank God that we at least have that opportunity, living as we do in this land of freedom, and sharing as we do their dream of redemption. May we experience it together—Bimhayara b'yamenu—speedily in our time.

CONTRA AID

HON. TRENT LOTT

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, while the Washington Post has not wavered in its opposition to aid for the Contras in Nicaragua, it has at least registered agreement with our efforts on this side to decouple that issue from the urgent supplemental appropriations bill, and get a clean vote on the administration's request.

In its April 18 editorial entitled,"A Cliffhanger Still," the Post observes that, by their legislative maneuvering, the Democratic leadership offered the President, "a narrow and—to him—unpalatable range of options: One was for no military aid at all, and a second was for circumscribed aid now, some but possibly no more aid later." The editorial goes on:

"In the circumstances, the Republicans have a good case for demanding a "clean" vote, one which may trouble swing Democrats politically but which fits the realities on the ground in Central America: Contras yes or Contras no. At this point, there is really no room left to have it both ways.

Mr. Speaker, in so saying, the Post correctly, I think, assesses our real choices. We cannot keep postponing to a future date a decision on providing military assistance to the Contras. If the democratic resistance in Nicaragua is to remain a viable force, we must vote "Contras yes" soon: "Contras maybe" just isn't going to confront the realities on the ground.

Mr. Speaker, while the Post editorial to which I have referred attempts to couch this choice in partisan terms by saying that "the up-or-down vote that Republicans seek rejects a bipartisan compromise solution," and, "bipartisanship, this time around, seems a nonstarter," such a conclusion ignores the prospect that a significant number of Democrats are uncomfortable with the "Contras no" choice and may yet provide the bipartisan margin of victory for the administration's request.

Finally, I think it should be pointed out that in both our substitute rules on the supplemental last week, and in the special rule on which we are filing a discharge petition tomorrow, we have ensured clean votes on three options—"Contras no," Contras maybe" and "Contras yes"—whereas the Democratic leadership rule last week guaranteed only a vote on the "Contra no" substitute.

We are willing and eager to present the House with these three clearcut choices, separate from extraneous legislation. I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to sign the discharge petition on House Resolution 419 tomorrow. That special rule will bring House Joint Resolution 283 to the floor and guarantee separate votes on the Hamilton, McCurdy, and Michel approaches, in the traditional "king of the mountain" approach.

At this point in the RECORD, I include the editorial to which I have alluded and a summary of our special discharge rule. The items follow:

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 18, 1986]

A CLIFFHANGER STILL

In the latest installment, Republican stalwarts in the House saw that the contra aid amendment likely to pass was unsatisfactory and, furthermore, that any amendment passed would ride an appropriations bill moving slowly toward an eventual cash on a presidential veto. So to keep the possibility of aid alive, and to keep it alive in a form favored by the administration, the leadership of the Republican minority deftly stole control of the issue from the Democrats and set out on a parliamentary course intended to secure a straight up-or-down vote in May.

The public opinion polls show continuing broad disapproval of American support for intervention in Nicaragua. Yet President Reagan's weight in Washington is substantial. Votes in Congress remain cliffhangers in which swing blocs attaching strings to aid dictate the outcome. This is the pattern that Republicans in the House now seek to upset. Unlike the Democrats, they do not want a result that reflects the House's ambivalence. They want a clear-cut victory for their president—the full $100 million sought, without strings—and to get it they seem prepared to risk defeat. Their calculation is that they can pick off enough Democrats fearful of being held accountable for putting the contras out of business.

It is commonly said in these foreign policy battles that bipartisan compromise is the statesmanlike way. But the up-or-down vote that Republicans seek rejects a bipartisan compromise solution. The Democrats by their legislative maneuvering had done pretty much the same thing, offering the president a narrow and—to him—unpalatable range of options: one was for no military aid at all, and a second was for some circumscribed aid now, some but possibly no more aid later. Bipartisanship, this time around, seems a nonstarter.

In the circumstances, the Republicans have a good case for demanding a "clean" vote, one which may trouble swing Democrats politically but which fits the realities on the ground in Central America: contras yes or contras no. At this point, there is really no room left to have it both ways.

Our answer has been and remains: contras no. The chances are too slight that on their own they can unseat the Sandinistas, and the costs of the effort appear too great. That leaves the United States to rely on and support the program of the Latin democracies to build a security fence outside Nicaragua and then to pursue available ways to soften Sandinista rule inside.

SUMMARY OF SPECIAL DISCHARGE RULE ON CONTRA AID

(H. Res. 419, Representative Lott and Representative Michel, 4-14-86)

1. Immediately upon the adoption of the rule, the House would resolve into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of H.J. Res. 283, to promote internal reconciliation in Nicaragua on the basis of democratic principles and to further peaceful resolution of the conflict in Central America.

[NOTE: H.J. Res. 283 was introduced by Rep. David McCurdy on May 8, 1985 with 10 cosponsors, and referred to the Committees on Appropriations, Foreign Affairs, Intelligence and Rules.]

2. The joint resolution would be subject to two hours of general debate divided between the majority and minority leaders.

3. All points of order are waived against the consideration of the joint resolution.

4. The rule makes in order the following amendments in the nature of a substitute to be offered only in the following order, waives all points of order against them, makes them in order even if a previous amendment has been adopted, prohibits any amendments to the amendments or a division of the question in the House or in the Committee of the Whole, and provides one hour of debate on each, divided between the proponent and an opponent: (1) an amendment printed in the Congressional Record by May 7th by Rep. Hamilton; (2) an amendment printed in the Congressional Record by May 7th by Rep. McCurdy; and (3) an amendment printed in the Congressional Record of April 21 by Rep. Michel. The last amendment adopted shall be reported back to the House (king-of-the-mountain).

5. After the joint resolution has been amended and reported to the House, the previous question is ordered to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

6. After passage of the joint resolution, the House would proceed to the immediate consideration in the House of S.J. Res. 283, the Senate passed contra aid bill, and it would then be in order to move to insert the House passed language or, if the Michel substitute has been adopted, it would be in order as a preferential motion to move the previous question on the Senate joint resolution to final passage without intervening motion.

ROBERT R. GARVEY, JR., RETIRES

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, the retirement of Robert R. Garvey, Jr., as Executive Director of the Advisory Council on Historic Preservation, marks a major milestone in the history of the national preservation movement in the United States. During the past two decades, he has had a significant impact on our Nation's preservation programs, both in the Federal Government and in the private sector, and he has also played a major role in international preservation efforts as well.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to recognize Mr. Garvey's achievements. As chairman of the Subcommittee on Public Lands—which has legislative jurisdiction over the national historic preservation program—I have come to know Mr. Garvey and his outstanding ability to deal with the many and varied issues that are involved in protecting our Nation's cultural treasures. He has served our country well.

Mr. Garvey's first involvement in the formulation of national preservation policy came in 1966. He was then executive director of the National Trust for Historic Preservation and a key contributor to the report, With Heritage So Rich, which ultimately resulted in the passage of the landmark National Historic Preservation Act. That act provided the framework for today's preservation programs and, among other things, established the Advisory Council on Historic Preservation.

Mr. Garvey was the first Executive Secretary of the Council after its establishment, and in that role he was responsible for developing its system of protection, for setting the pattern to address critical issues and for dealing with general historic preservation problems. When he assumed the position, no mechanism existed that encouraged Federal agencies to integrate historic preservation values into their basic mission and policies. The Federal protective process for cultural properties, subsequently established and administered by the Council under Garvey's direction, has afforded protection to thousands of the Nation's historic properties for nearly 20 years.

Under the Council's regulations and procedures for implementing section 106 of the National Historic Preservation Act, the Council staff has reviewed over 20,000 project proposals, environmental assessments, and requests for advice and comments. Among the outstanding properties saved through consultation and negotiation during these years were the Old U.S. Mint in San Francisco, the U.S. Customhouse and Post Office in St. Louis, the Old Post Office Building in Washington, DC, Saratoga National Historical Park in New York, and the Apollo 11 Launch Umbilical Tower at Kennedy Space Center.

I have been personally pleased with the Council's advice on numerous projects in Ohio, including the renovation of Quaker Square in Akron, and the resolution of conflicts over the Anderson Ferry in Cincinnati.

The Council has also helped create good working relationships between agencies within the States—including Ohio, which I believe has one of the strongest and best managed State historic preservation offices in the country. For example, with the help of the Council's staff, the Ohio SHPO was recently able to achieve a workable and amicable process for assuring that historic preservation concerns are adequately addressed by the State's Office of Surface Mining. Indeed, in a recent survey of State preservation offices which I conducted as part of my subcommittee's ongoing oversight review of the national historic preservation program, the Council, was frequently lauded for the excellent assistance it provides. I know that much of the credit for the Council's success was due to Mr. Garvey's leadership.

Mr. Garvey was also influential in changing national policy by helping the Council to play a key role in developing Executive Order 11593, "Protection and Enhancement of the Cultural Environment." This Executive order, signed in 1971, gave Federal agencies specific historic preservation responsibilities. Mr. Garvey also contributed to the development of ideas for amendments to the Surplus Property Act to permit the transfer of historic properties to States and localities for preservation purposes that included revenue producing activities, thus promoting the new preservation of adapative reuse.

Mr. Garvey also initiated the preparation of a white paper on reasons for changing the U.S. Tax Code to provide incentives for the preservation of properties used for commercial purposes, which led eventually to the passage of legislation providing investment tax credits, a system that has revolutionized preservation today. With his support, Council staff also played significant roles in suggesting and reviewing amendments to the National Historic Preservation Act which were enacted in 1976 and 1980. Among other things, these Acts made the Council an independent agency of the Government and provided new tools for all levels of government and the private sector to carry out the national historic preservation program.

Perhaps no other individual working in Federal Government has had such an important and lasting influence on the operation of the historic preservation in our time. It is my pleasure to acknowledge his achievement and commend him for his long and outstanding service in preserving our historic heritage.

Bob Garvey will be missed.

AMERICAN BUSINESSES ARE PAYING $2 BILLION A YEAR TO QADHAFI

HON. ALBERT G. BUSTAMANTE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22 1986

Mr. BUSTAMANTE. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in applauding President Reagan's bold action against Libya last week. We have now established a clear policy on international terrorism.

The evidence linking Libya to the bombing of a German nightclub in which one American soldier was killed and many others injured is incontrovertible.

Given that evidence, the United States had every moral, legal, and national security obligation to act militarily.

I am proud of the performance of our Air Force pilots who conducted their recent bombing mission in Libya with precision and quickness, at the same time, Mr. Speaker, I am embarassed that five American Fortune 500 corporations still continue to do business as usual in that country.

The continued presence of Occidental Petroleum, Conoco, Amerada Hess, Marathon Oil, and W.R. Grace & Co. undercuts the purpose of economic sanctions. These companies are not there illegally. They were exempted from President Reagan's January Executive order mandating the disinvestment of U.S. commercial interests.

Their presence represents an important revenue source for financing Libya's terrorist campaign, according to Dr. Henry Schuler, a good friend and specialist on the Middle East at the Georgetown Center for Strategic and International Studies, five United States companies paid an estimated $2 billion in taxes last year to Libya.

That amount accounts for nearly one-foruth of Libya's national budget, and for nearly all its hard currency.

I am disappointed with the reaction of some of our key allies to the U.S. military attack. But I am equally disappointed that our resolve to impose effective economic sanctions against Libya is subject to question. I urge the President to call on those companies to withdraw their interests. Current circumstances dictate that the President implement an economic sanctions' policy that is clear and unequivocal. The President has squarely framed the conditions for future military engagement. Our position on economic sanctions should be no less resolute.

To W.R. Grace & Co., Occidental Petroleum, Conoco, Amerada Hess, and Marathon, I urge you to leave Libya. Libya is at war with the free world. It is your tax dollars which are financing the missles which are aimed at our F-111's. The line has been drawn in the sand. Whose side are you on?

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

THE NEW GI BILL—A 9-MONTH-OLD SUCCESS STORY

HON. G.V. (SONNY) MONTGOMERY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, the new GI bill is now 9 months old, and all available statistics on the progress of the program tell us the same thing—we've got a winner on our hands. Tens of thousands are joining or reenlisting in our Active and Reserve Forces because of the educational incentives of the new GI bill.

I am pleased to report that, as of March 31, more than 129,000 recruits and reenlistees had elected to participate in the new GI bill. This number includes almost 108,000 active duty recruits, representing 51 percent of the total eligibles in all branches of the active components. Over 21,000 members of the Guard and Reserve have applied to the Veterans' Administration for benefits under the program.

The new GI bill is providing an option for thousands who otherwise might not have been able to afford college or receive technical training. Furthermore, as the statistics show, it is a program essential to the survival of the All-Volunteer Force.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues the following letter, indicative of what I am hearing from recruits, families of recruits, military recruiters, and educational institutions across the Nation.

APRIL 2, 1986.

Representative G.V. "SONNY" MONTGOMERY
House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE MONTGOMERY: I am not one of your constituents from Mississippi, but I am concerned about the New G.I. Bill issue. I hope to be of some help in this war you are waging. Recently, an article written by George C. Wilson with The Washington Post was printed in The Houston Chronicle on Sunday, March 30, 1986 concerning this dilemma involving the New G.I. Bill. I am distressed at the action the Office of Management and Budget feels must be taken. As noted in the article, it has been a positive force in some of the Armed Forces enlistment.

I have a brother, 22 years old, who enlisted in to the U.S. Army because of the educational incentives offered through the G.I. Bill of July 1985—July 1988. Because of the rising costs of higher education and fewer jobs available in the public sector many young people are enlisting. This repeal would be a signal to the leaders of tomorrow that their government is not interested in "What Uncle Sam can do for them" but, in "What they as citizens can do for Uncle Sam."

Representative Montgomery please send me the names of the members of the House Veteran's Affairs Committee and any Senators or Representatives that need some persuading. You may wonder why I am so concerned with this issue; recently I realized that many of the "freedoms" our nation has fought for in the past are on the verge of being taken away from us. This is a result of the passivity of this nation's citizens. I am 27 yrs. old single and someday hoping to raise a family in this free nation. However, many of our citizens are unaware of the dire straits we are facing. So in closing I look forward to hearing from you soon. Thank you for your time and cooperation.

Yours truly,

ROBERTA VALLANTYNE.

Mr. Speaker, what we are hearing is contrary to the administration's position that the new GI bill is not needed. What we are hearing is that by enacting the new GI bill, we made a wise investment. To withdraw such an investment when it is yielding benefits far beyond our expectations would dash the dreams of thousands of America's young people and would do substantial damage to our recruiting capabilities.

FREDERICK W. MIELKE RETIRES AS CHAIRMAN OF PG&E

HON. CHARLES PASHAYAN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. PASHAYAN. Mr. Speaker, Frederick W. Mielke, Jr., is retiring as chairman and chief executive officer of Pacific Gas and Electric Co. During his term, he moved PG&E from an archaic to a modern and streamlined organization. He should be commended for serving not only the stockholders of PG&E, but more importantly the public in general and PG&E consumers in particular. His enlightened management clearly demonstrates the vital role played by private power companies in the American power system.

Mr. Speaker, whatever Mr. Mielke chooses to do next he will do well. I wish him the best of luck. I submit for the record, Mr. Speaker, an article in the San Francisco Chronicle of March 11, by Harre W. Demoro, written on Mr. Mielke.

[From the San Francisco Chronicle, Mar. 11, 1986]

THE MAN WHO GOT PG&E HUMMING

(By Harre W. Demoro)

Frederick W. Mielke Jr. couldn't have become chairman and chief executive of Pacific Gas and Electric Co. at a darker moment in the company's history.

Seven years ago, customers were screaming about soaring bills. Wall Street was shunning the company, and the Diablo Canyon nuclear power plant was plagued by design errors and a construction slowdown.

But today, as Mielke approaches his retirement on May 1, the first nuclear-powered unit is humming away at Diablo Canyon and the second is being tested. His successor will be longtime PG&E Executive Vice President Richard A. Clarke. Both men are attorneys, rather than the engineers who traditionally run utilities.

Many of the company's 3.5 million electrical and 2.9 million gas customers still complain about bills. But Wall Street is looking favorably on PG&E because it has earned its authorized return on investment—the margin approved by the California Public Utilities Commission—every year since 1982.

In his gray pinstriped suit, reed-thin Mielke would not draw attention from his fellow Peninsula commuters who ride Southern Pacific each morning.

Few SP passengers would suspect that understated Mielke, described by his colleagues as a better-than-average tennis player, coaxed one of the nation's most controversial nuclear plants into a revenue operation.

"I never had a doubt about Diablo," said Mielke, who jointed PG&E's law department in 1951.

"It would have been finished in 1974 if an earthquake fault wasn't discovered."

Although getting Diablo finally running in 1985 is perhaps the most visible Mielke accomplishment, it is only one example of how he abruptly changed the utility's direction. Many changes were subtle and apparent only to insiders.

For example, Mielke generally is credited with PG&E's move from a sluggish, sometimes secretive, rarely imaginative bureaucracy dominated by engineers whose chief interest was building power plants and transmission lines.

Instead, the utility stopped being only a big design and construction company and announced to shareholders and regulators that it planned only to finish what was under construction and then try to be more efficient. And, where possible, PG&E would buy power from outsiders, maybe from Canada, and even from windmill owners.

"It took a complete change in the way people did things all around," Mielke said.

One of Mielke's most dramatic changes was in how the company dealt with the state PUC, one of the least predictable in the United States.

The utility and the regulatory commission had been at odds for years. "We were facing rapidly increasing costs, and the regulatory process (the PUC) was not used to rapidly increasing costs," he said.

For years PG&E has steadily reduced rates. Now they were soaring because the cost of oil burned to generate electricity jumped in the early 1970s from $2.50 a barrel to $40 a barrel.

At the same time, the cost of natural gas, which almost always follows oil prices, jumped dramatically. PG&E sells natural gas for home heating and cooking and also burns it to generate electricity.

These problems increased customers' bills and triggered rapid-fire inflation that made the cost of borrowing money nearly astronomical.

"No one predicted double-digit inflation would come," he said.

During the 10 years ending in 1981, the PUC underestimated PG&E's costs when it set rates. This resulted in PG&E earning $1.4 billion less than the PUC said the company was entitled to make, according to Mielke.

The situation became so complicated that Mielke took unprecedented action. Rather than send his managers to plead for a rate increase, which had been PG&E policy for decades, Mielke appeared before the PUC in November 1981 to ask for help.

Mielke says he believes that his appearance helped initiate changes in estimating and rate-making methods. Soon, PG&E was earning the 12 percent to 12.5 percent return on investment permitted by the PUC.

Both Mielke and veteran PUC Commissioner Victor Calvo agreed that the PUC deserved some of the credit for PG&E's revival.

However, although chief executives of other California utilities appear before the PUC from time to time, Mielke never came back and rarely called on the commissioners, recalled Calvo.

"PG&E is, I think, in very good shape and, excepting the uncertainly of Diablo, they have been reasonably well managed," Calvo added.

Mielke, who will be 65 by the time he retires, leaves several major tasks unfinished.

Although the PUC has allowed PG&E to raise rates modestly to cover operating costs of the first Diablo reactor, it has not granted any increases to pay for $5.1 billion in construction costs.

Mielke's successors may face even greater problems than Diablo Canyon.

Dozens of large companies are looking at ways to disconnect their factories from PG&E and generate their own electricity using heat generated by their manufacturing processes, Mielke said.

PG&E also faces a tough battle with the federal government over access to cheap hydroelectric power that is becoming a available in western Canada. Mielke said that the federal government is trying to block PG&E because British Columbia power is cheaper than electricity produced by the federal government's Bonneville power network in the Pacific Northwest.

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, this year nearly 250,000 secondary school students from across the country participated in the Veterans of Foreign Wars and its Ladies Auxiliary Voice of Democracy scriptwriting contest. The theme of this year's competition is "New Horizons For America's Youth."

Norman Roy Williams II, an 11th grader from Arcadia High School in Scottsdale, AZ, was the Arizona winner. In his speech, he pledges an active role for youth in global affairs, as such action has in the past served our country well.

I commend Norman's speech to my colleagues. The text of it follows:

NEW HORIZONS FOR AMERICA'S YOUTH

Terrorists brutally murder 58 innocent travelers. Military officers overthrow the democratic government in a small African nation. Nazis attempt to murder a black mayor. Such is the world as it exists today. Resembling a fierce ocean, it tosses and tumbles through time, enriching some people and destroying others. Fatalists claim we have no power over our future; pessimists claim we have power but it doesn't work to our advantage. In a world of troubles and obstacles as these, existing, much less succeeding, could be construed as impossible. Yet it is the youth of America that must exist, succeed, and conquer. It is the youth's sacred duty and sacred privilege to do so, it is our new horizon.

Throughout the world examples exist that society has failed to secure liberty, equality, and democracy as universal values. In Nicaragua, in Cuba, in Libya, and in the Soviet Union, innocent citizens are jailed and persecuted because they exercised their God-given rights of freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom of free elections, and freedom of choice. It is a bleak picture that youth must face; it is a bleak picture that they must and can change.

In America, we do not know the horrors of the real world. We bathe ourselves in luxuries, the luxuries of liberty, equality, and democracy. America's youth, fresh from the shower of personal freedoms, have the obligations and the honor to protect these values from foreign conquest and to promote these values to every part of the globe where treachery and injustice feed upon the lifeblood of the people.

Since America can no longer shield itself from foreign events, youth, in order to preserve democracy in our republic, have the duty to improve the entire world. In an age of nuclear weapons, youth must reduce worldwide tensions and build peace. By promoting international student exchanges, which allow over one million students worldwide to live in foreign nations, youth attempt to enlarge the global understanding of the future leaders. In an age of Marxist tyranny, youth must free the world's peoples from injustice. Actively resisting communism, todays youth show increasing respect for the military. In fact, after years of decline, more young people are volunteering to serve in the armed services. Demonstrating compassion for ongoing holocaust victims, youth organizations display moral unity in the fight against tyrants of all kinds.

The honor is also bestowed upon youth to promote security and liberty. Nature has given the future for youth to determine. With every tragic event, more hope is placed in our ability as future leaders. To build our leadership qualities, we participate in leadership seminars like Close-Up, which sends high school students to Washington, D.C., to learn about government. To promote good citizenship, we participate in organizations which enhance our character like the Boy Scouts of America. As soldiers have defended America in the past, youth have the privilege to extend the values of the last bastion of personal freedom to all parts of the globe.

It could seem impossible for youth to accomplish this task; however, this generation of youth have been raised in a different society. Raised after the civil strife of the 1960's, we don't know of racial predjudice. Reared in an age of such activism, we speak out for our beliefs. We have been given the greatest opportunity and the widest horizon of any previous generation. While there are no guarantees, we know youth have succeeded in the past. Whenever America fought in a war, it called upon its youth and they responded. Youth can succeed again. Winston Churchill said it best when he stated:

"You will make all kinds of mistakes; but as long as you are generous and true, and also fierce, you cannot hurt the world or even distress her. She was made to be wooed and won by youth."

MARTIN SNYDER: BRIGHTON BEACH MAN OF THE YEAR

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute to Marty Snyder on the occasion of his being named "1986 Man of the Year" by the Brighton Beach Board of Trade at a special roast in his honor on May 8.

Marty has lived in the Brighton Beach community for over 50 years and has long been one of its prime movers and shakers. He has seen the community change many times in many ways, and he has always been a main force striving to change it for the better.

Marty has been an active member of every major organization in Brooklyn's shorefront, including the Knights of Phythias, the Brighton Lodge of B'Nai Brith, and the Community Democratic Club. He has been a distinguished member of Community Board 13 for several years and also serves on the Oceanfront Coordinating Council. Besides sitting on the board of directors of Vacations and Community Services for the Blind, he is a volunteer with the shorefront advisory committee of the VCB, and devotes each Thursday during the summer months to escorting 40 blind senior citizens to the Brighton Beach Baths and Racquet Club.

Having served his country on active duty in the Navy during World War II, he is a member of the Jewish War Veterans. He also raises funds for the Boy Scouts of America.

In addition to his numerous volunteer activities, Marty has served the Brighton Beach community as a businessman throughout his adult life. For many years, he had a wearing apparels store for ladies on Brighton Beach Avenue, and was an area supervisor for Waldbaum supermarkets for 20 years. Because of his extensive business experience, the Oceanfront Development Corp. selected him to be the project coordinator for the Brighton Beach Revitalization Program, a position he continues to fulfill with distinction.

As a tribute to Marty's long record of achievement, President Ronald Reagan presented him with the prestigious private sector initiative commendation award on December 12, 1985. The award was made in recognition of his tireless and persistent devotion to the Brighton Beach community he has loved and served.

For the same reason, the Brighton Beach Board of Trade has selected Marty to be the honoree at their first annual "Man of the Year" Testimonial Roast. This organization has chosen wisely, for Marty is truly the personification of Brooklyn's shorefront community at its best. As such, he follows in the footsteps of his illustrious dad "Zayda," whose contributions to Brighton Beach are equally well-known and respected.

I applaud Marty for making Brighton Beach a better place to live and offer my heartfelt congratulations to him on this joyous and well-deserved occasion.

HOUSE ARMS CONTROL PANEL ANNOUNCES HEARINGS

HON. BEVERLY B. BYRON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mrs. BYRON. Mr. Speaker, I am taking this time to announce that the House Armed Services arms control and disarmament panel will begin hearings on April 29 on various bills and developments concerning arms control. I would like to submit the following statement for the RECORD.

HOUSE ARMS CONTROL PANEL ANNOUNCES HEARINGS

WASHINGTON.—Representative Beverly Byron (D-Md.), chairwoman of the Special Panel on Arms Control and Disarmament of the House Committee on Armed Services, announced today that the panel will begin a series of hearings on various arms control proposals and issues contained in several bills and resolutions now pending in the committee.

The hearings will begin on April 29, 1986, and continue indefinitely. Representative Byron and Representative Marjorie S. Holt (R-Md.), the ranking minority member of the panel, said, "the purposes of this series of hearings are to provide a record of testimony that the Committee on Armed Services can use to support possible future action on several bills now pending and to provide a factual record for members of the House to use in debating highly controversial arms control issues."

Under the Rules of the House, the Committee on Armed Services has oversight jurisdiction of all arms control and disarmament matters and legislative jurisdiction of bills and resolutions that affect the national security, the Department of Defense, and the defense programs of the Department of Energy.

"Examples of pending legislative proposals before the committee," Mrs. Byron said, "are the bills: H.R. 3100, introduced by Rep. Edward Markey (D-Mass.), that would enforce a freeze on the testing, production and deployment of numerous aircraft, missiles, fissionable materials, nuclear weapons, and all facilities to assemble these items through a cutoff of funds for those purposes; H.R. 3442, introduced by Rep. Pat Schroeder (D-Colo.), that would legislate U.S. compliance with the nuclear weapons testing moratorium proposed by Chairman Gorbachev, General Secretary of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union; H.R. 2124, introduced by Rep. John Porter (R.-Ill.), to prohibit the U.S. production of chemical weapons; H.J. Res. 272 and H. Con. Res. 35, introduced by Rep. Henry Hyde (R-Ill.) and Rep. Ken Kramer (R-Colo.), respectively, that would express the support of Congress for President Reagan's arms control policies; and H.R. 4542, also introduced by Rep. Markey (D-Mass.), that would prohibit the use of any funds appropriated to the Department of Defense or Department of Energy for any Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI) component designed to use nuclear explosive devices in any manner.

"In addition to the above issues," Chairman Byron said, "the panel will again address the issues of Soviet noncompliance with existing arms control agreements, verification problems, U.S. and Soviet interpretations of the Anti-Ballistic Missile (ABM) Treaty with respect to SDI research, and continued U.S. compliance with the unratified SALT II agreement when new Trident submarines enter sea trials.

"In this connection," she stated, "the panel will examine what would be an appropriate and proportional response to Soviet violations and whether a U.S. decision to undercut SALT at this time would be to our strategic advantage." The panel will also review the effects on national security and the impact on current arms control negotiations efforts resulting from the prohibition on testing of U.S. antisatellite (ASAT) weapons imposed by the Congress last year.

The panel expects to invite the congressional sponsors and opponents of proposed legislative arms control initiatives as the initial witnesses to be followed by Administration witnesses and knowledgeable experts from outside of government.

During the first session of the 99th Congress, the panel conducted extensive hearings on arms control matters which were completed in December 1985 (H.A.S.C. No. 99-18). The panel issued a report on those hearings, entitled Review of Arms Control and Disarmament Activities, 99th Congress, 1st Session, in January 1986 (H.A.S.C. Committee Print No. 14).

Other members of the panel joining in the hearings with Representatives Byron and Holt are: Representatives Nicholas Mavroules (D-Mass.); Richard Ray; (D-Ga.), John M. Spratt, Jr. (D-S.C.); Samuel S. Stratton (D-N.Y.), who also chairs the Subcommittee on Procurement and Military Nuclear Systems; Robert E. Badham (R-Calif.); and Jim Courter (R-N.J.).

GEORGE WILL QUESTIONS CONTINUED SALT II COMPLIANCE

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, barring some unlikely protests from our NATO Allies, the President appears poised to order the dismantlement of two aging but perfectly functional, survivable Poseidon ballistic missile submarines. As George Will contends in the following column, such action could only be described as "zany," when considered in light of Soviet noncompliance with arms control agreements and their relentless military buildup.

Approximately 300 submarine warheads will be lost from the arsenal in the event of Poseidon dismantlement, as our ballistic missile submarine force begins its slide from 31 boats to only 20 in the year 2000. But while our old submarines go to the graveyard, Soviet submarines are refurbished and fitted with advanced, long-range nuclear cruise missiles for attacking the U.S. mainland. Surely this is not what President Reagan intended to be the result of continued SALT II compliance, but, as George Will points out, Jimmy Carter's "fatally flawed" agreement has now become "Reagan's treaty," and he feels some obligation to preserve the SALT regime, regardless of the consequences. I urge my colleagues to pay careful attention to the following column:

LET REAGAN BE REAGANIZED

(By George F. Will)

Gorbachev, miffed because the United States has been beastly to a Soviet client, Kaddafi, may not soon do the United States the stupendous favor of attending a summit. Gosh. Into every life some sun must shine, but this is unseasonably sunny. Another agreeable aspect of current events is this. At a moment when the allies are behaving even more badly than usual, the president must make a decision that can only be made correctly if he is prepared to annoy the allies. The question is: will the president scrap two Poseidon submarines in order to continue his zany policy of unilateral compliance with the unratified SALT II treaty?

Candidate Reagan denounced SALT II as "fatally flawed." President Reagan says the Soviet Union has violated SALT II seriously and continuously. And now, for the second time in 10 months, the entry into service of a new Trident submarine requires Reagan to decide whether to continue the policy of not "undercutting" SALT II (which even if it had been ratified, would have expired by now). Last June he ordered the dismantling of a Poseidon to keep below the 1,200 ceiling on multiple-warhead missiles. He explained this decision, which dismayed supporters of his embattled defense program, as going an "extra mile" for arms control. How such a nonresponse to Soviet noncompliance helps arms control is a mystery. If Reagan now scraps two Poseidons, he will make SALT II immortal, himself incredible and a portion of the Constitution trivial.

Reagan should say simply: we are no longer bound by SALT II. However, he is being advised to respond to Soviet violations by putting the Poseidons in dry dock indefinitely rather than dismantling them. This would be a microscopic protest: the Poseidons would not be directly destroyed, so the United States would not be strictly complying with SALT II. But dry dock would render the boats incapable of performing a military function. Besides, such boats are complex organisms and dry dock would amount to slow destruction through decay. So dry dock would amount merely to a slow-motion version of unilateral compliance. Remember, Reagan has spoken of SALT II the way Dizzy Dean spoke of his injured toe: "Fractured, hell! The damn thing's broken!"

DOUBLE STANDARD

The Poseidons are not what is crucial. The following is. Having ordered a report on "proportionate responses" to substantial Soviet violations, Reagan will look ludicrous if he merely adopts a temporary and trivial technical violation, such as dry-docking. Ten months ago he declared the United States could not continue to live by a double standard. Dry-docking is continuation. If he sacrifices two more submarines, he probably will serve eight years in unilateral compliance. Then SALT II will no longer be Jimmy Carter's treaty. (Carter was president only 18 months after it was signed in Vienna.) It will be Reagan's treaty. And if Reagan, who campaigned against ratification of it, and who has documented violations of it, cannot bring himself to abandon it, no president will feel free to do so.

Worse, continued compliance would release future presidents from the Constitution's requirement regarding ratification of treaties. Eight years of compliance with an unratified treaty would constitute the Reagan Precedent. Future presidents would feel free to treat Senate consideration of arms-control agreements as a dispensable formality. There would be no check on the president's power to bind the nation to whatever he and the Soviet leader decide.

PUT UP OR SHUT UP

The very senators most eager to bind presidents to collaboration with Congress in foreign policy through things like the War Powers Resolution are urging him to evade constitutional due process by complying with an unratified treaty. Fifty-two senators have urged Reagan to continue compliance by scrapping two boats. Fine. Let's put up or shut up.

Perhaps Reagan should negotiate with the Soviets a new expiration date of SALT II—say, 1989. Then he should send SALT II to the Senate for ratification. Of course 34 senators, including Majority Leader Robert Dole, have signed letters opposing destruction of the two submarines. Thirty-four votes would defeat ratification of SALT II. But it would be entertaining to hear the president explain why a fatally flawed and frequently violated treaty is now indispensable. Reagan's explanation probably would call to mind the baseball manager of whom a player said: "He does things that there is no justification for, and then refuses to explain them."

Reagan has dispatched envoys to ascertain what the allies think about ending compliance with SALT II. Is the suspense killing you? The allies will urge continued unilateral compliance. The allies always favor U.S. passivity. Regarding Libya, U.S. policy toward the allies was correct. It was to listen very nicely, then go out and do precisely what U.S. interests required. In his sixth year Reagan is getting the hang of something important: selective unilateralism.

The Reaganization of foreign policy requires three things. One is the Reagan Doctrine: support for resistance movements at the margin of the Soviet Empire (Nicaragua, Angola, Afghanistan). The second involves demonstrating willingness to use military force (Grenada, Libya), even—no, especially—without allied consensus. The third involves restoring realism by displacing the arms-control "process" as the "centerpiece" of U.S./Soviet relations. All three policies, but especially the third require a health, even jaunty disregard for "world opinion." Jefferson, a judicious writer, did not use adjectives carelessly. He spoke (in the Declaration of Independence) of a "decent respect" for the opinion of mankind. Jefferson knew there could be slavishness about opinion. The decision about SALT II, like the decision about Libya, tests Reagan's ability to rise above unworthy concern for mere opinion.

ESTABLISHMENT OF THE DEFENSE ACQUISITION CORPS

HON. DENNIS M. HERTEL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. HERTEL of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to address many of the critical problems with procurement in the Department of Defense. This legislation consists of two parts. The first part parallels legislation my colleague from Massachusetts, Mr. MAVROULES, has introduced with respect to the establishment of an Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition. The second part creates a Defense Acquisition Corps.

We can only improve the acquisition process in relationship to the availability and efficient use of a talented and qualified professional work force. We must attract the best individuals and retain them. We must give them respect, security and reward. The Packard Commission stated in its report that the:

DOD must be able to attract, retain, and motivate well qualified acquisition personnel * * * the Secretary of Defense should have increased authority to establish flexible personnel management policies necessary to improve Defense acquisition. Alternate personnel management system, * * * should be established to include senior acquisition personnel and contracting officers as well as scientists and engineers. Federal regulations should establish business-related education and experience criteria for civilian contracting personnel, which will provide a basis for the professionalization of their career paths. Federal law should permit expanded opportunities for the education and training of all civilian acquisition personnel. This is necessary if DOD is to attract and retain the caliber of people necessary for a quality acquisition program.

The shining highlights of our massive military expenditure over the past 5 years has been our continued efforts to improve the quality or our military combat personnel and the quality of their lives. This commitment has ensured our national security more than any other recent change.

We need to make the same commitment to our acquisition work force. Only by creating a genuine career path for acquisition professionals can we make good management ideas work.

The legislation I am introducing today authorizes a Defense Acquisition Corps to be organized with professional requirements, special salary to attract and keep top performers, special bonus systems, and grievance procedures. It includes a special senior acquisition executive rank similar to the senior executive service. It gives the Secretary of Defense the flexibility to assign Corps members as urgent acquisition needs arise. Finally, it authorizes the Secretary to establish a Defense Acquisition University to upgrade the training of procurement personnel and provide continuing education in acquisition specialties. It also authorizes the Secretary to send Corps members of our Nations many colleges and universities which have programs in procurement related disciplines.

I believe as the quality of our procurement work force increases, our acquisition system will be more controlled and effective. Consequently bureaucratic inertia, redtape, and long lead times will decrease and our national security will be improved.

The text of the legislation follows:

H.R. 4657

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Department of Defense Acquisition Reorganization Act of 1986".

SEC. 2. ESTABLISHMENT OF POSITION OF UNDER SECRETARY OF DEFENSE FOR ACQUISITION.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Chapter 4 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 134 the following new section:

"§ 134a. Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisiton: appointment; powers and duties; precedence

"(a) There is an Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition, appointed from civilian life by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Under Secretary shall be appointed from among persons who have extensive experience in the defense industry, including a strong managerial background in the private sector.

"(b) Subject to the authority, direction, and control of the Secretary of Defense, the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition—

"(1) is responsible for setting overall policy for, and supervises, all acquisition activities of the Department of Defense; and

"(2) shall perform such duties and exercise such powers as the Secretary of Defense may prescribe.

"(c) The Under Secretary—

"(1) is the senior procurement executive for the Department of Defense for the purposes of section 16(3) of the Office of Federal Procurement Policy Act (41 U.S.C. 414(3));

"(2) is the Defense Acquisition Executive for purposes of regulations and procedures of the Department providing for a Defense Acquisition Executive; and

"(3) to the extent directed by the Secretary, supervises all other officers in the Office of the Secretary of Defense who have acquisition responsibilities (notwithstanding any law other than section 136a of this title providing that any such officer is responsible only to, and reports directly to, the Secretary or the Deputy Secretary).

"(d) The Secretary of Defense shall prescribe the precedence of the Under Secretary in the Department of Defense.".

(b) EXECUTIVE SCHEDULE II PAY GRADE FOR UNDER SECRETARY.—Section 5313 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following: "Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition.".

(c) CONVERSION OF UNDER SECRETARY FOR RESEARCH AND ENGINEERING TO ASSISTANT SECRETARY LEVEL.—The position of Under Secretary of Defense for Research and Engineering is hereby redesignated as Director of Defense Research and Engineering. The Director of Defense Research and Engineering is an Assistant Secretary of Defense.

(2) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—Section 136(b) of title 10, United States Code (relating to Assistant Secretaries of Defense), is amended by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(7) One of the Assistant Secretaries shall be the Director of Defense Research and Engineering. The Director shall perform such duties relating to research and engineering as the Secretary of Defense may prescribe.".

(3) ELIMINATION OF POSITION OF USD(R&E).—Section 135 of such title is amended as follows:

(A) Subsection (a) is amended by striking out the first two sentences and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "There is an Under Secretary of Defense for Policy, appointed from civilian life by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.".

(B) Subsection (b) is amended by striking out the second sentence.

(C) Subsection 9(c) is amended—

(i) by striking out "and the Secretaries of the military departments" and inserting in lieu thereof "the Secretaries of the military departments, and the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition"; and

(ii) by striking out the second sentence.

(D) The heading of such section is amended to read as follows:

"§ 135. Under Secretary of Defense for Policy: appointment; powers and duties; precedence".

(4) TECHNICAL AMENDMENT.—Section 5324 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by striking out "Under Secretaries of Defense (2)" and inserting in lieu thereof "Under Secretary of Defense for Policy".

(5) SAVINGS PROVISION FOR INCUMBENT.—The redesignation of the position of Under Secretary of Defense for Research and Engineering as Director of Defense Research and Engineering and the amendments made by paragraphs (2), (3), and (4)—

(A) shall not affect the appointment in that position of the person holding that position on the date of the enactment of this Act; and

(B) shall not affect the rate of pay or other benefits to which that person is entitled on the date of the enactment of this Act as an Under Secretary of Defense.

(d) GENERAL CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

(1) Section 136a(b) of title 10, United States Code (relating to the Director of Operational Test and Evaluation), is amended by striking out "Under Secretary of Defense for Research and Engineering" in the second sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "Director of Defense Research and Engineering".

(2) Section 171(a) of such title (relating to the Armed Forces Policy Council) is amended—

(A) by redesignating clauses (3) through (10) as clauses (4) through (11), respectively;

(B) by inserting after clause (2) the following new clause (3):

"(3) the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition;"; and

(C) by striking out "Under Secretaries of Defense" in clause (7) (as so redesignated) and inserting in lieu thereof "Under Secretary of Defense for Policy".

(e) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 4 of such title is amended by striking out the item relating to section 135 and inserting in lieu thereof the following new items:

"134a. Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition: appointment; powers and duties; precedence.
"135. Under Secretary of Defense for Policy: appointment; powers and duties; precedence.".

SEC. 3. REVIEW OF MAJOR DEFENSE ACQUISITION PROGRAMS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Chapter 137 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following new section:

"§ 2325. Major programs: approval of program stages

"(a)(1) The Secretary of Defense shall review a major program before the program proceeds into each of the following stages:

"(A) Initial research and development.

"(B) Full-scale development.

"(C) Production.

"(2) A review required by paragraph (1) shall include an evaluation of each of the following:

"(A) The plans and requirements for the program.

"(B) The necessity for production of the program.

"(C) The commonality of parts and components of the program among the military departments.

"(D) The complexity and practicality of the program.

"(b) The Secretary of Defense or the Secretary of the military department concerned may not obligate or expend funds with respect to a stage of a major program specified in subsection (a)(1) unless the Secretary of Defense approves that program at the beginning of that stage.

"(C) The Secretary of Defense may not delegate any power of the Secretary under this section to the Secretary of a military department.

"(d) In this section, the term 'major program' means a major defense acquisition program subject to the Selected Acquisition Report requirements of section 139a of this title.".

(b) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of sections at the beginning of such chapter is amended by adding at the end the following new item:

"2325. Major programs: approval of program stages.".

SEC. 4. DEFENSE ACQUISITION CORPS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Part II of subtitle A of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after chapter 83 the following new chapter:

"CHAPTER 84—DEFENSE ACQUISITION CORPS

"Sec.
"1611. Establishment.
"1612. Appointments.
"1613. Civilian personnel system.
"1614. Merit pay system.
"1615. Assignments.

"§ 1611. Establishment

"(a) ESTABLISHMENT.—There is in the Department of Defense a Defense Acquisition Corps consisting of acquisition-related positions in the Office of the Secretary of Defense, the military departments, and the defense agencies specified in regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Defense. The head of the Defense Acquisition Corps is the Under Secretary of Defense for Acquisition.

"(b) NUMBER.—The number of Defense Acquisition Corps positions in a military department shall be determined by the Secretary of Defense.

"§ 1612. Appointments

"The Secretary of Defense shall make appointments to the Defense Acquisition Corps from the best-qualified civilian applicants and military personnel. The qualifications of such personnel shall be established based on levels of education, experience, and training and performance on examinations.

"§ 1613. Civilian personnel system

"(a) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary of Defense shall by regulation establish a personnel system for civilian personnel within the Defense Acquisition Corps. Such regulations shall—

"(1) provide rates of pay for civilian members of the Defense Acquisition Corps that are not in excess of the maximum rate of basic pay established for the Senior Executive Service under section 5382 of title 5, and that are adjusted at the same time and to the same extent as rates of basic pay for the Senior Executive Service are adjusted;

"(2) provide for removal of civilian members of the Defense Acquisition Corps consistent with section 3592 of such title, and removal or suspension consistent with subsections (a), (b), and (c) of section 7543 of title 5;

"(3) permit the payment of performance awards to civilian members of the Defense Acquisition Corps consistent with the provisions applicable to performance awards under section 5384 of title 5; and

"(4) provide for the career recruiting and training (including high-technology training) of civilian members of the Defense Acquisition Corps, consistent with the procurement management personnel requirements established in chapter 85 of this title.

"(b) EXCEPTION FROM COMPETITIVE SERVICE REQUIREMENTS.—Except as otherwise provided in subsection (a), the Secretary of Defense may—

"(1) make applicable to civilian members of the Defense Acquisition Corps any of the provisions of title 5 applicable to applicants for or members of the Senior Executive Service; and

"(2) appoint, promote, and assign individuals to civilian positions established within the Defense Acquisition Corps without regard to the provisions of title 5 governing appointments and other personnel actions in the competitive service.

"§ 1614. Merit pay system

"The Secretary of Defense may by regulation establish a merit pay system for such members of the Defense Acquisition Corps as the Secretary considers appropriate. The merit pay system shall be designed to carry out purposes consistent with those set forth in section 5401 of title 5.

"§ 1615. Assignments

"The Secretary of Defense may assign a civilian member of the Defense Acquisition Corps to any position in the Defense Acquisition Corps in which that member is eligible to serve and may assign a civilian member from one such position to another such position as the needs of the Defense Acquisition Corps may require.".

(b) TRANSITION PROVISION.—(1) Not later than the end of the one-year period beginning on the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Defense shall—

(A) establish the Defense Acquisition Corps under section 1611 of title 10, United States Code (as added by subsection (a));

(B) review existing acquisition-related positions in the military departments for purposes of determining which positions should be included in the Corps; and

(C) make appointments to such positions under section 1612 of such title (as added by subsection (a)).

(2) To the extent practicable, the Secretary of Defense shall make the appointments required by paragraph (1)(C) from the best-qualified civilian and military personnel currently assigned to acquisition-related functions of the Department of Defense.

(c) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The tables of chapters at the beginning of subtitle A of such title and at the beginning of part II of such subtitle are each amended by inserting after the item relating to chapter 83 the following new item:

"84. Defense Acquisition Corps..... 1611".

SEC. 5. DEFENSE ACQUISITION UNIVERSITY.

(a) ESTABLISHMENT.—The Secretary of Defense shall establish by regulation of Defense Acquisition University that includes acquisition-related defense schools in existence on the date of the enactment of this Act.

(b) REGULATIONS.—The regulations establishing the Defense Acquisition University shall include the following:

(1) Provision for separate schools within the University with respect to various acquisition specialties, including contracting, logistics, quality, program management, systems engineering, production, and manufacturing.

(2) Standards and procedures for admission to the University.

(3) A requirement that each student at the University successfully complete a central curriculum of contracting and acquisition methodology.

(4) Provision for the education of members of the Defense Acquisition Corps through programs offered in conjunction with or in lieu of attendance at the University.

H.R. 822

HON. JOE MOAKLEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, the human rights situation in El Salvador continues to be of great concern. I recently received a letter from Holly Burkhalter, Washington representative for the American Watch Committee, in which she details the ongoing atrocities committed against the Salvadoran people by government forces and by guerrillas. Her letter points out quite clearly that violence and terror are still very much a fact of life in El Salvador.

Mr. Speaker, I am the author of legislation, H.R. 822, which would temporarily suspend the deportation of Salvadorans now in the United States. This legislation was recently reported by the Subcommittee on Immigration, Refugees and International Law to the full Judiciary Committee for its consideration. As Ms. Burkhalter's letter indicates, H.R. 822 is both a necessary and urgent piece of legislation which needs to be considered by this body in the very near future.

For the benefit of my colleagues, I would like to submit Ms. Burkhalter's letter for the RECORD.

AMERICA'S WATCH
Washington, DC, April 9, 1986.

Congressman JOE MOAKLEY,
Cannon Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN MOAKLEY: It is my understanding that your legislation to grant temporary safe haven to Salvadoran refugees in the United States will be considered by the Judiciary Committee in the near future. I write to thank you for this important effort, and to inform you of current human rights problems in El Salvador.

As you know, the American Watch has an office in San Salvador which is staffed by our counsel, Jemera Rone. She closely monitors abuses by both the Salvadoran government and by the guerrillas. Our staff also travels to Honduras and collects testimony from Salvadoran refugees who have fled their country. The following human rights violations continue to occur in El Salvador:

Death squad killings.—From the period of July through December, 1985, Salvadoran death squads killed 51 people. Many of the victims bore signs of torture, mutilation, and decapitation. In the past year, three new death squads have been created: The Protective Salvadoran Army, created in October 1985 took credit for the killing of a woman law graduate in November. The Protective Army of Santa Ana was formed in December 1985, stating that it wanted to bring thieves to justice by eliminating them. It took credit for three assassinations in Santa Ana. A third group, calling itself COCOFAN announced in January 1986 that it would support the Army in attacking enemies of the people.

Death squad-style killings by uniformed soldiers.—In addition to the 51 death squad killings mentioned above, the Catholic Archdiocese of San Salvador has documented 55 cases of death squad-style executions by uniformed members of the military. The victims included several trade unionists and a lawyer. The 55 killings were committed by Army soldiers, members of the civil patrol, members of the National Guard, and members of the National Police.

Known death squad members promoted within military.—In late 1983, Vice President George Bush reportedly submitted to the government a list of military persons known to be linked with the death squads. Many of these individuals were dismissed or transferred. Among those persons on the list sent into "diplomatic exile" were Denis Moran, a lieutenant colonel in the army who was sent to the United States, and Ricardo Pozo, head of the intelligence section of the Treasury Police, who was sent to Paraguay. In late 1985, by orders of the Salvadoran High Command, these two officers were promoted to colonel and lieutenant colonel. This is a step backward for human rights; it appears that not only will military officers linked to death squad activity not be punished, they will in fact be promoted.

Military abuses against civilians in conflicted zones.—In spite of President Duarte's rules of engagement for the Air Force, which prohibits attacks on areas where civilians live, the Air Force continues to bomb in areas inhabited by civilians. The military command makes no secret of the fact that it regards civilians living in guerrilla-controlled or conflicted zones as the enemy, in spite of the fact that attacks against civilians are prohibited by the Geneva Conventions. Colonel Aviles was quoted in the New York Times on December 20, 1985, as stating that the army considered most people in rebel held areas to be guerrillas; "The good people, the people not with the guerrillas, aren't there." In January, 1986, Archbishop Rivera y Damas toured Chalatenango, an area which has come under heavy Air Force bombardment. In his homily of January 12, 1986, the Archbishop pleaded for the civilian population to be protected, stating, "The greatest plea is that I advise that there is a large civilian population here. It is not the case that there is not a civilian population. The petition is clear. That I make myself the voice of all and express to those who should hear that the bombings cease in areas inhabited by the civilian population."

One example of aerial bombardment of civilian targets was described in the Washington Post of November 5, 1985. The reporter visited the town of Patamera, and viewed three families' houses and a health clinic which had been destroyed by aerial bombing. The residents of the town hid in holes or fled into the forest thus only one was wounded in the attack. The New York Times of December 20, 1985, described Air Force attacks against five villages in recent months. Reporters saw 14 houses that were bombed or rocketed and 19 houses that were burned or demolished by army units during sweeps. At least 8 civilians were reported killed in recent attacks. New York Times reporter James LeMoyne concluded that "In such regions, the armed forces appear to bend the rules governing bombing of towns and destruction of property."

In addition to bombing civilian targets, the Americas Watch has received much testimony describing the burning and destruction of crops and food stores. The destruction of food items necessary to the survival of the civilian population is a violation of Protocol II of the Geneva Conventions.

Army restrictions on humanitarian assistance.—The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) provides food and assistance to approximately 100,000 civilians living in the conflicted zones. Approximately half of them are displaced persons. As of mid-March, the ICRC has had no access for the purpose of delivering food and medical care to persons in need in parts of Chalatenango for the past six weeks, no access to the area north of the Torolo River in Morazan for the past two months, and no access to towns south of Guazapa since January. In these areas, the Armed Forces have claimed that access is denied because of military operations. This appears to be a pretext because no military operations have lasted for such long periods of time in any area except Guazapa itself, which the ICRC does not serve.

Torture.—Torture remains a serious problem in El Salvador. It is frequently used by the police and security forces during interrogation for purposes of extracting confessions. According to reports from detained persons, torture increasingly consists of practices which do not leave marks, such as suffocation, immersion in filthy water, sleep and food deprivation, and threats against family members. These practices are employed during the 15-day period of incommunicado detention permitted under the State of Siege which still governs the country. The condition of death squad victims also indicates that mutilation also continues to take place. According to a January 13, 1986 Reuters report entitled "Torture Used More and More by Salvadoran Authorities", women prisoners are almost always raped by security forces when captured for alleged political crimes.

Guerrilla violations.—According to information complied by the Catholic Church human rights monitoring group, guerrillas committed 67 summary executions during 1985, which includes military persons killed outside of combat. The Americas Watch investigated such an incident of summary executions in April, 1985 at Santa Cruz Loma where guerrillas executed 6 captured civil defense members. The execution of captured combatants is a violation of the Geneva Conventions. Another example of illegal executions by guerrillas which took place in 1985 was the killing of 9 civilians and 4 U.S. marine guards who were not on duty in the capital city.

On December 12, 1985, Radio Venceremos, the official FMLN radio station called upon people to send to the radio station the names and addresses of "pilots, military chiefs, members of death squads and corrupt and killer Christian Democrats." The Americas Watch is concerned that the information sought by this broadcast might be used to summarily execute members of the armed forces and others.

In addition to summary executions of civilians and captured soldiers, the FMLN is also responsible for the deaths of civilians by failing to exercise proper care in the distinguishing military from civilian targets. According to reports received by the Salvadoran Catholic Church, 13 people were killed in 1985 when the FMLN shot up cars traveling during a traffic stoppage. The church also received 31 complaints of civilian deaths in 1985 due to mines placed by the FMLN.

As you can see from this brief summary of human rights conditions in El Salvador, the situation remains extremely dangerous for its citizens. The vast numbers of displaced persons, the breakdown in social services, the increase in death squad activity, the targeted killings by military and FMLN members, and the continuing civil war with its heavy costs for both soldiers and civilians are of deepest concern to the Americas Watch. We share the belief of the Archbishop of San Salvador, Rivera y Damas, that it is not safe for Salvadorans to be returned to their country at this time.

Thank you for your continued attention to this important matter.

Sincerely,

HOLLY BURKHALTER.

A BILL TO STOP ILLEGAL IMPORTS

HON. DOUG WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to give American industries and employees direct access to Federal courts to stop dumped and subsidized imports and customs fraud. My bill, a companion to S. 1655 introduced by Senator ARLEN SPECTER, is needed because the current methods for seeking relief from illegal imports through the executive branch have simply not worked.

Currently, American workers and industries—be they textiles, shoes, electronics or steel—must go through protracted and costly agency proceedings, with the Department of Commerce and the International Trade Commission. A dumping case with any controversy takes an average 11 months, often much longer, giving the foreign industry time to garner huge illegal profits and capture new markets. Forcing injured industries to plod through layers and layers of bureaucracy at a snail's pace is inexcusable. It may be good for the Washington lawyers, but it means lost jobs and shattered economies in places like my hometown of Pittsburgh.

And then, if you can imagine, if and when relief is finally granted by the ITC under current law, the relief is prospective—usually in the form of countervailing duties on future imports. Under my bill, courts could award damages, attorneys fees, and injunctive relief against further imports. In other words, courts could stop the imports immediately and make monetary awards to the injured American industry for the damage sustained at that point.

Having only prospective relief creates an essentially "risk-free" situation for the dumper. They know they can export to this country with no adverse consequences except duties on future goods. If caught, they will only have to stop beating their wife. Present law is almost no deterrent against illegal trade practices. My bill would create the possibility of heavy penalties for past illegal acts.

In addition, we must take trade enforcement out from under international diplomacy. Administration after administration has traded their responsibility to protect American industries for diplomatic points with our allies. By adding the courts as an avenue for redress, cases would be less susceptible to political manipulation.

CURRENT POLICIES HAVE NOT STOPPED UNFAIR IMPORTS

Last year, the U.S. trade deficit reached an unprecedented $150 billion. Since 1980 the number of antidumping cases filed with the International Trade Commission has increased 42 percent.

In the case of steel, imports have been steadily climbing from 15 percent in 1979, to 20.5 percent in 1983, to 25 percent in 1985, at one time reaching a record high of 33 percent. Industry losses in the last 4 years were close to $7 billion. Since 1974, 15 steel companies have gone out of business. Thirty plants have been closed and 560 producing units in other plants have been terminated. Thirty million tons of capacity have been eliminated. Employment in the industry has been cut in half. The administration rejected quotas on imports and has attempted to implement "voluntary restraint agreements," but clearly this policy is not working. The VRA program's goal is to hold imports to 20 percent, but one year later imports were hovering at 25 percent. Of course 25 percent is preferable to, for example, 38 percent, which some say would be the figure without VRA's, but even so, VRA's stop only future imports; they do not levy and penalties for the unfair imports of the past.

Additionally, there is significant evidence that under the VRA's, circumvention is occurring. Many believe that there is transshipment of steel from a participating country through a nonparticipating country, thereby changing the "country of origin" in violation of our customs laws. Witnesses before Congress have testified that products are shipped from a controlled VRA country to a non-VRA country where they undergo substantial transformation. The final product is then deemed to be eligible because it is not credited to the "controlled" actual country of origin. In products like apparel and footwear, there are many cases of products being mislabeled or simply declared to be something which they are not, to evade import laws. My bill would give U.S. industries a right to go to court to fight such customs fraud.

Finally, I have to say that the approach embodied in this bill is only fair. If importers expect to do business in our country, they would be subject to our court system. We only ask for fair trade. As the House of Representatives develops major trade legislation this year, I offer this bill as one way to combat this flood of illegal products that are exporting American jobs from our shores.

AMERICA'S TRUE ART FORM, JAZZ

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit for the RECORD an article that appeared in the Washington Post on April 18, 1986, written by one of the most important jazz critic's and political commentator's in the country, Mr. Nat Hentoff.

Mr. Hentoff has been a staunch supporter and promoter of America's true art form, jazz.

IF ONLY THEY KNEW ABOUT JAZZ

In 1965, the panel nominating candidates for Pulitzer Prizes in music made so bold as to cite Duke Ellington for a special award. Not a full-scale Pulitzer, for those were reserved for "serious" musicians. The panel was overruled by the ultimate arbiters of these honors. They took the token away from Duke. Asked for comment, Ellington would only say publicly: "Fate is being kind to me. Fate doesn't want me to be too famous too young." He was 66 at the time.

Privately, he was disappointed but not surprised. "Most Americans," Ellington told me, "still take it for granted that European-based music is the only really respectable kind."

This spring, posthumously, Ellington has received a certain degree of official respectability. His face will be on a postage stamp, part of the Performing Arts Series. It is doubtful that most people using that stamp will have any idea that Ellington was the most abundantly original composer, beyond category, in this nation's history. Charles Ives was a respectable second. Ellington's works, short and long, speak, among many other things, of centuries of changing black American consciousness—from "Black, Brown and Beige" to "Harlem."

Except in rare places by rare teachers, Ellington's music and his history are not taught in the schools. In fact, some years ago, when pianist Marian McPartland was rehearsing a large number of Washington, D.C., school kids in a tribute to him, she asked how many of them knew who Ellington was, what he'd done. Hardly any did know. That is no longer the case, I expect, at the Duke Ellington School of the Arts, but I wonder how much other kids in Washington know of Duke Ellington.

Ignorance of what drummer Max Roach calls America's true classical music is pervasive among most Americans of all ages. Once, when a black principal was taking me on a tour of a largely black elementary school in Columbus, Ohio, I noticed portraits on the walls of Ralph Bunche, Marian Anderson, Roy Wilkins, William DuBois. I asked her if the paintings of Duke Ellington, Count Basie and Lester Young were on another floor. She looked at me with disdain: "We do not put pictures of entertainers on our walls."

They sure were entertainers, but they also were deep story tellers; and night after night, taking more risks than most of the rest of us do in a lifetime, they improvised luminous melodies and intricately textured waves of rhythm that made people dance and laugh and cry—and remember what they'd felt for a long time after. And they were heroes, in the classic mold. Engaging in fierce after-hours tournaments of improvisation, going back on the road to deal with hydra-headed Jim Crow, and in time getting to meet kings and queens who couldn't swing but gave them, fleetingly, honor they did not receive at home.

Kids across the board can learn a lot from the music of jazz people, and from their lives. One way to start teaching them their heritage would be an adaptation of what Lincoln Center in New York is doing to bring classical music into schools in a way that propels kids and teachers into the very center of the sounds and forms. Musicians, called master teachers, are dispatched to public schools, where they teach the teachers—in lay language—how particular compositions are made. It is as if the piece were suddenly outfitted with windows, and the fun of following the interplay of the shapes inside becomes all the more infectious when the schoolteachers go on to instruct the kids in how to go through the musical looking glass.

There are many jazz musicians who could illuminate jazz in that way in the schools while also telling stories about the lives of these classic heroes and about their own odysseys. In this year of the Ellington stamp, maybe one cultural center somewhere may begin to help reduce the cultural deprivation of the nation's young by hiring a pride of jazz master teachers.

Wynton Marsalis, a young jazz trumpeter who has also earned renown as a classical player (to show he could do it), recently wrote an article for Ebony about preserving the jazz heritage: "The same recognition of deep human values that you hear in Beethoven, you hear in Louis Armstrong. . . . Jazz has all of the elements from the spare and penetrating to the complex and enveloping. It is the hardest music to play that I know of. And it is the highest rendition of individual emotion in the history of Western music. . . . Negroes have been more concerned with freedom and the quality it can provide than any other group in this country. . . . What is so remarkable, however, is that Negroes invented a form based on freedom, a great art form."

How many teachers, principals and school superintendents know that? How many kids?

PROBLEMS FACING CYPRUS

HON. GUS YATRON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to discuss the continuing problems facing the country of Cyprus. Unfortunately, the island remains divided despite the best efforts of our Government, the United Nations, and others. The situation on Cyprus is extremely complicated and are deeply rooted in historical, political, cultural, social, and economic factors.

Because of the complexity of this issue, many misconceptions, particularly regarding Greek Cypriot intrasigence, the interference of the Greek Government and Turkish moderation, have surfaced. One example where the situation in Cyprus was not presented in a completely fair and accurate manner was the December 26 editorial in the Wall Street Journal, "Holding Cyprus Hostage," which also appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on January 22.

The Ambassador of Cyprus, A.J. Jacovides, subsequently responded to the editorial with a letter to the editor. I think it is only fair that my colleagues have an opportunity to review the Ambassador's reply so that they may have more than one source upon which to base any conclusions or observations.

My own knowledge of the issue leads me to believe that the Greek Cypriot community or the Greek Government cannot be solely to blame for the continuing political stalemate on Cyprus. The Turkish Cypriots and the Turkish Government have erected many obstacles to an agreement and have essentially relied on force to maintain their position.

Ambassador Jacovides' letter appeared in the January 13, 1986, Wall Street Journal and I respectfully request its publication in the RECORD.

[From the Wall Street Journal, Jan. 13, 1986]

IMPEDIMENTS TO A REUNIFIED CYPRUS

Your editorial "Holding Cyprus Hostage" (Dec. 26) is incorrect both in its premises and in its conclusions.

It is factually incorrect to allege that Turkish Cypriots do not benefit from foreign aid. For example, U.S. refugee aid (administered through the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees) has consistently gone to Turish Cypriots in the ratio of 19.05%, even though the Turkish Cypriots are not strictly speaking "refugees" and their ratio of population is 18.6%. Turkish Cypriots also benefit directly or indirectly from many other forms of international assistance, not to mention their unpaid use of electricity, which amounts to over $100 million since 1964. At the root of the economic plight of the Turkish Cypriots is separatism, the policy of self-isolation imposed by their leadership for political objectives, and the importation of mainland settlers and many of the ills of the Turkish economy. The answer is the reunification of the free-enterprise economy of the island, not the solidification of its de facto separation.

The real reason for the lack of progress toward a just solution is Turkish intransigence and the systematic effort on the part of Ankara and the Turkish Cypriot leadership to impose a partitionist solution which would legitimize the results of the 1974 Turkish invasion. The Cyprus government and the Greek Cypriot side have made serious concessions in their sincere effort to bring about an honorable compromise based on genuine federation. The basic prerequisites, as President Kyprianou declared recently, are the withdrawal of Turkish troops before the establishment of any transitional government, the establishment of freedom of movement, freedom of settlement, and the right to property, and generally of all internationally recognized human rights, as well as effective international guarantees for such settlement.

To the extent that you advocate international recognition of the "legally invalid" (Security Council Resolution 441) entity set up by Turkey in the part of Cyprus illegally occupied by its armed forces, you are not only doing a gross injustice to a small democratic country, which demonstrated its friendship to the U.S. on many occasions in the recent past and which has been the victim of aggression; you are also taking a position opposite to that of the U.S. administration and both Houses of Congress and of the international community as a whole, which consistently and on numerous occasions—in the U.S. Security Council, the Council of Europe, the European Community, the Commonwealth and Non-Aligned Heads of Government Conferences, to mention the main ones—have condemned the blatant attempt to dismember Cyprus; you are on the wrong side of international law and morality; you are helping to establish a very bad precedent of rewarding the aggressor, a precedent that may be invoked by others in other parts of the world; and you are doing a grave disservice to the U.S. Secretary-General, who, with universal international support, is continuing his commendable efforts to arrive at an agreed, just and viable solution in accordance with the unanimous and legally binding (Art. 25 of the Charter) United Nations Resolutions.

My government has every incentive in solving the problem, getting rid of the foreign forces and opening a new chapter in the island's long history, for the benefit of all the people of Cyprus and of peace in the volatile Eastern Mediterranean region. It therefore fully supports these efforts of the Secretary-General and cooperates with him by word and deed, as demonstrated by the history of the negotiations for the past 11 years.

A.J. JACOVIDES,
Ambassador of Cyprus.

Washington.

THE NUCLEAR WASTE POLICY REFORM AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1986

HON. JOHN R. McKERNAN, JR.

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. McKERNAN. Mr. Speaker, today I join several of my colleagues in introducing legislation which addresses an issue that poses immeasurable consequences for the State of Maine, the New England region, the eastern half of the United States and, in my view, the entire country. I am referring to the issue of high-level nuclear waste.

One of the most controversial aspects of nuclear power is the problem of disposing of the highly radioactive wastes produced. Because these wastes remain dangerous for thousands of years, they must be isolated from the environment. The Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 established the Federal Government as the entity responsible for carrying out high-level nuclear waste disosal. The act also affirmed the most favored method of disposal as being in deep-mined repositories that have remained geologically undisturbed for millions of years.

A key element of the act mandates that the Department of Energy locate and construct one repository and pinpoint a second potential repository. Although the Act established certain guidelines and criteria which would automatically disqualify a site, the act generally has given the Department of Energy considerable discretion to develop a site selection process.

Last January, the Department of Energy announced that seven States—Wisconsin, Minnesota, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, New Hampshire, and Maine—had been indentified as having potentially acceptable granite sites for the location of the second repository. This announcement has understandably alarmed and outraged citizens in these States, as well as citizens in adjacent States.

Mr. Speaker, citizens are concerned for a number of reasons which I believe are valid—concerns I have myself. However, I believe that the fundamental concern is our nuclear waste disposal policy generally and how that policy has been implemented by the Department of Energy.

The Department of Energy is already several years behind the schedule established in the Nuclear Waste Policy Act, and, questions persist about the safety of the disposal technology selected. In any venture, it is a bankrupt notion to move headlong on all phases of a project when essential components of the first phase cannot even be met. Such is the case with respect to the way in which the Department is proceeding to implement the provisions of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act. The Department cannot even meet the act's 1998 disposal deadline for the first repository and yet, the Department is rushing to develop a second repository apparently oblivious to concerns raised about the safety of the disposal technology.

This Congress is faced with a fiscal problem that does not permit us the luxury of continuing bankrupt notions. It is for this reason that we are introducing this legislation which I believe will more clearly establish our nuclear waste disposal policy. This legislation will terminate all Federal activities with respect to the second repository; remove the arbitrary 70,000 metric ton limitations on the first repository; limit the geologic medium in which a repository can be constructed; impose a moratorium on the Department of Energy's repository program if the Department cannot meet the 1998 disposal deadline; and, establsh a commission to report to Congress on the deep geologic disposal program and alternative disposal technologies.

The disposal of high-level nuclear waste in an issue that effects all States. The legislation we are introducing makes fiscal sense and represents sound policy. I therefore urge my colleagues to support this effort.

NATIONAL CHILD ABUSE PREVENTION MONTH

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, today I wish to recognize National Child Abuse Prevention Month, a campaign designed to increase public awareness of this sensitive and critical issue. My deep and longstanding involvement with the issue of child abuse and neglect prevention and treatment spans my entire 17-year career in Congress, for the very first bill I ever sponsored was a forerunner to Public Law 93-247, the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act. This landmark legislation marked the beginning of a concentrated and dedicated effort on the part of both Federal and State governments to address this tragic subject. Yet, despite a remarkable record of activity in terms of legislation and funding for intervention and treatment programs, the problem remains as serious today as it was in 1973.

The problem of child abuse and neglect has reached epidemic proportions in the United States. Each year, 1½ million children suffer from abuse—physical, mental, and sexual. Over 2,000 children will die from their injuries each year. And this is only the tip of the iceberg—because most cases of abuse and neglect are never even reported. Child abuse is an increasing tragedy which cuts across all boundaries of economic level, race, ethnic heritage, and religious faith. It is undoubtedly one of our Nation's greatest health risks to children.

The personal and social costs of child abuse are staggering. Child abuse has been linked to juvenile delinquency and adult criminal behavior. Studies reveal that 80 to 90 percent of all incarcerated felons were victims of child abuse. In addition, those who were mistreated as children are 80 percent more likely to abuse their own children. The conclusion that emerges is that child abuse not only has tragic consequences for the child, but it leaves its scars on future generations.

The Federal and State programs that now address this problem are some of the most important domestic programs we have in operation at this time. They are programs which reflect on us as a society. They mirror a national conscience of concern about young, oftentimes defenseless, children suffering from abuse and neglect. Although our courage and efforts have permitted us to take this problem out of the closet and into the national spotlight, we must renew and strengthen our commitment to treat this abhorrent problem and prevent it from spreading deeper into the realm of society.

Every year, National Child Abuse Prevention Month is celebrated across the country with many exciting events. Since 1983, April has been designated by a Presidential proclamation as the month to help increase public awareness of the problem of child abuse and neglect and teach people how to prevent it. I urge each of my colleagues to join in the fight to increase public awareness of this vital issue and dedicate time and energy toward preventing child abuse. Child abuse is a tragedy which haunts many people throughout their lives.

REJECT ROBERT RADER

HON. MAJOR R. OWENS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, even after 5 years of consistently scraping the bottom of the barrel for its nominees to Cabinet and other top Federal positions, the Reagan administration is apparently not even close to exhausting its available supply of dubious appointees. Merely the latest addition to the ever-expanding Reagan Hall of Shame is Mr. Robert Rader, Jr., the President's newest nominee to the Occupational Safety and Health Review Commission.

Like all too many of the administration's prior selections for top positions in the Labor Department, Mr. Rader's chief qualification for office is apparently his great experience in fighting to undermine the very laws he will be responsible for overseeing. A prominent Texas attorney, Mr. Rader specializes in providing advice, comfort, and an ardent legal defense to corporations who find themselves on the wrong side of Federal labor and health and safety laws. He has, throughout his career, proven a notably bitter opponent of OSHA and other Government efforts to protect the health and safety of American workers.

Considered in the context of other Reagan appointees to the Labor Department, none of this, unfortunately, seems all that extraordinary. Recent news reports, however, indicate that Mr. Rader is indeed someone special. He is not just another run-of-the-mill right-wing ideologue; he is an ideologue who will stop at nothing, not even deceit, to ensure that his will prevails. In its April 17 edition, the Washington Post reports that in 1984 Mr. Rader was sanctioned and fined $3,000 by a Federal judge for grossly misrepresenting the facts in a lawsuit he was trying in U.S. District Court. It seems that in his capacity as defense counsel for a Texas firm accused and later found guilty of racial discrimination, Mr. Rader did everything within his power to suppress evidence that was sought by the plaintiffs, evading and ignoring the judge's discovery order for nearly 3 years. When the frustrated judge finally convened a hearing to consider issuing a contempt citation against Mr. Rader's clients, Mr. Rader brought the hearing to a halt by suddenly producing several cardboard boxes stuffed with papers, indicating to the judge that, here at last, were the long-sought-after documents. The judge took Mr. Rader at his word, only to discover some days later that he had been the victim of a clever ruse: not one of the requested documents was still anywhere to be found among the reams of paper that Mr. Rader had so dramatically produced for the court.

In the end, Mr. Rader's elaborate efforts to obstruct the trial's discovery process proved unsuccessful. The plaintiffs not only eventually managed to get their hands on the evidence that Mr. Rader went to such great lengths to deny them, but they then went on to win their case against Mr. Rader's clients. The trial's end and Mr. Rader's departure from the courtroom was apparently a source of great relief to the judge, who described Mr. Rader's conduct throughout the proceedings as "obstinately disobedient," "indifferent and disrespectful to established rules of procedure," and finally, a "perversion."

Although I imagine that Robert Rader's slick courtroom mendacity might be considered nothing short of heroic in some right-wing circles in Washington, I think most Americans would agree that honesty and respect for the law should be one basic and nonnegotiable requirement for appointment to any Federal office. For members of the Occupational Safety and Health Review Commission, in particular, personal integrity is not just a matter of principle—it is all too literally a matter of life or death. The Review Commission is not a patronage dumping ground for the party faithful; as an adjudicatory agency responsible for reviewing appeals of OSHA citations, its decisions have a direct impact on the health and lives of thousands of working Americans every year. That Mr. Rader would come to the Commission with an ideological axe to grind is bad enough; that he would also bring with him a habit of stooping to falsehoods to support his ideas is completely unacceptable.

During the next few weeks, the Members of the other body will be asked to vote on Robert Rader's fitness to serve on the OSH Review Commission. Though some Members may be understandably reluctant to unleash this man on the Federal judiciary again, they clearly have no alternative but to reject his nomination to such a sensitive position. No man as contemptuous of the truth as Mr. Rader has any business participating in decisionmaking that is so vital to the health and well-being of the American people.

NUCLEAR WASTE POLICY REFORM AMENDMENTS ACT

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation, the Nuclear Waste Policy Reform Amendments Act of 1986, along with Congressman MCKERNAN and 20 other Members of this body. This legislation concerns the conduct of the Department of Energy (DOE) with respect to its selection process for crystalline sites and consideration for a second high-level waste repository.

Last January, DOE announced that seven States, including Maine, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, and New Hampshire, are on DOE's list as "potentially acceptable sites" to store high-level radioactive wastes. These States are now directly affected by DOE's conduct under the general mandates of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982. The selection guidelines established administratively by DOE give me cause for concern because I believe these guidelines run contrary to the intent of the act.

As a result of flaws in this selection process, serious factors, including the transporting of the high-level wastes and the proximity of a site to highly populated areas and water supplies, have been pushed back to a secondary status. By ignoring these and other obviously important factors early in the selection process, Maine and other States may have to endure many years of pain and live with this skewed determination system. For the citizens of these States, the agony is real, and the implications are very serious. Because the safe disposal of these wastes is so very essential, and because there is no room for error, I believe legislation is needed to amend the act to address these serious deficiencies. I don't have any confidence that the current approach taken by DOE's Office of Civilian Radioactive Waste Management will produce a safe storage site.

The bill I am introducing today has several essential components designed to call a halt on the selection process now underway for the second repository. This bill also calls for a moratorium in 1998 if the timetable for the first repository hasn't been met, since that would demonstrate DOE's failure to administer its program with any effectiveness.

In sum, this legislation terminates all Federal activities with respect to a second repository; removes the arbitrary 70,000 metric-ton limitation on the first repository; imposes a moratorium on DOE's repository program if the act's 1998 disposal deadline cannot be met; and during the moratorium period, establishes an independent review commission to report to Congress on the deep geologic disposal program, and the merits of alternative disposal technologies.

Mr. Speaker, because the Department has failed in its administrative responsibilities, Congress must move forward with corrective legislation. There are many questions that still need to be answered about nuclear waste storage, and for the seven States now on DOE's candidate list, the errors in the process clearly call for a logical response.

THE NATIONAL COOPERATIVE BUSINESS ASSOCIATION

HON. VIC FAZIO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, when an organization starts its 70th year of service to a major portion of the American population, I feel special recognition is in order. The National Cooperative Business Association [NCBA], founded in 1916 as the Cooperative League of the USA [CLUSA], has just entered into its 70th year serving more than 58 million Americans who are members of cooperatives. The noteworthy accomplishments and ongoing efforts of this fine organization are a credit to its board, staff, and membership.

The National Cooperative Business Association is a membership and trade association representing America's cooperative business community. The NCBA, of which Morgan Williams is president and chief executive officer, serves as a chamber of commerce for cooperative businesses representing the unique and mutual needs of the various industries which make up the grand spectrum of cooperatives.

Membership includes farm supply, agricultural marketing, insurance, banking, housing, health care, consumer goods and services, student, credit union, worker, fishery, rural electric, telephone, State association, and other types of cooperatives. In addition, the National Cooperative Business Association represents all American cooperatives as the U.S. representative to the International Cooperative Alliance, a worldwide organization based in Geneva, Switzerland which is a coalition of cooperatives in 72 countries, speaking for over 499 million people.

The program of the National Cooperative Business Association includes:

Supporting the development, expansion and interconnection of cooperative businesses in the United States;

Representing the cooperative business community in Washington, DC through legislative policy and regulatory advocacy before Congress and Federal agencies;

Development, building, and providing technical assistance to cooperative businesses in the developing world;

Representing American cooperatives in the world's cooperative business community through membership and active participation in the International Cooperative Alliance [ICA], headquartered in Geneva, Switzerland;

Promoting and developing international commerce, banking, insurance, trade, joint ventures, and other business interconnections by and among the world's cooperatives.

There is much more, Mr. Speaker. Over the years, the National Cooperative Business Association has developed a number of related entities that pursue specific missions in close coordination with the association. They include the National Cooperative Business Foundation, the National Cooperative Business Political Action Committee, the Cooperative Hall of Fame and Historical Society, the National Cooperative Business Institute and Cooperative Business International [CBI sm].

NCBA has played a prominent role in the founding of two well-known organizations in the cooperative business world, such as Cooperatives for American Relief Everywhere [CARE] and the National Cooperative Bank [NCB].

Currently the NCBA International Division is implementing 11 long-term programs focusing on agribusiness development and cooperative education and training. Programs are underway in India, Indonesia, Equatorial Guinea, Niger, Rwanda, Haiti, Jamaica, Guatemala, and Peru.

Cooperative Business International, a subsidiary of NCBA, is holding CO-EXPO in San Francisco, in July 1986. This will be the first trade show which will bring together cooperatives and other businesses from all over the world to learn about each other and explore opportunities for trading with each other.

The National Cooperative Business Association is holding its 1986 annual meeting here in Washington on April 28 through May 1.

I know my colleagues join me in congratulating the National Cooperative Business Association for 70 years of dedicated service to America's cooperative and wishing the NCBA well in its endeavors over the next 70 years.

RECOGNIZING EDYTHE GUTMAN

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to bring to the attention of my colleagues the outstanding work of Edythe Deiches Gutman.

Edythe Deiches Gutman is a social worker who works with everybody from anorexics to senior citizens. On any one day Edythe can be seen in any number of places. While the problems that she deals with may vary, one thing is the same; she treats everybody equally. No problem is considered too trivial for Edythe's compassion and quick mind.

Edythe has been at this very demanding work for 36 years. Ten years ago she helped form the first center for the elderly in East Brunswick and now she is trying to build support for a center for teenagers. Additionally, Edythe was recently profiled in the New York Times and was presented with the New Jersey Social Worker of the Year Award.

While she may not get the monetary rewards that she deserves, we recognize her tremendous contributions that she makes to the community and hope that she makes many more.

SOUTH KOREAN TRADE MISSION

HON. THOMAS J. BLILEY, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw attention to the presence in Washington this week of a Republic of Korea trade mission seeking to promote trade between our two nations and making publicity stops in several cities where they have purchased American goods.

The reason that I think this mission needs to be brought to light is the continued refusal of the Korean Government to even face the issue of their protectionist laws dealing with American tobacco products. I have met with Korean Government officials several times. I have written the Korean Government letters. And I have asked our U.S. Trade Representative to to raise the issue with the Korean Government. Despite these many entreaties over several years, no progress whatsoever has been made.

It is a fact that it is a crime to possess an American cigarette in the Republic of Korea. Their internal industry is so protected and the government control so pervasive that no crack in the armor of total restriction can be found. This is wrong and it is certainly not in keeping with the spirit of free trade and friendly cooperation between allies.

I received some assurances that the Korean Legislature would address their restrictive tobacco trade laws this year. I am sorry to say that the legislature has now adjourned and the issue was not even discussed.

The Korean Government seeks American support. They ask for economic aid. They ask for and accept military aid. They welcome our troops to protect them from invasion from the north. The Korean Government seeks favorable trade relations with the United States and has a large trade surplus with us. Now they have a trade mission in the United States promoting their markets and seeking reciprocal trade. Well I, for one, am tired of one-way trade. I am tired of one-way alliances. And most certainly I would like to tell this Congress and the Korean Government that I will not be able to stand idly by and see a foreign country ask for favorable treatment and military protection while refusing to even consider opening their internal markets to American products. In the near future, I will be forced to take action if the Korean Government continues its current attitude.

THE MARCHING SEASON

HON. BRIAN J. DONNELLY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, Today I rise to share with my colleagues an article from the May issue of the Atlantic Monthly regarding the Hillsborough Agreement. This article effectively lays out the many difficulties that lie ahead. I recommend its reading for those who are supportive of the Anglo-Irish Agreement.

ULSTER—THE MARCHING SEASON

WHETHER NORTHERN IRELAND'S PROTESTANTS WILL ACCEPT THE RECENT ANGLO-IRISH AGREEMENT WILL BECOME APPARENT IN THE NEXT FEW MONTHS

(By Padraig O'Malley)

Last November the British prime minister, Margaret Thatcher, and her Irish counterpart, Garret FitzGerald, met at Hillsborough Castle, in Northern Ireland, to conclude the business they had embarked on eighteen months earlier—namely, crafting some sort of bilateral arrangements that would reduce the level of alienation among Catholics in Northern Ireland, undermine support for Sinn Fein (the political arm of the Irish Republican Army), and put constitutional politics back on track in Ulster. Over the protests of Protestant Unionists—diehard supporters of the union of Northern Ireland and Great Britain in its present form—FitzGerald and Thatcher affixed their signatures to an "Agreement between the Government of Ireland and the Government of the United Kingdom" that effectively gives Dublin a say in Northern Ireland's internal affairs. Within a week the Hillsborough Agreement was ratified by the Irish Parliament in Dublin. Within another week the British Parliament at Westminster overwhelmingly followed suit. Protestants in Northern Ireland, however, have vowed to undermine the treaty—by whatever means they can.

The Hillsborough Agreement is succinct, its brevity almost concealing the craftsmanship that went into its wording. First, both governments affirmed that any change in the status of Northern Ireland (for example, incorporation by the Republic of Ireland) would come about only with the consent of a majority of the people of Northern Ireland. Both governments recognized that at present the Protestant (mainly Unionist) majority wished for no change in its status. And both governments promised to introduce and support in their respective Parliaments legislation to secure a united Ireland if in the future a majority of the people in Northern Ireland were clearly to wish for and formally to consent to the establishment of a united Ireland.

Second, the two governments agreed to set up an Intergovernmental Conference that would be jointly chaired by the British secretary of state for Northern Ireland, currently Tom King, and a "Permanent Irish Ministerial Representative"—at present the minister for foreign affairs, Peter Barry. The functions of the conference would pertain both to Northern Ireland and to relations between Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland, specifically with regard to political matters, security arrangements, the administration of justice, and the promotion of cross-border cooperation. A provision specifying that "determined efforts shall be made through the Conference to resolve any differences"—a binding legal obligation with precedent in international law—ensures that the Irish government's role is more than merely consultative (even though less than fully executive).

Third, both London and Dublin supported the idea of a "devolved" government, to deal with a range of matters within Northern Ireland, that would command "widespread acceptance throughout the community." Since 1972 when Britain abolished the Northern Island government amid renewed sectarian strife, the six counties have been ruled directly from London; "devolution" refers to the re-establishment of a provincial governing authority. Should this occur, Dublin would nevertheless retain a say in certain areas affecting the interests of the Catholic minority (such as security arrangements and human rights). If devolution does not come to pass, then Dublin will continue to have a say in all matters that affect Catholics.

Whether or not the Hillsborough Agreement works, there can be no doubt of its historic significance. For the first time since 1920, when the partition of Ireland occurred, the British government explicitly recognizes that the Republic of Ireland has at least a limited role to play in the governance of Northern Ireland. This constitutes an implicit acknowledgement that the partition of Ireland has been, in political and social terms, a failure. For its part, the Irish government explicitly accepts the fact that Northern Ireland will remain within the United Kingdom as long as that is the wish of a majority of the people there. This amounts to an implicit acknowledgement that unification is an aspiration, not an inevitability. Hillsborough therefore represents a quid pro quo of sorts. In exchange for the Irish government's recognition that a majority of the people of Northern Ireland have the right to say no to a united Ireland, the British government was prepared to give the Irish government some influence in Northern Ireland in areas relating to the aspirations, interests, and identity of the Catholic minority. It was prepared to accept, in other words, what has come to be called an Irish Dimension (meaning, at the very least, an institutional link between Belfast and Dublin) in Ulster's future.

Ultimately, of course, the Hillsborough Agreement will be judged on the extent to which it achieves its avowed aims—that is, the extent to which it promotes peace and stability in Northern Ireland (where some 16,000 British troops are now stationed, and where political violence has claimed more than 2,500 lives during the past decade and a half) and helps to reconcile the Protestant and Catholic communities (with their divergent but legitimate interests and traditions). The notion that these aims can be achieved, however, was the product of explicit and implicit assumptions on the part of both Dublin and London—assumption that are, perhaps, not entirely tenable.

The explicit assumption was that if the alienation in the Catholic community in Northern Ireland—the result most immediately of the British government's security policies and its administration of the judicial system—went beyond a certain point, the adverse consequences for constitutional politics on the island as a whole would be not only serious but potentially irreversible. Garret FitzGerald made this point to Margaret Thatcher when they met at Chequers, the British Prime Minister's country residence, in November of 1983. The meeting came a few months after the ultranationlist Sinn Fein party, which advocates the unification of Ireland by force, if necessary, secured 43 percent of the Catholic vote in Northern Ireland in the British general elections. (Northern Ireland is represented at Westminster by seventeen members of Parliament.) The implicit assumption was that even if there were initial widespread opposition in the Protestant community to whatever agreement the two governments came to, it would subside when the benefits of such an agreement, in the form of a lower level of violence and the formal international guarantee of the Unionists' constitutional position, became apparent to a majority of Protestants.

In sum, according to the logic that prevailed, the existing level of alienation in the Catholic community was such as to require new political arrangements in the short run to alleviate it, whereas the possible level of alienation in the Protestant community was thought to be containable in the long run.

The problem here, of course, is with the nature of the alienation itself. In Northern Ireland it takes many forms. Most obvious is the alienation between Catholics and Protestants—a conflict whose roots lie in England's deliberate introduction of Protestant colonists to Ireland's northeastern counties during the early seventeenth century. (The "plantation" took place because Ulster was the most rebellious of Ireland's provinces; ironically, thanks to the plantation, it still is.) However, within the Catholic community itself there is alienation between supporters of the Social Democratic and Labour Party (the moderate voice of constitutional nationalism) and supporters of Sinn Fein (the extremist voice of unconstitutional nationalism). Similarly, within the Protestant community there are divisions—patched over, if only temporarily, since Hillsborough—between supporters of the Official Unionist Party (who want above all else to maintain the union with Britain) and supporters of the Democratic Unionist Party (who want above all else not to become part of an all-Ireland state). In addition, both Catholics and Protestants, albeit to somewhat differing degrees, are alienated from the institutions of government. And both communities, albeit again to somewhat differing degrees, are alienated from their respective mentor states: the Republic of Ireland and Great Britain.

Unfortunately, even if new political arrangements successfully address Catholic concerns and even if support for Sinn Fein begins to diminish, this is no guarantee of peace, stability, or a reduced level of alienation between Catholics and Protestants. On the contrary, it is quite possible that reforms will have an effect opposite the one intended. Reforms in the judiciary, in the Royal Ulster Constabulary (Northern Ireland's police force, which is now almost exclusively Protestant), and in the Ulster Defence Regiment (a British Army unit recruited exclusively in Northern Ireland and which is also almost exclusively Protestant) may indeed wean Nationalist votes away from Sinn Fein, but there is no reason to believe that this will result in a decrease in the activities of the Irish Republican Army (IRA), whose campaign of violence to end the British presence in Ireland is now in its seventeenth year. Already Northern Protestants see themselves as the victims of a calculatedly cold-blooded campaign of genocide conducted by the IRA. If the IRA is able to maintain its campaign of violence at the current level, the very real possibility is that each new killing of a member of the Constabulary or the Defence Regiment will strengthen the conviction of the Protestants that reforms only facilitate and encourage the IRA death machine.

If the number of Defence Regiment and Constabulary personnel who are killed does not fall, then the resulting alienation of the Protestants could paralyze the functioning of the Intergovernmental Conference. For on the one hand, the conference would be faced with the imperative of moving slowly in the area of reform in order to placate the Protestants, while on the other hand, it would continue to be faced with the imperative of moving quickly in order to shore up whatever support it had won in the Catholic community. These dual imperatives—the simultaneous needs to pull back and push forward—would lead to stalemate and inevitable breakdown.

The IRA's potential role as spoilers is the crucial difference between the Protestant campaign in 1974 to bring down the Sunningdale Agreement—an experiment in Protestant-Catholic powersharing that fell apart in six months—and the current campaign to wreck the Hillsborough Agreement. In 1974 the IRA by and large kept a low profile; unionist agitation, especially the province-wide strike backed by Protestant paramilitary organizations, was primarily responsible for bringing down Sunningdale. (The paramilitary organizations have since the early 1970s been chiefly responsible for the sectarian murder of Catholics.) Today, however, the IRA is not counting on the Protestants alone to destroy the Hillsborough Agreement. In fact, the more successful the IRA is in showing that it can strike at will (which it did in Armagh at precisely one minute past midnight on New Year's Day), the more it will encourage Protestant Unionists to make Northern Ireland ungovernable—which is to say, the more it will encourage Protestants to do the work of the IRA. It is a pathetic irony of the conflict: Protestants vowing to make Northern Ireland ungovernable in order to maintain the union with Great Britain, the IRA vowing to make Northern Ireland ungovernable in order to break the union with Great Britain.

A second factor that will determine the fate of the Hillsborough Agreement is the final form of the Unionist response. To date the response has been predictable. The two most basic fears of the Protestants—that they will somehow be outmaneuvered by the Irish Republic and that they will be betrayed by the British—are reinforced by the perception that the Hillsborough Agreement was forged behind their backs. Many Protestants believe that Northern Ireland's Social Democratic and Labour Party (SDLP), which speaks for moderate Catholics who desire affiliation with the Republic of Ireland, not only was kept informed of the proceedings but also had a veto over the final terms of the agreement. And, they believe, the party has a veto with regard to the nature of a devolved government.

Insecurity and the fear it breeds are, of course, permanent parts of the local Protestant mentality. The Protestant colonizations of northeastern Ireland in the early seventeenth century were partial. At all times the new settlers lived in scattered enclaves and under precarious circumstances. Surrounded by a dispossessed and hostile native Catholic population, they were always vulnerable to attack. Initially the Protestants feared being overrun and massacred by the Catholic majority. Then came the fear of what would happen if the Act of Union of 1801 were ever repealed. Later it was the fear of Home Rule—that is, rule from Dublin, though in the context of London's sovereignty, of a semi-autonomous but predominantly Catholic all-Ireland political entity. Finally, ever since independence was achieved by twenty-six of Ireland's thirty-two counties, in 1921, the Unionists have feared being abandoned by the British—or sold out by their own.

Indeed, Protestant fears are ubiquitous. They encapsulate the entire Protestant experience in Ulster. Deeply rooted, pervasive, impervious to the passage of time, they seem almost genetically encoded—even necessary for the survival of the species. In moments of crisis, therefore, when the future threatens, Protestants resort to the strategies of the past. Thus Ulster must "fight" to maintain its position in the Union, as it was prepared to do in 1912 and again in 1974. In each instance, the Protestants believe, only the threat of rebellion stayed Britain's hand. And thus in 1986 the Unionists raise once more the threat of rebellion—no matter that their constitutional position with the United Kingdom is now guaranteed by formal international treaty.

In the Unionist perspective, the one element of the Hillsborough Agreement that counts is the Intergovernmental Conference. The conference has a permanent secretariat, based in Belfast, comprising both Irish and British civil servants. It confirms the Unionists' worst fear: the South inching its way in. The conference, therefore, is viewed not as a small cooperative gesture but as a coalition government in embryo. In the Unionists' view, the language in the agreement requiring "determined efforts . . . to resolve differences" means that Dublin will get its way 50 percent of the time. The conference is seen, therefore, as the first step toward an all-Ireland state. Reconciliation is simply a code word for unification.

To appreciate the range of possible Unionist responses to Hillsborough one must keep several things in mind. First, history suggests that the Unionists may not seem to act in their own best interests. The intensity of their fear that any association with the South will lead to the ineluctable absorption of the Protestant people of Ulster into an all-Ireland state is a powerful stimulus to irrational behavior. The Unionists' decision last December to resign the fifteen seats they held in the Westminister Parliament and to recontest them did not have the consequences they had predicted. In special elections held last January, which the Unionists insisted on calling a referendum on the agreement, they lost one seat to the Social Democratic and Labour Party (which, significantly, out-polled Sinn Fein in the constituencies that both parties contested) and failed to get the mandate they had sought.

Another thing to bear in mind is that in the past the Unionists' threats of irrational action—fighting Britain to remain part of Britain—proved successful. The threat of irrational action is a perfectly rational tactic when it achieves its purpose. The purpose in the present circumstances is to bring down the Hillsborough Agreement. It is, therefore, of little consequence to Protestants at the moment if their actions to achieve this end also weaken their union with Great Britain. They have a simple objective, not a grand strategic design. The latter, they believe, will somehow emerge once the former is achieved.

The time frame for action will last through July and August—"the marching season," when, Unionists traditionally believe, they can save their souls with bunting. Various scenarios are possible. The present pervasive Unionist opposition to the Hillsborough Agreement conceals but does not eliminate the basic divisions in unionism. Moreover, the Protestant will as opposed to the Protestant threat to fight has never actually been tested.

To begin with, the Unionists could go back to Westminster and present the "verdict" of the Ulster people to the British government. They might then put forward alternative proposals, which would be unacceptable to the government if the Protestants set out as preconditions for discussion—as they almost certainly would—the dismantling of the Intergovernmental Conference. Moreover, any rountable conference would have to include the government of the Irish Republic, because under the terms of the treaty there are no circumstances under which the Hillsborough Agreement can simply be abandoned without discussion. In short, the Protestants cannot both dictate the agenda and limit the participants.

At this point they have five options. First, they can engage in unconstitutional but nonviolent actions, which for the moment would allow them to hold the high ground relative to the Protestant paramilitary organizations. (A one-day general strike last March, called for by both Unionist parties, brought the province to a virtual standstill. However, the widespread street violence and intimidation that accompanied the strike led James Molyneaux, the leader of the Official Unionist Party, to promise that his party would not participate in any future strike actions. This was the first crack in what had been up to that point a unified Unionist front, because Ian Paisley, the leader of the Democratic Unionist Party, would make no such promise.) Second, they can withdraw from government—from Westminster, the Northern Ireland Assembly, regional bodies such as health and education boards, and local councils—or they can take nonviolent action to disrupt the institutions of government. Third, they can threaten a unilateral declaration of independence (UDI). Fourth, they can actually make a UDI and set up a provisional government of their own. Fifth, they can negotiate for a devolved government within the context of the Hillsborough Agreement.

The logic of withdrawal is impeccably simple. If, the Protestants argue, half a million Catholics effectively withdrew their consent from the forms of government offered them, and if the consequence of this was the instability and violence that led eventually to the Hillsborough Agreement, then should not the consequence of one million Protestants effectively withdrawing their consent be substantially more instability and violence, thus requiring a renegotiation of the Hillsborough Agreement? Already Ulster Clubs are springing up across Northern Ireland to organize withdrawal of consent if the politicians fail to do so.

However, if the constitutional parties of unionism withdraw from government, they will be either wittingly or unwittingly conceding the ground to the Protestant paramilitary organizations, and this will lead to an increasing number of sectarian murders on both sides of the religious and political divide. Moreover, in the event that Protestant paramilitarists mount a bombing campaign in the Republic, the impact on public opinion there might suggest that the Republic's commitment to the Hillsborough Agreement is inversely related to its having to bear any of the consequences.

The third option—the threat of UDI—is a rational action. Unionists believe that the pressure on the British government at this point would be sufficient to make the Intergovernmental Conference incapable of achieving its state purposes, that the threat of a UDI to Britain's national and strategic interests would outweigh whatever advantages Britain might achieve from strict adherence to the agreement and that Mrs. Thatcher, sufficiently distracted by problems at home, would simply lose interest in making the agreement work.

Ironically, if the Unionists pursue this campaign of resistance, their solidarity and commitment will prove the more determined in the face of a successful IRA military campaign. In this sense, both protagonists need to feed upon each other if they are to bring down the Hillsborough Agreement. It is likely that the past will repeat itself in new forms: the Unionists will split into those who will continue to support constitutional means to bring about change and those who will not. In other words, there will appear a Sinn Fein on the Unionist side to match the existing Sinn Fein on the Nationalist side.

An actual UDI—the fourth option—would, of course, be irrational, since there are no circumstances under which it could succeed. The British government would have to put it down, and the Unionists would add one more enemy—the British—to their list. But the possibility of a UDI should not be dismissed simply because it is irrational. To the Unionists, the actions that will destroy the agreement are what matters, not the further consequences of those actions once the agreement is destroyed.

The ultimate question, then, is rather simple: Would the Unionists prefer to have nothing at all, a wasteland of an Ulster, an intractable war of sectarianism, a loss of identity, and an end to their Britishness, if they can't have things their own way? Would they prefer this, even if a fifth option—a weak power-sharing arrangement and a stripped-down Inter-governmental Conference—were potentially available through negotiation?

The fact is that any arrangement that the nationalist Social Democratic and Labour Party and either of the Unionist parties would be prepared to enter into would be construed by the governments in both Dublin and London as having widespread community acceptance. The SDLP can now afford to be generous in defining what is acceptable regarding the form that an autonomous provincial government should take. For if the Unionists were to abuse the devolution system agreed to, especially one that was not structured along traditional power-sharing lines, the SDLP could simply withdraw, in which case the functions that had been devolved would once again come under the aegis of the Intergovernmental Conference. Thus the incentive to Unionists: adhere to the principles of devolution agreed to and the powers of the conference are thereby diminished; reject them or abuse them and the powers of the conference remain strong.

Unfortunately, this way of thinking is entirely rational and must compete with the idea that going over the brink a little doesn't mean going all the way. One way or another, by summer's end the Protestants will have made a decision.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, April 23, 1986

The House met at 10 a.m.

Brigadier F.M. Gaugh, the Salvation Army, Clearwater Beach, FL, offered the following prayer:

Let us bow our heads while we enjoy this time of talking with our God.

Dear God our Heavenly Father, we thank You for this time that has been set aside for strength and enrichment which are available through such fellowship.

Help us to look beyond the things we can see and feel.

Where thoughts of hope and healing need to be shared, let us share them.

Where words of consolation need to be spoken, let our voice be heard.

Where a peaceful spirit is needed, let us radiate it.

Where forgiveness and encouragement need to be offered, let us offer them.

We thank You for this dedicated body and help them to remember that which they think, say or do, will be true, fair, honest, beneficial to all concerned and pleasing in Thy sight.

You have given us good leadership in the past, therefore we trust You for the present and the future.

Thank You, dear God, for listening to us. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause I, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of clause 1, rule I, I ask that the question be put on the Speaker's approval of the Journal.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRIES

Mr. RUSSO. Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. RUSSO. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order after the conclusion of the Journal vote to make a unanimous-consent request to vacate yesterday's proceedings dealing with the——

The SPEAKER. The answer is in the affirmative.

The Chair cannot control the fact that somebody could object to the unanimous-consent request.

Mr. RUSSO. Is the Speaker prepared to do something subsequent to that?

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman have in mind?

Mr. RUSSO. Would the Speaker then send the matter to the Rules Committee for report this afternoon?

The SPEAKER. What matter is the gentleman referring to?

Mr. RUSSO. House Resolution 427, as I understand.

The SPEAKER. On the resolution that was passed yesterday by unanimous consent, it has been decided by the leadership on the majority side that that matter will go to the Rules Committee this afternoon, be reported and require a two-thirds vote for consideration if called up today.

The answer is in the affirmative.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, after that matter is referred to the Rules Committee, could the leadership give any indication to the body as to when it will be brought to the floor for consideration?

The SPEAKER. It will be brought as soon as it has been reported by the committee.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, does that decision preclude the possibility of a unanimous-consent request on the same subject?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can still entertain the unanimous-consent request.

Mr. DURBIN. I thank the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The procedure with a rule is in the event the unanimous-consent request fails.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to clause 1, rule I, I demand a vote on agreeing to the Speaker's approval of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Chair's approval of the Journal.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present. In the opinion of the Chair, there are not 218 Members present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 215, nays 178, not voting 40, as follows:

BRIGADIER F.M. GAUGH

(Mr. BILIRAKIS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, it is a great privilege and a pleasure for me to welcome to the House of Representatives, and introduce to you, and through you, to our colleagues, Brigadier F.M. Gaugh of the Salvation Army.

The brigadier was born in Springfield, OH, and received his commission as a Salvation Army officer after graduating from the Army's School for Officers' Training in New York City. He has two undergraduate degrees, a graduate and an honorary degree. He is also a graduate of the Industrial College of the Armed Forces.

You will find him listed in "Who's Who in America," and he is a charter member of the National Association of Social Workers and the Academy of Certified Social Workers; as well as a member of the National and International Conferences of Social Welfare.

Brigadier Gaugh and his wife, Jessie, now reside in the community of Clearwater Beach, in my district, and I am delighted that he could bring us the prayer today.

Thank you, Brigadier, for honoring us with your presence.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Hallen, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to joint resolutions of the Senate of the following titles:

S.J. Res. 214. Joint resolution to provide for the reappointment of Carlisle H. Humelsine as a citizen regent of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution; and

S.J. Res. 215. Joint resolution to provide for the reappointment of William G. Bowen as a citizen regent of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF H. RES. 431, AMENDING CLAUSE 1, RULE XLVII OF THE RULES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 431) amending clause 1, rule XLVII of the Rules of the House, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 431

Resolved, That clause 1 of Rule XLVII of the Rules of the House of Representatives be amended to read as follows:

1. (a) Except as provided by paragraph (b), no Member may, in any calendar year beginning after December 31, 1978, have outside earned income attributable to such calendar year which is in excess of 30 per centum of the aggregate salary as a Member paid to the Member during such calendar year.

(b) In the case of any individual who becomes a Member during any calendar year beginning after December 31, 1978, such Member may not have outside earned income attributable to the portion of that calendar year which occurs after such individual becomes a Member which is in excess of 30 per centum of the aggregate salary as a Member paid to the Member during such calendar year.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman who offered the objection stand?

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects. Objection is heard.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, is there any procedure presently available before the House to consider this resolution which would restore the language of rule XLVII to exactly the same language as it was?

The SPEAKER. The matter may be referred to the Rules Committee, and if there is a report, a two-thirds vote will bring it to the floor today, and if there is approval on the minority side we will bring the matter to the floor this afternoon.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, will it be brought to the floor this afternoon?

The SPEAKER. It is the intention to refer the matter to the Rules Committee. The Chair cannot dictate what the Rules Committee is going to do, but it will recommend to the Rules Committee.

Mr. DURBIN. I thank the Speaker.

DISCHARGE PETITION

(Mr. LOTT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

The SPEAKER. The Chair notes the gentleman from Mississippi is speaking from the Democratic side.

Mr. LOTT. The Chair has not heard what I am going to speak on as yet.

Mr. Speaker, today I am filing Discharge Petition No. 6 which would discharge the Rules Committee from further consideration of House Resolution 419 which provides for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 283.

House Joint Resolution 283 was introduced last year by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCURDY]. It deals with the issue of aid to the freedom fighters in Nicaragua.

Mr. Speaker, given the urgent need to assist the Contras, this was the only way we could find to bring this matter back to the House now.

This is a bipartisan issue and we urge members on both sides of the aisle to see it that way.

It is an issue of paramount national security importance and we just want all our colleagues to know that is exactly how we view it.

We are not—repeat not—asking members to sign the discharge petition today. We are instead seeking to meet with members on both sides of the aisle, to listen to their views and to discuss the bipartisan nature of this undertaking.

This is a procedural issue. But it is also an issue of overriding importance. We do not want partisanship to have a place in this procedure—all we ask is the chance to present our case openly and with a fair chance for all sides.

SUMMARY OF SPECIAL DISCHARGE RULE ON CONTRA AID

(H. Res. 419, Rep. Lott and Rep. Michel, April 14, 1986)

1. Immediately upon the adoption of the rule, the House would resolve into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of H.J. Res. 283, to promote internal reconciliation in Nicaragua on the basis of democratic principles and to further peaceful resolution of the conflict in Central America.

[NOTE: H.J. Res. 283 was introduced by Rep. David McCurdy on May 8, 1985 with 10 cosponsors, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, Foreign Affairs, Intelligence and Rules.]

2. The joint resolution would be subject to two hours of general debate divided between the majority and minority leaders.

3. All points of order are waived against the consideration of the joint resolution.

4. The rule makes in order the following amendments in the nature of a substitute to be offered only in the following order, waives all points of order against them, makes them in order even if a previous amendment has been adopted, prohibited any amendments to the amendments or a division of the question in the House or in the Committee of the Whole, and provides one hour of debate on each, divided between the proponent and an opponent: (1) an amendment printed in the Congressional Record by May 7th by Rep. Hamilton; (2) an amendment printed in the Congressional Record by May 7th by Rep. McCurdy; and (3) an amendment printed in the Congressional Record of April 21 by Rep. Michel. The last amendment adopted shall be reported back to the House (king-of-the-mountain).

5. After the joint resolution has been amended and reported to the House, the previous question is ordered to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

6. After passage of the joint resolution, the House would proceed to the immediate consideration in the House of S.J. Res. 283, the Senate passed contra aid bill, and it would then be in order to move to insert the House passed language or, if the Michel substitute has been adopted, it would be in order as a preferential motion to move the previous question on the Senate joint resolution to final passage without intervening motion.

REMOVAL OF NAME OF MEMBER AS COSPONSOR OF H.R. 844 AND H.R. 2950

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have my name removed as a cosponsor of H.R. 844 and of H.R. 2950.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

IN OPPOSITION TO THE SALE OF ARMS TO SAUDI ARABIA

(Mr. FLORIO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, in recent weeks, tensions in the Middle East have reached a new high with the continuation of terrorist activity and the acceleration of the conflict between the United States and Libya. It is this climate of uncertainty and instability that sets the scene for a $350 million sale to Saudi Arabia that will include a variety of weapons that will only further exacerbate tensions in the area and will not constructively contribute to the peace process.

The introduction of increased weapons to the region at this point in time would provide further fuel for accelerated terrorism and would not help solve the underlying conflict between Israel and the Arab States. The administration proposes to send to Saudi Arabia a military package that will include 1,700 Sidewinder air-to-air missiles, 800 Stinger hand-held antiaircraft missiles, and 200 launchers and 100 Harpoon antiship missiles. I have long opposed the sale of sophisticated weapons to nations in the Middle East that have been adverse to working within the framework of Camp David in resolving the Arab-Israeli conflict and that have consistently opposed our Government's attempts to resolve this conflict within that framework.

During the past 15 years, the United States has transferred to Saudi Arabia nearly $50 billion worth of weapons and assistance. The justification for the past sales and this renewed effort to sell arms to the Saudis has been based on the belief that the introduction of these weapons will not only improve stability in the region but will also induce the Saudi Arabian Government to take an active role in promoting the peace process, in recognizing Israeli's right to exist and in providing the impetus in the Arab world for a peaceful resolution of the underlying conflicts.

During these 15 years, the steps taken by the Saudi Government in this area have been minimal. Instead of indicating support for our Government's position in this area, the Saudi Government only recently condemned the military action taken by the United States against Libya and indicated solidarity with the Libyan regime. Instead of helping to further the peace process, the Saudi Government has undermined the peace process and even refuses to establish diplomatic relations with Egypt.

Of imminent concern is the prospect of introducing additional weapons to the region that could be dangerous in the hands of terrorists. In particular, the Stinger missiles, should they fall in the wrong hands, pose a deadly threat to stability in the region. Stinger missiles, used for guarding the White House, are easy to hide, easy to transport, and easy to operate. They are not only accurate but they are also capable of downing commercial aircraft in flight. At a time when the tourism industry has been wracked by the increase of terrorist incidents directed at aircraft and airports, the Stinger missiles would dramatically increase the risk of further incidents and would result in loss of life. There are no guarantees that these missiles will not fall into the wrong hands.

It has been argued that Saudi Arabia needs this weapons package in order to ensure that the Saudi's can defend their Government against threats from Iran. The threats faced by the Saudi Government from Iran include internal subversion, terrorism, and ground invasion. This particular package of air-based missiles will not address these security threats.

This past January, I visited Israel for the second time and was able to view the security threat that is posed to Israel and to our national interests by the increased buildup of troops, the accelerated tension in the region and the diminishing prospect for renewed peaceful negotiations. By selling arms to the Saudi's or any nation that undermines efforts to seek peace in the Middle East, we are rewarding intransigence rather than promoting peace.

As an original cosponsor of House Joint Resolution 589, a resolution to block the sale of arms to Saudi Arabia, I would like to urge my colleagues to signal their support for peace in the Middle East by opposing this arms sale. Increasing our weapons supply to this region and promoting fear among our ally, Israel, will not foster peace and understanding in the Middle East. Encouraging direct negotiations with meaningful results will.

Our Government cannot continue to condone intransigence with further gifts of instruments of war. Too much time has already been spent in waiting for significant steps in the peace process that have never materialized. I would hope that we can move forward and pursue renewed negotiations to instigate a peaceful and just solution to the conflicts in this vulnerable area of the world.

A CAUTION ON THE LEAKING OF CONFIDENTIAL INFORMATION

(Mr. GINGRICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, last Monday some legislators made remarks to the press which amounted to leaking confidential information before the raid on Libya. It weakened the process of executive branch consultation of the Congress and endangered American lives. The facts are clear: From 4 o'clock to 5:45 p.m. the President and senior advisers briefed legislative leaders. Apparently as soon as the meeting broke up some legislators told reporters that the President would be talking at 9 o'clock. By 5:59 p.m. Sam Donaldson of ABC News was in Larry Speakes' office demanding confirmation.

Mr. Speaker, I am circulating today a letter for our colleagues to sign that indicates to the executive branch that we would punish any Members of the House who engaged in leaking information about American operations during a period when they are confidential. I think if we expect to be consulted we have to learn to be responsible in matters of military security.

FEMA'S DISASTER RELIEF BUDGET

(Mr. KOLTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KOLTER. Mr. Speaker, 1 year ago, on May 31, a deadly tornado cut a swath of destruction through my district and other parts of Pennsylvania and Ohio.

Now, FEMA, the Federal Emergency Management Agency, the body which oversees the Federal disaster assistance programs has requested a budget for 1987 which will drastically affect our ability to aid and assist people struck by these disasters.

FEMA wants to reduce its budget for disaster assistance by cutting out 75 percent of its authority. FEMA requests a budget of $100 million, when its annual average budget for disaster assistance has been almost $400 million every year since 1974. In 1985 alone, FEMA was required to spend $663 million on 27 declared natural disasters. FEMA wants to reach these savings by changing the formula for eligibility for disaster assistance. This new formula would have made 61 of the last 111 disasters ineligible for assistance. This statistic must also be viewed in light of the fact that the Federal Government only accounts for 15 percent of all disaster assistance, the rest being picked up by State and local governments.

Furthermore, the Federal Government's aid is largely in the form of loans. On the other hand, American aid to disasters abroad comes in the form of grants.

Last year, due to disasters in Colombia, Mexico, Ethiopia, and other countries, the United States spent over $500 million in disaster grants to foreign countries.

I urge my colleagues to join in a nonpartisan effort, to review FEMA and its disaster relief budget proposals. No district is safe from natural disasters. It is our duty to be prepared for them.

TOUGH STANCE AGAINST THE EC COMMENDED

(Mr. BEREUTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, when the European Community several months ago announced that the entry of Spain and Portugal into the Community would be the occasion for new restrictions on American agricultural exports, it went too far. In the opinion of this and other Members from both bodies, this was the time to say "no way" to the Community. Fortunately in this instance the President also shared our view and acted accordingly.

He sternly warned the Community we would retaliate. He sent the Special Trade Representative and the Agriculture Secretary to Europe to let them know just how serious we were. Initial reports of conversations between the two sides the last few days are encouraging.

The Community has reportedly agreed to put off the effective date of these restrictions until 1987, which buys us time to work on eliminating them altogether.

Clearly our job is only partly finished, with much hard bargaining still to come.

We are off to a good start, and I would like to say to Ambassador Yeutter and Secretary Lyng, "Hang tough."

WE ARE PROPOSING TO GO DEEPER INTO THE RED WITH OUR SPENDING

(Mr. BATES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, on April 15 Congress was to have completed a budget resolution. Gramm-Rudman-Hollings requires that we cut $39 billion from the coming fiscal year. Instead, next week we will be debating a supplemental appropriations bill which will add $1.7 billion in new spending. I have been asked what it is about the supplemental bill that bothers me. The answer is: The spending.

The spending in this bill will haunt us during the budget process, putting us much further away from meeting our $144 billion target goal.

We are proposing to go deeper in the red. Our massive deficits affect individuals, businesses, and our trading partners.

Let's get back to the real issue.

DIAGNOSTICIANS IGNORING THE FACT OF CANCER

(Mr. DANNEMEYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, the trouble with the Gramm-Rudman approach to deficit reduction is that it tries to ignore the real cause of the growth of deficits. We are like diagnosticians who have agreed beforehand on one point. We want to ignore the fact of cancer. In this context, I wish to quote from the late Garet Garrett, a financial journalist who wrote in the Wall Street Journal on September 30, 1952:

> Irredeemable paper money, that is, money redeemable in nothing but more of itself, is a fatal disease with a record of 100 percent mortality unless halted in time by radical surgery. It has already cost the people control of government. It has enabled the government to convert its own debt into currency, and thereby to fill its own purse. It is the stuff upon which the self-aggrandizing executive principle of government feeds. It is morally devastating and corrupts men by cumulative temptation. It hurts everybody, especially the poor and the dependent.

Mr. Speaker, if we really want to reduce and eventually eliminate budget deficits, we must cut the cost of interest on the Federal debt radically, by returning to redeemable currency without delay.

TELL THAILAND REPRESENTATIVES TO GO HOME

(Mr. HUCKABY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, for several weeks now, representatives of the Government of Thailand have been in Washington lobbying individual Members of Congress about our 1985 farm bill and the rice provisions.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Cotton, Rice and Sugar, I spent several hours with these representatives explaining to them that, yes, it was the position of our Government to recapture our prior historical markets as such, and pointed out to them that we have had trade complaints pending against them for a number of years now.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to my colleagues that Thailand joined the nonaligned nations, the Communist nations, in voting to condemn the United States for actions in Libya last week.

I would urge my colleagues that when these representatives contact you, tell them it is time that they went home.

LET US MAINTAIN FREEDOM OF RELIGIOUS CHOICE FOR THE MILITARY

(Mrs. BENTLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I urge that you and our fellow Representatives support the Military Chaplains Faith Balance Act of 1984, H.R. 1875, a nonpartisan bill, now pending before this House.

It is necessary to have this legislation to achieve a more balanced representation of religious faiths among Armed Forces chaplains. When we ask our men and women to serve in the defense of our country—they in truth are serving in our stead. And, in that service they should have the ready availability of religious counsel and guidance—and the comfort which it brings—from a representative of their own faith.

I think that this is the least we can offer these men and women in the Armed Forces—this as a religious nation, we owe them this much when we are asking so much of them.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you and my colleagues to join me in supporting the military chaplains bill, H.R. 1875. We should all be working for its passage.

OUR TAX CODE IS UNDERWRITING OIL COMPANIES' PRESENCE IN LIBYA

(Mr. OBEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Speaker, as Americans saw on the evening news Monday night, the administration has permitted United States oil companies to resume business in Libya, despite the President's proclamation of economic boycott.

What Americans may not know is that present law entitles those companies to claim credits on their U.S. tax returns for taxes they paid to Colonel Qadhafi. Last month they paid $130 million to his outlaw regime.

Mr. Speaker, I do not understand the wisdom of allowing United States firms to support with our cash a Libyan Government dedicated to terrorism. I doubt very much that the American people, if they knew, would want to subsidize Qadhafi's terrorism, yet that is what they are being forced to do. The administration has allowed five oil companies to continue to do business with Libya for the moment. The decision was made without public debate to bring this situation out into the open so that the public can participate in decisions about whether they want their Tax Code to continue to underwrite oil companies' presence in Libya.

I am today introducing legislation to end United States tax credits for moneys paid by American oil companies to the Libyan Government. Any of you wishing to join me in cosponsorship are welcome to do so.

LEGISLATIVE LEAKS

(Mr. BURTON of Indiana asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, last Monday something unexcusable happened. Legislative leaders from both Houses met with the President to be briefed on the Libyan raid from 4 to 5:45 p.m. Apparently, some legislative leaders from the other body told reporters the President would then address the Nation at 9 p.m. At 5:59, Sam Donaldson of ABC News asked Larry Speakes of the White House for confirmation.

At 6:30, on ABC Nightly News, Donaldson quoted the legislative leader from the other body as saying the President would address the Nation at 9 p.m. ABC News went on to describe the United States military movements, including F-111's in Britain and the KC-10 tankers which had been moved to Britain and the aircraft carriers operating off the coast of Sicily. In a few minutes, ABC had outlined everything a Libyan defense planner would need to know about a probably raid on Libya.

This all occurred 30 minutes before the raid took place. This was really risking American lives.

Members of Congress must learn to keep their mouths shut, at least where national security is concerned.

HOUSE RESOLUTION 431

(Mr. DURBIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the House of Representatives by unanimous consent passed House Resolution 427. The effect of House Resolution 427 was to amend the rules of the House and to increase the limit on outside earned income for Members of the House from 30 percent of their salary to 40 percent.

In addition, while it increased the limit on honoraria income, it effectively repealed the limit on other forms of outside earned income.

This morning I filed with the Clerk of the House, House Resolution 431, which would have restored rule 47 to exactly the same language that existed before the House's action yesterday. It would have continued to limit outside earned income to 30 percent of a Member's salary and all other limitations that were in existence yesterday.

There is an orderly procedure for changing the rules and Members' salaries. Those of my colleagues who agree with House Resolution 427, which I do not, can approach the Rules Committee requesting the change contained in House Resolution 427.

Unfortunately, this morning when I made a unanimous-consent request to consider my resolution, which would have rescinded the action of the House yesterday, there was an objection heard from the minority whip.

I do not believe this matter should be considered by unanimous consent, and I have taken the Speaker's advice to take this matter to the Rules Committee later today. I am hoping we can undo and rescind the action of the House yesterday.

DEFICIT REDUCTION INSURANCE PROGRAM—DRIP

(Mr. JEFFORDS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, today is the day when the Gramm-Rudman Deficit Reduction Act is being argued in the Supreme Court. Also it is 1 week after April 15, the date we were supposed to have our budget before us. Sadly, we did not.

When this body approved the Balanced and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985, it made a bold statement about the fiscal mood both here and throughout the Nation. The act imposes some difficult cuts that will be implemented automatically if we fail to meet the designated deficit reduction targets we approved.

The law did not spare cuts in defense spending, in social programs dear to our constituents, in congressional offices themselves. What it did spare was us, our own wallets and pocketbooks.

Today I am introducing legislation to correct that slight oversight. It is called the Deficit Reduction Insurance Program [DRIP]. Its budgetary impact will be micro, but its incentive will be macro to do our job; hopefully more successfully for the budget than the trickle-down theory.

Seriously, what my measure does is simply this. In the event we fail to make the budgetary targets in Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, then our own salaries will be cut equal to the automatic across-the-board percentage cuts that will require others to endure. And the measure will require the salary cuts even if Congress fails to approve a sequestration order under the fall-back procedures within the law.

If we are unable to make the budget decisions that must be made, then they will be made for us under the automatic cutbacks that we ourselves engineered. If that happens, however, we have no right to be exempted from the effects of those cuts.

I have no illusions about the reception this legislation will get. But I cannot help but believe that all of us would be a lot more eager to enact sound budgetary policy, and soon, if we knew that we would all be the poorer if we failed to do so.

IN SUPPORT OF GARRISON DIVERSION UNIT REFORMULATION ACT OF 1986

(Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, today we are going to be visiting the Garrison Reformulation Act, and I want to underscore for the Members of the House exactly what it is we are talking about. This is the Garrison Diversion project which is reformulated as a result of a compromise by those who supported the project and those who opposed it.

Persons who historically had opposed this project before this House are now supporting it—the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDGAR], just to name a couple. Organizations such as the National Audubon Society and the Wildlife Federation are supporting this reformulation.

I think they support it for a couple of reasons. First, this reformulation sharply cuts the cost of this project: $800 million is cut out of an authorization level for this project in the legislation that we will be dealing with today. Second, this legislation resolves most of the environmental questions. Third, it dissipates the objections that the Government of Canada had.

I think this is an awfully good compromise that opponents and supporters have come together to forge. Let me make it clear that this is not charity for North Dakota, this is payment for services rendered. The Government came to North Dakota and said, "We want you to have a permanent flood three-fourths the size of the State of Rhode Island. In exchange for having that flood, we'll give you the benefit of being able to move those waters around your State." The rest of the country got all the benefits; we are still waiting for the project.

This project, which was started when I was 2 years old, now, as a result of this compromise, might very well get built. I hope that is the case. Because of that, I am hoping that the Members of this House will support this compromise that has been very difficult to achieve, but is I think a very rewarding compromise for everybody involved—the State, the people who want it developed, the conservationists, the environmentalists, and for everybody in this House and this country. I think a vote in support of this project will be a good vote.

THE LIABILITY CRISIS—STATE TORT REFORM NEEDED

(Mr. PORTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I said that addressing the liability explosion by heavy, direct Federal regulation of the insurance industry or by putting the Federal Government in the reinsurance business was worse than no solution at all.

The problem is the unpredictability of what the courts will do in personal injury cases. Today, Mr. Speaker, we have a social welfare system for injured parties administered by the courts—which is fine—but it is one that has become unpredictable and without any control on costs—which is not. What is needed is reform of their tort systems by the States to make them more predictable and thus keep insurance companies willing to provide coverage in the market.

If the States don't act substantively and intelligently and soon to make such reforms, the pressure on Washington to take jurisdiction will become irresistible. Next time, I'll suggest what the Federal Government might do, and following that, how the States can make true progress on this issue.

CONDEMNING YESTERDAY'S ACTION INCREASING MEMBERS' ALLOWED HONORARIUMS

(Mr. CLINGER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I join with those who are condemning the action that was taken in the House by unanimous consent yesterday to raise the amount of honorariums which individual Members could receive. It is no wonder that the public ranks this body as low as it does in terms of credibility and trust, somewhere just above aluminum siding salesmen.

Mr. Speaker, this is a classic case of hands in the cookie jar. We must revise this ill-advised action. Where is our sense of priorities? The budget process is in disarray in this Congress. The public is crying out for us to address the deficit, to deal with the unemployment problems that still exist, to reauthorize Superfund—we have a host of critical items that we need to be addressing. Instead, the leadership of this body seems to be preoccupied with attempting to increase the incomes of individual Members. Shame on them.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

(Without objection, Mr. BILIRAKIS was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to extend his remarks.)

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, I regret that, for reasons beyond my control, I was unable to record my vote on House Resolution 425, the rule for consideration of the urgent supplemental appropriations. Had I been present, I would have voted against the resolution. There are a number of elements in the urgent supplemental that were considered objectionable by my colleagues, and rightly so. Not only has the budget deadline of April 15 passed without action, but an appropriation bill requesting $1.7 billion in new spending is proposed in flagrant disregard of budgetary guidelines. The House majority has rewritten or waived every budgetary management procedure that stands in the way of its fiscal appetite. I specifically wish to refer to the Presidential deferral authority, which is the necessary balance between fiscal control and fiscal irresponsibility. The President's deferral authority must be retained. It is the last outpost of fiscal restraint.

GARRISON DIVERSION UNIT REFORMULATION ACT OF 1986

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 422 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, H.R. 1116.

□ 1055

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 1116) to implement certain recommendations made pursuant to Public Law 98-360, with Mr. Bosco in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee of the Whole rose on Monday, April 21, 1986, the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER] had 7 minutes of general debate remaining and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. STRANG] had 22 minutes of general debate remaining.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 1116, a bill to reformulate—and, I might add, to reform—the Garrison Diversion Unit in North Dakota.

Mr. Chairman, when I began the fight to stop funding for the Garrison project some years ago, I never imagined that some day I would be standing in this well supporting a Garrison authorization. It is a tribute to the outstanding efforts of the Interior Committee members, and particularly Subcommittee Chairman GEORGE MILLER and full Committee Chairman MO UDALL, that I am able to do so.

I would also like to single out the hard work of representatives of the National Audubon Society and the National Wildlife Federation, as well as the Interior Committee staff, whose tireless negotiating efforts have produced a bill that truly represents a win-win approach to the water needs of North Dakota.

Under this legislation, everyone wins—the people of North Dakota, the Federal taxpayers, the Canadian, and the wildlife resources of North Dakota.

Although this is not a perfect bill, it is an outstanding compromise, and a real embodiment of the principle that politics is the art of the possible.

This bill would deauthorize over 900,000 acres of previously authorized irrigation land, ultimately saving some $2.6 billion in Federal expenditures for the project. Some of the most critical wildlife habitat areas—including the Kraft Slough, Taayer Reservoir, and Lonetree Reservoir areas—would be preserved. The flow of waters into the Hudson Bay watershed, of such concern to Canada because of the possibility of harmful biota transfer—has been addressed.

The mitigation of wetland losses has been addressed, by requiring acre-for-acre mitigation. And a new wetlands trust, to provide for additional wetlands protection in North Dakota, the most important duck producing State in the Nation, would be created.

Mr. Chairman, I know that the administration is concerned about this bill. There is no question that it is an expensive measure—and in this Gramm-Rudman environment, any new measure should be subject to strict scrutiny.

But I think the important thing about this bill is not its cost—but the amount that it would save. Because the alternative to this measure—a return to funding under the current authorization—is far, far, worse.

I am confident that this body, which since December 1982 has been on record as opposing funding for the Garrison project, would continue to do so. But the record in the other body is much less favorable, and I believe that the enactment of this authorization reform represents the best way to reduce the cost and environmental impact of the Garrison project, while meeting the legitimate water resource needs of North Dakota.

Mr. Chairman, I want to make it clear that I remain absolutely opposed to continuation of the Garrison project as it is currently authorized. But I strongly support this legislative reform, and urge that it be adopted.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONTE. I yield to my good friend, the gentleman from California.

Mr. MILLER of California. I just want to say quickly to the Members of the House that without the gentleman in the well's involvement, we would not be here today. It was his obstinance at some time, I think, his looking to the future, looking at the real costs of this project as it was reauthorized, some of the environmental problems that caused him to lead the fight against this over a number of years.

Because of that effort on his behalf, I think he is quite right, that we have been able to strike a compromise, and I appreciate all of his support and all of his help in arriving at this final bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. CONTE was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. CONTE. I want to thank the gentleman from California for his kind remarks.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONTE. I yield to my good friend, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BEDELL].

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, I also want to commend the gentleman for the work he has done on these projects, but I would point out to the gentleman that my amendment is an amendment to the bill. Does the gentleman feel that it is all right to go ahead and subsidize farmers to grow more crops at the same time we are subsidizing farmers not to grow crops? Does the gentleman think that is a sensible thing to do in this society?

This is not a bill we are talking about; this is a provision in the bill that, it seems to me, needs to be corrected. That is the issue. The issue is not the bill.

Mr. CONTE. I am not up here speaking on the gentleman's amendment. All I am saying is that whether the gentleman's amendment is adopted or not, I am asking my colleagues to vote for this bill because it represents a tough, tough compromise. You cannot believe how many meetings I had on this project with the gentleman from North Dakota, his Governor, the Audubon Society, the Wildlife Federation, and others, day after day after day. It was like having molasses in your hands. One day you would have an agreement, and the next day, it was spilling out between your fingers. This is the best we can do.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to my good friend, the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. DORGAN], who has been such an effective and worthy adversary on this issue.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to echo the sentiments expressed by the chairman and say that I especially appreciate your support of this compromise.

These things are very difficult to put together, very easy to unravel. The gentleman knows and I know and others in this body who have worked on the compromise know that day after day and month after month now stretching on for a year and a half since that Garrison Commission, we have tried desperately to get a compromise that will hold. Each time we thought we had one, we would lose it.

We finally have one that I think makes sense. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE] supports it; I support it. It is the art of the possible and I appreciate your support. I appreciate the statement the gentleman has made on the floor today.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Pursuant to the rule, the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs now printed in the reported bill shall be considered as an original bill for the purpose of amendment, and each section shall be considered as having been read.

The Clerk will designate section 1.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute be printed in the RECORD and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The text of the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute is as follows:

H.R. 1116

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. PURPOSE AND AUTHORIZATION.

The first section of the Act of August 5, 1965 (Public Law 89-108, 79 Stat. 433) as amended by striking out "That" and all that follows down through the period at the end of such section and substituting:

"SECTION 1. (a) The Congress declares that the purposes of this Act are to:

"(1) implement the recommendations of the Garrison Diversion Unit Commission Final Report (dated December 20, 1984) in the manner specified by this Act;

"(2) meet the water needs of the State of North Dakota, including municipal, rural and industrial water needs, as identified in the Garrison Diversion Unit Commission Final Report;

"(3) minimize the environmental impacts associated with the construction and operation of the Garrison Diversion Unit;

"(4) assist the United States in meeting its responsibilities under the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909;

"(5) assure more timely repayment of Federal funds expended for the Garrison Diversion Unit;

"(6) preserve any existing rights of the State of North Dakota to use water from the Missouri River; and,

"(7) offset the loss of farmland within the State of North Dakota resulting from the construction of major features of the Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin Program, by means of a federally-assisted water resource development project providing irrigation for 130,940 acres of land.

"(b) The Secretary of the Interior (hereafter referred to as "the Secretary") is authorized to plan and construct a multi-purpose water resource development project within the State of North Dakota providing for the irrigation of 130,940 acres, municipal, rural, and industrial water, fish and wildlife conservation and development, recreation, flood control, and other project purposes in accordance with the Federal reclamation laws (Act of June 17, 1902, 32 Stat. 388, and Acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto) and substantially in accordance with the plans set out in the Garrison Diversion Unit Commission Final Report dated December 20, 1984.

"(c) Nothing in this Act is intended, nor shall be construed, to preclude the State of North Dakota from seeking Congressional authorization to plan, design, and construct additional Federally-assisted water resource development projects in the future.

"(d) Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to diminish the quantity of water from the Missouri River which the State of North Dakota may beneficially use, pursuant to any right or rights it may have under federal law existing immediately before the date of enactment of this Act and consistent with the treaty obligations of the United States.

"(e) The authorization for all features of the Missouri-Souris Unit of the Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin Program located in the State of North Dakota, heretofore authorized in section 9 of the Flood Control Act of December 22, 1944 (58 Stat. 891), for which no funds have been appropriated for construction, and which are not authorized for construction by this Act, is hereby terminated, and sections 1 and 6 of the Act of August 5, 1965 (Public Law 89-108, 79 Stat. 433) are hereby repealed.

"(f) In implementing the provisions of this Act, the Secretary is directed to construct all supply works to the capacity identified in the Garrison Diversion Unit Commission Final Report, except that the Secretary is directed to construct the James River Feeder Canal to a capacity of no more than 450 cubic feet per second, and the Sykeston Canal to the capacity specified in Section 8(a)(1) of this Act.

"(g) Any investment related to features constructed by the Secretary that are no longer employed to full capacity pursuant to the recommendations of the Garrison Diversion Unit Commission Final Report shall be nonreimbursable.".

SEC. 2. FISH AND WILDLIFE.

Section 2 of the Act of August 5, 1965 (Public Law 89-108, 79 Stat. 433) is amended by adding the following new subsections at the end thereof:

"(i) Notwithstanding any other provisions of this section, the mitigation for fish and wildlife losses incurred as a result of construction of the project shall be on an acre-for-acre basis, based on ecological equivalency, concurrent with project construction.

"(j) The Secretary is directed to implement the provisions of the Garrison Diversion Unit Commission Final Report with respect to fish and wildlife conservation, including habitat impacts, mitigation procedures, and enhancement, except for the following:

"(1) The Secretary shall take no action to alter the status of Sheyenne Lake National Wildlife Refuge prior to the completion of construction of Lonetree Dam and Reservoir.

"(2) Development and implementation of the mitigation and enhancement plan for fish and wildlife resources impacted by construction and operation of the Garrison Diversion Unit shall not be limited by the cost constraints based on estimates contained in the Garrison Diversion Unit Commission Final Report.

"(3) Credit toward mitigation recommended by the Garrison Diversion Unit Commission Final Report for reservoir sites is not authorized.".

SEC. 3. IRRIGATION FACILITIES.

Section 5 of the Act of August 5, 1965 (Public Law 89-108, 79 Stat. 433) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. (a)(1) Subject to the provisions of subsection (a)(2) of this section, the Secretary is authorized to develop irrigation in the following project service areas: Turtle Lake (13,700 acres), McClusky Canal (4,000 acres), Lincoln Valley (6,515 acres), Harvey Pumping (2,000 acres), New Rockford (20,935 acres), New Rockford Canal (1,200 acres), LaMoure (13,350 acres), West Oakes Extension (4,000 acres), and West Oakes (19,660 acres). The Secretary is prohibited from developing irrigation in these areas in excess of the acreage specified herein, except that the Secretary is authorized and directed to develop up to 28,000 acres of irrigation in other areas in North Dakota, not located in the Hudson Bay, Devils Lake, or James River drainage basins.

"(2) The Secretary is prohibited from obligating any funds for construction of irrigation service facilities in the areas listed in subsection (a)(1) of this section prior to September 30, 1990. After that date, the Secretary may obligate funds only after completing and submitting to the Congress, the report required by section 5(c) of this Act.

"(b)(1) The Secretary may not commence construction of the Sykeston Canal, the James River Feeder Canal, and James River channel improvements until the report required by Section 5(c) of this Act has been completed and submitted to the Congress.

"(2) The Secretary is directed to proceed immediately with the construction of—

"(A) the New Rockford Canal;

"(B) the Oakes Test Area; and

"(C) project features authorized in Section 7 of this Act.

"(c)(1) The Secretary is directed to submit a comprehensive report to the Congress as soon as practicable, but not later than the end of fiscal year 1988 on the effects on the James River in North Dakota and South Dakota of water resource development proposals recommended by the Garrison Diversion Unit Commission and authorized in this Act. The report shall include the findings of the Secretary with regard to:

"(A) the feasibility of using the Oakes Aquifer as a water storage and recharge facility, and an evaluation of the need for off-stream regulatory storage in the lower James River basin;

"(B) the capability of the river to handle irrigation return flows, project water supplies, and natural runoff without causing flooding, property damage, or damage to wildlife areas, and mechanisms or procedures for compensation or reimbursement of affected landowners for damages from project operation;

"(C) the impacts of Garrison Diversion Unit irrigation return flows on the river and on adjacent riverine wetland areas and components of the National Wildlife Refuge System, with regard to water quantity, water quality, and fish and wildlife values;

"(D) the need for channelization of the James River under the irrigation and municipal, rural, and industrial water development programs authorized by this Act;

"(E) the cost and efficiency of measures required to guarantee that irrigation return flows from the New Rockford (Robinson Coulee) irrigation service areas will not enter the Hudson Bay drainage and the impact these return flows will have on the James River;

"(F) the feasibility of conveying project flows into the lower James River via Pipestem Creek; and

"(G) alternative management plans for operation of Jamestown and Pipestem Reservoirs to minimize impacts on the lower James River.

"(2) The costs of the study authorized by this subsection shall be nonreimbursable.

"(3) The study authorized by this subsection shall be carried out in accordance with the requirements of the National Environmental Policy Act.

"(d) The Secretary is prohibited from obligating funds to construct irrigation facilities in the service areas listed in subsection (a)(1) until a contract or contracts, in a form approved by the Secretary, providing for the appropriate payment of the costs allocated to irrigation have been properly executed by a district or districts organized under State law. Such contract or contracts shall be consistent with the requirements of the Reclamation Reform Act of 1982 (title II, Public Law 97-293, 96 Stat. 1263).

"(e) The Secretary is authorized to develop irrigation in the following project service areas within the boundaries of the Fort Berthold and Standing Rock Indian Reservations: Lucky Mound (7,700 acres), Upper Six Mile Creek (7,500 acres), and Fort Yates (2,380 acres), except that, no funds are authorized to be appropriated for construction of these projects until the Secretary has made a finding of irrigability of the lands to receive water as required by the Act of July 31, 1953 (67 Stat. 266; 43 U.S.C. 390a). Repayment for the units authorized under this subsection shall be made pursuant to the Leavitt Act (25 U.S.C. 386a).

"(f) The Secretary shall not permit the use of project facilities for non-project drainage not included in project design or required for project operations.".

SEC. 4. POWER.

Section 6 of the Act of August 5, 1965 (Public Law 89-108, 79 Stat. 433) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. (a) Municipal, rural, and industrial water systems constructed with funds authorized by section 7 of this Act shall utilize power from the Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin Program, as established by section 9 of the Flood Control Act of 1944 (Act of December 22, 1944), for the operation of such systems.

"(b) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 302(a)(3) of the Department of Energy Organization Act (42 U.S.C 7152(a)(3)), any portion of the costs properly chargeable to irrigation for the Garrison Diversion Unit which are beyond the ability of water users to repay as authorized by Reclamation law may be repaid from power revenues, except repayment of investment in irrigation for the Garrison Diversion Unit made after the date of enactment of this Act may not exceed forty years from the year in which irrigation water is first delivered for use by the contracting party and shall be made in equal annual installments.

"(c) Pursuant to the provisions of the last sentence of section 302(a)(3) of the Department of Energy Organization Act of 1978 (42 U.S.C. 7152(a)(3)), any reallocation of costs to project purposes other than irrigation as a result of section 1(e) of this Act shall not result in increased rates to Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin Program customers unless: (1) full use has been made of the current development method of ratesetting in analyzing the repayment status and cost allocations for the Garrison Diversion Unit and (2) the resulting rate increase, if any, is made in equal amounts over the ten year period beginning on the date of any such reallocation pursuant to this Act. Costs reallocated to project purposes other than irrigation as a result of section 1(e) of this Act shall be repaid, if reimbursable, with interest at the rate specified in section 4(b) of this Act beginning on the date of any such reallocation without retroactive interest. Nothing in this Act shall alter or affect in any way the current repayment methodology for other features of the Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin Program.".

SEC. 5. MUNICIPAL, RURAL, AND INDUSTRIAL WATER SERVICE.

The Act of August 5, 1965 (Public Law 89-108, 79 Stat. 433) is amended by adding the following new section at the end thereof:

"SEC. 7. (a)(1) The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to construct municipal, rural, and industrial water systems to serve areas throughout the State of North Dakota.

"(2) All planning, design, construction and operation of the municipal, rural, and industrial water systems authorized by this section shall be undertaken in accordance with a cooperative agreement between the Secretary and the State of North Dakota. Such cooperative agreement shall set forth in a manner acceptable to the Secretary the responsibilities of the State for:

"(A) needs assessments;

"(B) feasibility studies;

"(C) engineering and design;

"(D) construction;

"(E) operation and maintenance; and,

"(F) the administration of contracts pertaining to any of the foregoing.

"(3) Upon execution of the cooperative agreement required under this subsection, the Secretary is authorized to convey to the State of North Dakota, on a nonreimbursable basis, the funds authorized in section 10(b)(1) of this Act. The non-Federal share of the total cost of construction of each water system for which the State of North Dakota receives funding pursuant to this section shall be 25 percent, committed prior to the initiation of construction. The non-Federal share of the cost of operation, maintenance, and replacement of each municipal, rural, and industrial water system funded by this section shall be 100 percent. The Southwest Pipeline Project shall be deemed to be eligible for funding under the terms of this section.

"(b) The Secretary is authorized and directed to construct, operate, and maintain a Sheyenne River water supply and release feature (including a water treatment plant) capable of delivering 100 cubic feet per second of water for the cities of Fargo and Grand Forks and surrounding communities. The costs of the construction, operation, maintenance, and replacement of this feature, exclusive of conveyance, shall be nonreimbursable and deemed attributable to meeting requirements of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909.

"(c) The Secretary is authorized and directed to construct, operate, and maintain such municipal, rural, and industrial water systems as he deems necessary to meet the economic, public health and environmental needs of the Fort Berthold, Standing Rock, and Fort Totten Indian Reservations.

"(d) Municipal, rural, and industrial water systems constructed with funds authorized under this Act may deliver Missouri River water into the Hudson Bay drainage only after the Secretary of the Interior, in consultation with the Secretary of State and the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, has determined that adequate treatment has been provided to meet the requirements of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909.".

SEC. 6. SPECIFIC FEATURES.

The Act of August 5, 1965 (Public Law 89-108, 79 Stat. 443) is amended by adding the following new section at the end thereof:

"SEC. 8. (a)(1) In accordance with the recommendations of the Garrison Diversion Unit Commission Final Report and section 1 of this Act, the Sykeston Canal shall be constructed as a functional replacement for the Lonetree Dam and Reservoir. The Sykeston Canal shall be designed and constructed to meet only the water delivery requirements of the irrigation areas and municipal, rural, and industrial water supply needs authorized in this Act. The Sykeston Canal shall be located, constructed, and operated so that, in the opinion of the Secretaries of the Interior and State, no violation of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 would result. The Secretary may not commence construction on the Sykeston Canal until a master repayment contract consistent with the provisions of this Act between the Secretary and the appropriate non-Federal entity has been executed.

"(2) The Lonetree Dam and Reservoir shall remain an authorized feature of the Garrison Diversion Unit; however, construction funds may be requested by the Secretary for Lonetree Dam and Reservoir only after:

"(A) The Secretary has determined that there is a need for the dam and reservoir based on a contemporary appraisal using procedures such as those employed in the preparation of feasibility studies for water resources development projects submitted to Congress;

"(B) consultations with the Government of Canada have reached a conclusion satisfactory to the Secretary of State, after consultation with the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, that no violation of the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 would result from the construction and operation of the dam and reservoir; and,

"(C) the Secretaries of the Interior and State have submitted the determinations required by subparagraphs (A) and (B) above to the Congress and 90 calendar days have elapsed.

"(b) Taayer Reservoir is deauthorized as a project feature. The Secretary is directed to acquire up to 5,000 acres in the Kraft and Pickell Slough areas and to manage the area as a component of the National Wildlife Refuge System giving consideration to the unique wildlife values of the area. In acquiring the lands which comprise the Kraft and Pickell Slough complex, the Secretary is authorized to acquire wetlands in the immediate vicinity which may be hydrologically related and nearby uplands as may be necessary to provide for proper managemnt of the complex. The Secretary is also authorized to provide for appropriate visitor access and control at the refuge.".

SEC. 7. EXCESS CROPS.

The Act of August 5, 1965 (Public Law 89-108, 79 Stat. 433), is amended by adding the following new section at the end thereof:

"SEC. 9. Until the construction costs of the facilities authorized in section 5 are repaid, the Secretary is directed to charge a "surplus crop production charge" equal to 10 per cent of full cost, as defined in Section 202(3)(A)-(C) of the Reclamation Reform Act of 1982 (Public Law 97-293, 96 Stat. 1263), for the delivery of project water used in the production of any basic agricultural commodity if the total supply of such commodity for the marketing years in which the bulk of the crop would normally be marketed is in excess of the normal supply as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary of the Interior shall announce the amount of the surplus crop production charge for the succeeding year on or before July 1 of each year.".

SEC. 8. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The Act of August 5, 1965 (Public Law 89-108, 79 Stat. 433) is amended by adding the following new section at the end thereof:

"SEC. 10. (a) There are authorized to be appropriated $338,305,000 for carrying out the provisions of section 5 and section 8(a)(1) of this Act. Such sums shall remain available until expended.

"(b)(1) There is authorized to be appropriated $200,000,000 to carry out the provisions of section 7(a) of this Act. Such sums shall remain available until expended.

"(2) There are authorized to be appropriated $61,000,000 to carry out the provisions of section 7(b) through section 7(d) of this Act. Such sums shall remain available until expended.

"(c) There is authorized to be appropriated for carrying out the remaining provisions of this Act $80,535,000. No funds are authorized for the construction of the Lonetree Dam and Reservoir. There are also authorized to be appropriated such additional funds as may be necessary for operation and maintenance of the unit.

"(d) Any funds previously appropriated for the Garrison Diversion Unit may be expended to carry out any of the provisions of this Act.".

SEC. 9. WETLANDS TRUST.

The Act of August 5, 1965 (Public Law 89-108, 79 Stat. 433) is amended by adding the following new section at the end thereof:

"SEC. 11. (a) FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS.—From the sums appropriated under Section 10 of this Act for the Garrison Diversion

Unit, the Secretary of the Interior shall make an annual Federal contribution to a Wetlands Trust established in accordance with subsection (b), and operated in accordance with subsection (c), of this section. The amount of each such annual contribution shall be as follows:

"(1) For fiscal year 1986: $2,000,000.

"(2) For each of the fiscal years 1987 through 1990: 3% of the total amount appropriated under Section 10 of this Act, but not to exceed $500,000 for each such fiscal year.

"(3) For each fiscal year after 1990: 5 percent of the total amount appropriated under Section 10 of this Act, but only to the extent that a contribution to the Trust equal to 10 percent of the Federal contribution is provided or contracted for by the State of North Dakota from non-Federal funds. The contributions of the State of North Dakota may be paid to the Trust in such amounts and in such manner as may be agreed upon by the Governor and the Secretary.

"(4) The total Federal contribution pursuant to this Act shall not exceed $12,000,000.

"(b) ESTABLISHMENT OF TRUST.—A Wetlands Trust shall be treated as established in accordance with this subsection if it complies with each of the following requirements:

"(1) The Trust is established as a nonprofit corporation under the laws of North Dakota with its principal office in North Dakota.

"(2) The Trust is under the direction of a Board of Directors which has the power to manage all affairs of the corporation, including administration, data collection, and implementation of the purposes of the Trust.

"(3) The Board of Directors of the Trust is comprised of 6 persons appointed as follows, each for a term of 2 years:

"(A) 3 persons appointed by the Governor of North Dakota.

"(B) 1 person appointed by the National Audubon Society.

"(C) 1 person appointed by the National Wildlife Federation.

"(D) 1 person appointed by the North Dakota Chapter of the Wildlife Society.

Vacancies on the board are filled in the manner in which the original appointments were made. Any member of the Board of Directors is eligible for reappointment for successive terms. Any member appointed to fill a vacancy occurring before the expiration of the term for which his or her predecessor was appointed is appointed only for the remainder of such term. A member may serve after the expiration of his or her term until his or her successor has taken office.

"(4) Members of the Board of Directors serve without compensation.

"(5) The corporate purposes of the Trust are to preserve, enhance, restore, and manage wetland and associated wildlife habitat in the State of North Dakota.

"(c) OPERATIONS OF THE TRUST.—A Wetland Trust established as provided in subsection (b) shall be deemed to be operating in accordance with this subsection if each of the following requirements are met:

"(1) The Trust is operated to preserve, enhance, restore, and manage wetlands and associated wildlife habitat in the State of North Dakota in accordance with its corporate purpose as provided in subsection (b)(5).

"(2) Pursuant to its corporate charter, the Trust has the authority to exercise each of the following powers:

"(A) The power to acquire lands and interests in land and power to acquire water rights. Lands or interests in lands may be acquired by the Trust only with the consent of the owner thereof and with the approval of the Governor of North Dakota.

"(B) The power to finance wetland preservation, enhancement, restoration, and management or wetland habitat programs.

"(3) All funds received by the Trust under subsection (a) are invested in accordance with the requirements of subsection (d). No part of the principal amount of such funds may be expended for any purpose. The income received by the Trust from the investment of such funds shall be used by the Trust exclusively for its purposes and operations in accordance with this subsection or, to the extent not required for current operations, reinvested in accordance with subsection (d).

"(4) The Trust agrees to provide such reports as may be required by the Secretary or the Governor of North Dakota and makes its records available for audit by Federal and State agencies.

"(d) INVESTMENT OF TRUST FUNDS.—The Secretary of the Interior, in consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury and the Governor of North Dakota, shall establish requirements for the investment of all amounts received by the Trust under subsection (a) or reinvested under subsection (c)(3). Such requirements shall ensure that such amounts are invested in accordance with sound investment principles and shall ensure that persons managing such investments will exercise their fiduciary responsibilities in an appropriate manner.".

SEC. 10. SOIL SURVEYS.

Section 1 of the Act of July 31, 1953 (67 Stat. 266; 43 U.S.C. 390a) is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following: "Such surveys shall include an investigation of soil characteristics which might result in toxic or hazardous irrigation return flows."

SEC. 11. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be referred to as the "Garrison Diversion Unit Reformulation Act of 1986".

SEC. 12. COMPLIANCE WITH APPROPRIATIONS ACT.

This Act to reformulate the Garrison Diversion Unit shall be deemed to meet all the time and substance requirements specified in the Fiscal Year 1986 Energy and Water Development Appropriations Act (Public Law 99-141).

AMENDMENTS OFFERED BY MR. MILLER OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, I offer five technical amendments, and I ask unanimous consent that they be considered en bloc, considered as read, and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The text of the amendments is as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. MILLER of California: On page 7, strike lines 21 through 24 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "'(g) Where features constructed by the Secretary are no longer used to full capacity pursuant to the recommendations of the Garrison Diversion Unit Commission Final Report, that portion of the Secretary's investment attributable to the construction of such unused capacity shall be nonreimbursable.'.".

On page 19, line 24, insert "(1)" immediately after "(a)".

On page 19, line 25, strike "$338,305,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$270,395,000", and strike "section 5" and insert in lieu thereof "section 5(a) through section 5(c)".

On page 20, after line 2, insert the following: "(2) There is authorized to be appropriated $67,910,000 for carrying out the provisions of section 5(e) of this Act. Such sums shall remain available until expended.".

On page 21, line 2, after the word "established" insert "by non-Federal interests".

On page 21, line 21, strike "ESTABLISHMENT OF TRUSTS" and insert in lieu thereof "STRUCTURE OF THE TRUST".

On page 21, lines 22 and 23, strike "treated as established in accordance with this subsection" and insert in lieu thereof "eligible to receive Federal contributions pursuant to subsection (a)".

On page 22, line 1, after the word "established" insert "by non-Federal interests".

On page 23, line 9, after the word "established" insert "by non-Federal interests".

On page 23, line 10, after the word "if" insert ", in the opinion of the Secretary,".

On page 21, line 12, strike "to the extent that" and insert in lieu thereof "if".

On page 21, line 13, strike "the Federal contribution" and insert in lieu thereof "all Federal contributions".

On page 19, line 19, insert after the period the following: "The surplus crop production charge shall not apply to crops produced in the 5,000 acre Oakes Test Area for research purposes under the direction of the Secretaries of the Interior or Agriculture.".

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, these amendments are offered to clarify several ambiguities which have developed over interpretation of several provisions in H.R. 1116. In addition, they resolve problems identified by the administration with the Wetlands Trust.

The first technical amendment clarifies the intent regarding the nonreimbursable portion of the costs of constructing features that are not employed to their full capacity as a result of this bill and the Commission recommendations. Only the incremental cost of such unused capacity shall be nonreimbursable. Abandoned facilities and the capacity of features employed by the project (such as McClusky Canal) will be reimbursed.

The second amendment provides a separate authorization ceiling for the Indian irrigation service areas to be developed on the Fort Berthold and Standing Rock Indian Reservations. This amendment ensures that this authorization ceiling will not be siphoned off by the non-Indian irrigation works. This amendment does not increase or decrease the total authorizations of appropriations in H.R. 1116, as reported.

The third amendment is intended to clarify that the Wetlands Trust will be established by non-Federal interests through subsequent action, not by enactment of this legislation. Thus, the Wetlands Trust is not a Federal agency, and its board of directors are not officers and employees of the United States by reason of their appointment. This concern was expressed by the administration in their comments on the bill.

The fourth amendment clarifies the financial obligation of the State of North Dakota to the Wetlands Trust. The State is expected to contribute an amount equal to 10 percent of all Federal contributions, including those appropriated in fiscal years 1986 through 1990. In the event that such cost sharing is not provided under arrangements that are mutually acceptable to the Secretary and the Governor, no further Federal contributions will be authorized after fiscal year 1990.

The final technical amendment provides that the surplus crop production charge shall not apply to crops produced in the 5,000-acre Oakes Test Area for research purposes under the direction of the Secretaries of the Interior or Agriculture. Once this area is no longer needed for research purposes, the surplus crop production charge will be assessed.

Mr. Chairman, these technical amendments have been cleared with the minority, and it is my understanding, there is no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER].

The amendments were agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. DASCHLE

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DASCHLE: Page 10, line 3, insert "60 days after" before "the report."

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Chairman, I have a simple amendment to offer to this bill. My amendment requires that the report on James River Valley irrigation features mandated in this legislation be submitted to Congress for 60 days before construction of those features can begin. The intent of my amendment is to strengthen the compromise legislation worked out by the chairman of the subcommittee, my friend from North Dakota, and many others.

This amendment will not damage North Dakota's hopes for responsible water development in any way. As a South Dakotan, I fully understand the critical need for water development in semiarid rural States, and I know firsthand about the Federal Government's longstanding commitment to develop water resources in North Dakota and my State.

Over half-million acres of prime farmland was sacrificed with the construction of the four mainstem dams in South Dakota. Like North Dakota, we were promised significant water development in exchange for this extraordinary sacrifice; and, like North Dakota, we have yet to fully realize our dream for Federal water development. So the last thing I intend to do with this minor amendment is endanger the delivery of responsible water development for our neighbors to the north.

Still, certain aspects of this legislation remain controversial among outdoorsmen, conservationists, and farmers in South Dakota. The authors of this legislation recognized our concerns and agreed to thoroughly study these features to ensure that the livelihoods of landowners along the southern reaches of the James are not threatened by the quality and quantity of irrigation flows returned to the James from the Garrison project.

Section 5(c) of this legislation requires that no construction take place on the Sykeston Canal, the James River Feeder Canal, and James River channelization until the full implications of the construction of those features are reported to Congress. The bill calls for a comprehensive report on the precise impact James River Valley irrigation will have on the beautiful James River in North and South Dakota. I strongly support this provision.

As written, the James River Valley irrigation report is required only to be "completed and submitted to the Congress." My amendment simply requires that this critically important report be submitted for consideration a full 60 days before construction of these multimillion-dollar irrigation features are begun. If this body sees the need for the report in the first place, common sense dictates that we should be given ample time to review its findings once it's completed.

I applaud Mr. DORGAN, the subcommittee chairman, Mr. MILLER, Garrison project sponsors, national conservation groups, and others for working so hard to work toward a consensus on this difficult issue. Still, questions remain in my own mind about the environmental soundness and economic feasibility of the James River Valley irrigation portions of the Garrison reauthorization legislation.

I anticipate that the report called for in this compromise bill will provide the answers to those remaining questions and lead to an informed final decision by Congress in the near future. I urge the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota and commend him for offering this amendment. I think the gentleman has spent time with the committee, drawing our attention to concerns that the people in his State have with the outcome of this project, concerns that they have for the James River area.

I believe this amendment will allow once again for members of this committee and the Congress to focus in and make sure that when the final construction stages of this project go forward, that they do so without any injury or insult to the James River Plain.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of California. Yes, I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, let me reemphasize, as I have on many occasions to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DASCHLE] that it is our intention to be good neighbors. We have worked together on a lot of things in North and South Dakota, Congressman DASCHLE and myself.

It is fully our expectation that the study of the effects on the lower James will guide development. That is precisely why the compromise included the phasing of construction so that construction on the features that would lead to irrigation of the lower James will not be started until after we have that study.

I think the 60-day amendment is a reasonable one. I think it makes sense. I will support it.

Again, as we go through this process, it is the full expectation of those of us in North Dakota to work fully and completely with those of you in South Dakota to make certain that we resolve all these problems.

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I thank the gentleman from North Dakota. That is certainly our intent, the intent of this amendment. We will be working with the gentleman from North Dakota and with those in North Dakota to make sure that the successful conclusion of this effort comes about.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes to engage in a colloquy with the subcommittee chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DASCHLE] is recognized for 2 additional minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to engage in a brief colloquy with the chairman of the subcommittee about the intent of the substitute and the required report on the effects of the Sykeston Canal. James River Feeder Canal, and James River channelization on the James River in South Dakota.

Mr. MILLER of California. I would be pleased to address the gentleman's concerns.

Mr. DASCHLE. First, I thank the gentleman for including section 5(c) of this bill, which puts a hold on these James River Valley irrigation features until a comprehensive report on their effect can be delivered to Congress. That section of the bill is supported by me and by many farmers, outdoorsmen, and conservationists in South Dakota.

I would, however, like to take a moment to clarify the intent of that section. I am concerned that past reports on the effects of Garrison irrigation features have not adequately studied the effects of James River Valley irrigation on the James in South Dakota. Is it the intent of the authors of this legislation that the report required in section 5(c) of this legislation should thoroughly study the environmental and economic impacts on the Sand Lake Wildlife Refuge and the entire southern stretch of the James River in South Dakota?

Mr. MILLER of California. That is clearly the intent. I am quite aware of South Dakota's concerns about the effect of the Garrison project on downstream James River Valley landowners and the James ecosystem in South Dakota. It is my intent that this report fully address those issues as they affect both North and South Dakota.

Mr. DASCHLE. I thank the gentleman and appreciate his assurances. His efforts to address South Dakota's concerns are deeply appreciated.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, I simply again state my support for the amendment. I know of no opposition and I ask for an "aye" vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DASCHLE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word, and I rise to engage in a colloquy with the chairman.

H.R. 1116 makes the Southwest Pipeline in North Dakota an eligible project to receive municipal and industrial water grants. This project is now in an early phase of construction and substantial amounts of State funds have been invested. Would the State funds already expended upon this project be credited toward the required 25 percent non-Federal share of this and other projects?

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I would agree with the gentleman's interpretation. Funds previously expended by the State on the Southwest Pipeline could be credited toward the non-Federal share of the costs of the Southwest Pipeline.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I thank the chairman of the committee for that assurance. I have another colloquy that I would like to engage in with the chairman.

Mr. Chairman, as many of my colleagues know, most of the land taken for construction of the Garrison Dam and Reservoir came from the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation. The project required relocation of 85 percent of the members of the Three Affiliated Tribes which occupy the Fort Berthold Reservation. Lake Sakakawea, which was created when the Missouri River in North Dakota was dammed by the Corps of Engineers, cuts diagonally across the Fort Berthold Reservation. Similarly, Lake Oahe—part of the Oahe Dam project—is situated on the Standing Rock Sioux Reservation in North Dakota.

I point this out to remind my colleagues that North Dakota Indian tribes made substantial contributions to—and sacrifices for—the construction of Garrison Dam. The Garrison Diversion Unit Commission recognized the massive disruption in reservation life created by the Garrison and Oahe projects. Like the State of North Dakota, the Indian tribes gave up their rich river bottom land which provided the economic base of the Indian farming and ranching community.

The Garrison Diversion Unit Commission recognized that significant Garrison-created problems on these reservations must be resolved as part of the overall settlement of the Garrison controversy. Pursuant to the recommendations of the commission, Secretary Hodel, in September 1985, appointed a five-member Joint Tribal Advisory Committee to study the Indian issues identified by the commission.

The JTAC has not yet completed its work and, therefore, its recommendations were not available to the Interior Committee during its work on H.R. 1116. We anticipate, however, that the committee's final report will be filed by the end of May.

Because the JTAC's findings and recommendations were not available to the House Interior Committee, H.R. 1116 contains what should be described as only the first phase of the Dam. The bill authorizes development of limited irrigation systems on both the Fort Berthold and Standing Rock Reservations, following soil surveys, land classifications, and a determination as to the susceptibility to agricultural crop production as required by the act of July 31, 1953, as amended. In addition, the Secretary of the Interior is directed to construct such MR&I water systems as are necessary for the economic, public health, and environmental needs of the reservations, but an authorization ceiling of $20 million is placed on this undertaking.

We fully expect that the JTAC will recommend enhancement of irrigation and MI&R authorizations for the two reservations that it was empaneled to study. I hope that those recommendations, and all recommendations of the JTAC, will receive the careful attention of the Water and Power Resources Subcommittee chaired by my distinguished colleague from California, Mr MILLER. It is my understanding that Chairman MILLER intends to schedule hearings on the JTAC report soon after it is filed. On behalf of the Indians of North Dakota, I look forward to working with him and the subcommittee in drafting appropriate legislation after review of the JTAC's recommendations. I see this legislation as the second phase of the resolution of the Indian-related issues created by the mainstem dams. I hope that we can then move this legislation very soon after the hearings are held.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, the understanding of my distinguished colleague from North Dakota is correct. The Subcommittee on Water and Power Resources will give early consideration to the final recommendations of the Joint Tribal Advisory Committee. I am delighted that he is going to work with us in fashioning legislation after receipt of this report and in moving that legislation along its congressional path.

H.R. 1116 is, among other things, designed to offset the loss of rich North Dakota farmland for the construction of the Garrison Dam and Reservoir. I believe it is important that all elements of North Dakota society, including its Indian tribes, be properly compensated for this loss. In this regard, I look forward to reviewing the final report of the Joint Tribal Advisory Committee. I expect the chairman of that committee, Gen. C. Emerson Murry, to supply my subcommittee with a copy of that final report when he files it with Secretary Hodel. In this way, the subcommittee can immediately commence work on the second phase of the resolution of Garrsion-related Indian issues.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. On behalf of myself and the Indian tribes of my State, I appreciate the support espoused by my colleague and his commitment to resolving these further Garrison issues.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BEDELL

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BEDELL: Page 19, strike out lines 7 through 19 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 9. (a) Until the construction costs of the facilities authorized in section 5 are repaid, the irrigator shall, by contract with the Secretary of the Interior, agree to pay full cost as defined in section 202(3)(A)-(C) of the Reclamation Reform Act of 1982 (P.L. 97-293; 96 Stat. 1263), for the delivery of project water used in the production of any basic agricultural commodity if the total supply of such commodity for the marketing years in which the bulk of the crop would normally be marketed is in excess of the normal supply as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture.

"(b) The Secretary of the Interior shall announce the amount of the full cost payment for the succeeding year on or before July 1 of each year.".

Mr. BEDELL (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BEDELL was allowed to proceed for an additional 15 minutes.)

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BEDELL] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, first of all, let me say that there is no one in this body for whom I have greater regard than my friend, the gentleman from North Dakota, BYRON DORGAN, and rightly or wrongly, I consider him a great friend.

Mr. Chairman, I rise today because I fear that we in the Congress may be shirking a responsibility unless we address one particular part of this legislation.

My amendment, pure and simple, would simply say that people who use Federal water to irrigate crops that are in surplus will have to pay the full cost of that water if they are going to irrigate crops that we are paying other farmers not to grow.

Two of our largest problems at this time would appear to be our budget deficit and the tremendous agricultural surpluses that we face that are such a burden to us. I do not need to talk to this body about the problem with our budget deficit. We have all faced the problem with Gramm-Rudman. We face the problem that we do not have the money we need for health research, for agriculture, for small business, for all the different programs that are important to our society.

I would hope that I would not have to speak about the surplus problem that we have in agriculture. As I serve on that Agriculture Committee, let me tell you, it is not just a problem for us. It is a world problem. You know the cost that we have in trying to take care of that surplus here.

I cannot understand how anybody in this body could say that it makes sense today with the problems we face to pay farmers to grow more crops at the same time we are paying farmers not to grow those very same crops.

Now, it has been brought up, and rightly so, that indeed North Dakota gave up something and they are entitled to some reimbursement and some benefits back. But let me read to you what was in the 1965 Garrison Act as we passed it:

For a period of 10 years from the date of enactment of this Act, no water from the project authorized by this Act shall be delivered to any water user for the production on newly irrigated lands of any basic agricultural commodity as defined in the Agriculture Act of 1949, or any amendment thereof, if the total supply of such commodity for the marketing year in which the bulk of the crop would normally be marketed is in excess of the normal supply as defined in section 301(B)10 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, unless the Secretary of Agriculture calls for an increase in production of such commodity in the interest of national security.

This provision in the 1965 law recognized that we should not be supplying subsidized water to grow crops that were in surplus. The problem is that the 10-year prohibition has now expired. That was a standard provision that was inserted in dozens of authorization projects at that time.

□ 1115

My amendment is clearly consistent with congressional intent on the Garrison Diversion project as expressed some 20 years ago. The only difference is, my amendment is less harsh. The original law said that you could not deliver any water. My amendment says you can deliver water, but beneficiaries will have to pay the full cost to the taxpayers.

Some people say, "Look, this is unfair because this is a new proposal and it only applies to Garrison." I have here a list of some 43 projects on which the legislation provided that water would not be supplied to provide for the growth of surplus crops.

It is true in many of those cases that it said from 10 years from the date of authorization, and that that term has expired in many of those cases. But clearly, the prohibition has been the intent for some long time. Indeed, in some of these projects, the prohibition is not only for 10 years from the date of authorization; it is for 10 years from the date that the project was indeed completed.

In addition to that, in 1982 during House debate on the Reclamation Reform Act, which has set the water policy for our country, an amendment was adopted. My amendment, which I offered, was adopted here on the House floor by voice vote and read as follows:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no water from any Federal reclamation project authorized after the date of enactment of this Act shall be delivered within 10 years of the date irrigation water is first made available to construction blocks within such project for the irrigation of any" surplus crop.

We passed that here in the House, clearly showing that that was our desire. What happened was that it went to a conference committee and the conference committee weakened it to say we should have a study. The study was completed, and let me read to you from the study by the USDA's Economic Research Service:

Reclamation and commodity program goals conflict. The Nation should develop and articulate a policy on the desired linkage between the long-term agricultural capacity needs and the short-term agriculture stability and income objectives.

Further, in the conclusion:

Requiring farmers who use USBR water to pay full costs for water used on program crops as long as the crop is declared in surplus represents a policy strategy to eliminate one of the subsidies, the subsidy provided by the USBR program.

Under this plan, USBR farmers would be placed on a comparable basis with other program crop producers in the Nation.

I repeat that: They would be placed on an equal basis with other program crop producers in the Nation.

National production efficiency would be expected to improve, as production would move toward areas of comparative advantage. Program costs would be reduced due to lower production and higher prices. Administrative costs would increase somewhat to insure compliance. The use of full-cost pricing for project water on farms in excess of 960 acres already is a feature of Public Law 97-293.

Clearly, that study pointed out what we are doing is subsidizing water to grow more crops at the same time we are paying farmers not to grow those same crops.

We have a letter, as well, from the Department of the Interior. This is dated March 6, 1986. Let me read from the letter of the Department of the Interior.

We believe that the time has arrived to remove the SRPA program from Federal interest subsidies. In these times of Federal budget exigencies and large surpluses of agricultural production, we can no longer afford to grant interest-free SRPA loans for irrigation-related purposes.

Let me give an example of this subsidy situation, and I hope my colleagues will catch this, and particularly the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE], because he has been greatly concerned, I think, over some of the costs of our agricultural programs. I would hope the gentleman would listen to this to understand exactly how this would work.

For example, the average-size farm to be irrigated in this bill is 278 acres. The subsidy that the taxpayers will be paying is $300 per acre per year. That means we will be subsidizing the average farmer to the tune of $83,400 to supply him the water each year.

But that is not the biggest part of the problem. The problem is, if he were to grow corn on that land and we have too much corn, then we are going to have to somehow get other farmers to reduce the amount of corn that they grow. The way our farm program works is that we tell farmers, "If you will set aside 20 percent, or one-fifth of your land, we will pay you a payment on the corn you grow on the rest of your land." Therefore, for every 1 bushel of corn we reduce, we have to pay farmers for producing 4 bushels that they produce on the rest of their land.

The Department of Agriculture estimates that that payment will be $1.11 per bushel. That means that we have to pay $1.11 per bushel for 4 bushels to get 1 bushel reduced, or we have to pay $4.44 per bushel for every extra bushel of corn that has to be reduced. Multiplying by 278 acres, this means that the taxpayers will not only be subsidizing that average farmer for $83,400 each year; they will have to subsidize other farmers $150,338, or nearly twice as much, per year to reduce production to offset the first farmer's increase.

I do not see how we can possibly say that that is the thing to do with the problems that we have at this time in our budget.

We have said that this is a delicate compromise. I understand that. But I hope we understand who made the compromise. This compromise was negotiated between the State of North Dakota and two environmental organizations, the National Wildlife Federation and the National Audubon Society. That is perfectly proper. We should concern ourselves with the environment. I might mention that two other environmental organizations support my amendment, and we have letters to show that, the Sierra Club and the National Resources Defense Council.

But that is not really the issue. The issue is, what is it that we are here to do in service to our people? My contention is that it is not up to us to let the environmentalists and some States decide how we are going to spend our tax money and what is going to happen to our taxpayers. My contention is that that is what we are here for. We are here to determine how money is to be spent. For us to say that we are going to give that duty to two environmental organizations in one State, and then say for every dollar they spend that we are going to have to spend 2 more dollars trying to take care of the surpluses that could be created if they do that simply does not make any sense.

I guess the greatest concern I have is whether or not we are going to decide that it is our responsibility to decide what we do in regard to the expenditures of funds from our Federal taxpayers.

□ 1125

Mr. STRANG. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Reclamation law currently requires full repayment with the entire Federal reimbursable project investment, without interest in the case of irrigation, during a period generally not to exceed 50 years. Traditionally part of this is paid by the irrigators and the remainder is paid by power customers.

I would reiterate, the remainder is paid by power customers. This committee proposal would add to the irrigator's portion of the repayment a surcharge equal to 10 percent of full cost, as defined in the Reclamation Reform Act of 1982.

This charge would have to be paid solely by the irrigator. In the case of Garrison, for example, this charge would amount to an increase of about 75 percent over the irrigator's currently calculated total ability to pay.

In short, the committee proposal, the compromise before us will be a significant disincentive to the production of surplus crops.

The Bedell proposal would require payment of 100 percent of full cost for irrigation water used to grow surplus crops. This cost would have to be borne solely by the irrigators and would exceed by a factor of at least 500 percent the calculated irrigator's ability to pay.

In short, the Bedell proposal would effectively be a complete ban on the growing of surplus crops on the Garrison project. Unlike traditional agriculture, irrigation projects are long-term development investments.

Additional, dependable production capability which does not depend on weather cycles is desirable for the long term. It should not be made totally contingent on a short-run decision about crop surpluses. However, this will be the impact of the Bedell amendment which may well prevent new irrigation projects from being built in a large part of the West, and possibly force abandonment of existing projects at contract renewal.

The Bedell amendment will effectively destroy the Garrison compromise. It will, therefore, prevent this project from providing important benefits to the local and national economies by using a scarce resource, water.

I should not have to point out to anybody from the Midwest or the Farm Belt that the farm community is in trouble. This bill is antifarm, antihomestead, this measure, this amendment, antifarm, antihomestead, and antiopportunity.

The opportunity to use less land to grow the same amount of crops should be regarded by anybody from Iowa as an absolutely magical proposal. To take away this opportunity under a shortsighted attempt to talk about the surplus problem, when, in fact, we are getting at the surplus problem with our current farm legislation, is to deny those farming communities and those families in North Dakota, the opportunity for a future and for opportunity.

I think the amendment is very damaging and strongly oppose it.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRANG. Mr. Chairman, I yield to my friend, the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman talked about the short run surpluses. Does the gentleman believe that our agricultural surpluses are short run?

Mr. STRANG. The agricultural surpluses have been long run. I believe the direction of our farm policies are going to make them shorter run; I certainly hope so.

Mr. BEDELL. If the gentleman will yield further, our farm policies try to control those surpluses by paying farmers not to grow crops. Is that not correct?

Mr. STRANG. I think perhaps it is correct. I do not think it is germane to the gentleman's amendment nor to my comments.

Mr. BEDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRANG. I yield further to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BEDELL. The gentleman said that the farm community is in trouble because of surpluses.

Mr. STRANG. My remarks to the gentleman and to this body, to the Chair, were directed at the problem that the farm community does not need one more hammering by withdrawing opportunity from that community. This particular amendment takes away opportunity.

I do not think I want to do that to the Farm Belt, nor do I think this body does.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. STRANG. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BEDELL].

Mr. BEDELL. At least I think the Agriculture Committee would tell you, and I think the farmers across the country would tell you that indeed our farmers are in trouble and they are in trouble because of surpluses. If the farmers are in trouble because of surpluses, then this gentleman thinks that it does not make very much sense to spend taxpayers' money to increase those surpluses.

This gentleman's amendment is simply an effort to improve the bill. I do not see how Members can very well sit here and say that we think it makes sense to spend taxpayers' money to increase our farm surpluses at a time when we are also spending large amounts of taxpayers' money to reduce those surpluses.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. STRANG] has expired.

(On request of Mr. BEDELL, and by unanimous consent, Mr. STRANG was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. STRANG. Mr. Chairman, I further yield to my friend, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BEDELL].

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman feel that when he talked about the 10-percent disincentives, does he believe that 10-percent disincentives would, indeed, prevent irrigators from using irrigated water to grow crops that are not surplus?

Mr. STRANG. Mr. Chairman, with all due respect to my friend from Iowa, I find his arithmetic a little bit voodoo and since the Socratic manner is not an opportunity in which two can engage simultaneously with any profit, I would ask the gentleman if any farm groups support the Bedell amendment?

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the farm groups support it or oppose it. I have certainly not contacted any. I do not know that the farm groups even know that this is an issue. I think this is an issue that should be addressed by us in the Congress.

I think it is an issue of how we spend our money.

Would the gentleman want to answer or not, I do not trying to press you, does the gentleman believe that the 10-percent disincentive would cause farmers not to grow crops that are not surplus?

Mr. STRANG. In response to the gentleman's question, reclaiming my time, I would say that that disincentive, yes, would help. I would also point out that these are very long projects. Garrison is for all time. This is a final solution. These disincentives, coupled with a trend away from subsidies in our farm policies, will provide those people with an opportunity for a small portion of the promises made by this Government 40 years ago. This amendment, unintentionally, wreaks great havoc to that promise.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRANG. Mr. Chairman, I am happy to yield to my friend, the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, is it the gentleman's understanding that this surcharge which exists in this compromise is the only surcharge of its type in the United States? In other words, with all of the reclamation out there, with all of the irrigation from these reclamation projects that exists, we have agreed in this compromise to impose a surcharge and it will be the only surcharge that exists. The surcharge is 10 percent.

What the gentleman from Iowa is suggesting is that in this instance where the only surcharge will exist, 10 percent is not satisfactory; it must be 100 percent of less than 1 percent of all of the irrigation in the western part of the United States. Is that not exactly what we are talking about?

Mr. STRANG. That is my understanding. I would point out that, for example, you cannot resolve all the surplus problems in agriculture in the United States on the backs of the citizens of North Dakota, nor is it a good place to start.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. STRANG. I am happy to yield to my friend from Iowa.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has made a point that this is a new thing in terms of charging a charge for the use of that water, 10 percent of the cost, but it should also in fairness be pointed out that there are a number of projects where it is absolutely prohibited from using water for surplus crops production. It seems to me that telling them they have to pay the cost of the water is much less onerous than telling them they cannot use the water no matter what.

Mr. STRANG. Mr. Chairman, reclaiming my time, I would offer by way of response the comment that this amendment, if passed, will simply deny them the opportunity to use the water ever.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. STRANG. I am happy to yield to my friend, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BEDELL].

□ 1140

Mr. BEDELL. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. STRANG. I am happy to yield to my friend.

Mr. BEDELL. Because I want to be quite clear as to, because that was confusing, I felt, a little bit yesterday in our debate in regard to the taxpayer cost. It was brought up that the electric users would have to pay 85 percent of the capital cost of the project.

The gentleman does agree, does he not, that when the Government goes and borrows money for this project, the Government is going to have to pay interest on the money it borrows to construct the project. Does he agree to that?

Mr. STRANG. I would agree to that.

Mr. BEDELL. And I assume the gentleman agrees that in this bill there is no interest cost to anyone; that they only have to pay the capital cost. So the taxpayers are going to have to subsidize each year the interest cost on that capital cost.

If we have got $700 million of investment and if the interest cost is 6.5 percent, which I was advised has been the rate on short term government securities, that is $45.5 million, which is $350 per acre per year that we will indeed, that taxpayers will be subsidizing to cover the interest cost on the investment.

Mr. STRANG. If I might reclaim my time on this matter. Those are statistics which will not be borne out, because they choose to ignore the return to the Government from productivity. That is always left out of these arguments; there is always this austere argument that the Government is simply having to pay.

I reject that argument, and I furthermore feel that this body has got to recognize an absolutely magnificent compromise made.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. STRANG was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. STRANG. A compromise which is supported by the strongest traditional opponents of this project. That has to send a message. We are a nation of compromise. We are also a nation of heart, and I think that to pull the rug from under the people who have relied on something out of Garrison for 45 years, would be a tragedy to the farm community.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have 2 additional minutes.

Mr. STRANG. Mr. Chairman, I yield back my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman does not desire the time.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I rise to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment and would like to say, this is a case of creating a condition and then debating that condition with yourself. This is not a debate, I believe, that the gentleman from Iowa is having with me or with the chairman of the subcommittee. We happen to agree, philosophically, with the sort of thing the gentleman is saying.

The facts the gentleman are alleging are not necessarily the case. The facts that he suggests or implies are that we are going to have a lot of land that is not now currently producing surplus crops go into the production of surplus crops, which is going to disadvantage some farmers someplace else. That is not the fact, and I will describe that in just a moment.

The gentleman has said, in supporting his amendment, that his intention is to try and move away from the production of crops which are in surplus. We agree. That is why in this compromise, there is a 10-percent surcharge on surplus crops. That is, water used to produce crops that are declared in excess of surplus is subject to a 10-percent surcharge.

The gentleman from Iowa will readily admit that that condition does not exist anywhere else; it does not exist in other States in the western reclamation areas; it exists only in this compromise.

Because we philosophically agree with what he is trying to do—but it is interesting to me to note that what he is trying to do with his amendment, in my judgment, is exactly the opposite of what he is telling us on the floor. That is, the result of his amendment will in my judgment lead to more production of crops that are in surplus or excess.

Let me explain why, just for a moment. The gentleman from Iowa knows, because I told him the other day, that the land that is going to be irrigated in North Dakota with this reformulated project predominantly at this point does grow crops that are in surplus or excess.

The gentleman also knows, because I told him a couple of days ago, that of the private irrigation in North Dakota at the present time, 90 percent of it is nonsurplus crop irrigation, because largely the surplus crops; the corn, the wheat and so on, do not lend themselves to the kind of irrigation practices that the gentleman is alluding to.

In fact, what we are raising are forage crops, alfalfa; we have the capacity for dry, edible beans—the crops that are not program crops in the USDA Program. Now, it seems to me that the gentleman from Iowa is here on the floor because he would want more of that land that is to be irrigated to move from surplus crops into nonsurplus crops; forage crops, specialty crops, I assume dry, edible beans and so on. I assume that is the gentleman's intent.

If that is his intent, it seems to me he would want to allow the flexibility for farmers to move from their current production approaches to the ability to produce those forage crops and edible beans, and in order to do that, obviously to get the irrigation apparatus, to get the kind of structure you want in the economy, perhaps some bean processing plants and so on; you have got to have some time, some interval to accomplish that.

I think what the gentleman is saying is immediately there is a 100-percent penalty that exists if this amendment passes; and I say to the gentleman from Iowa that what that means is that in the long run we are not going to have irrigation. In the long run, if we do not have that kind of irrigation in those areas, they are going to produce what they are now producing; those are crops that are in surplus.

So I think that the amendment the gentleman raises simply defeats the purpose the gentleman expresses.

Let me make one other point, if I might, Mr. Chairman. This is the wrong place for the gentleman to be trying to make this policy; and I think he admitted that the other day. This is the wrong place to make that policy. The gentleman says it is the only place. It is a convenient place, but it is the wrong place.

If the gentleman's policy is to say that those who use irrigation water in parts of this country should never be able to use irrigation water with respect to crops that are declared in excess of surplus at some given time; and yes, this excess or surplus crop is temporary; anybody who does not believe that I think has not studied the world food supply situation.

If the gentleman from Iowa really wants to press his point and apply some uniform, fair standard—at least fair in his mind—to irrigated acres through the Bureau of Reclamation, then do that; but do not do it here on less than 1 percent of the irrigated acres with a 100-percent fee—that is not reasonable.

It is not reasonable at all, in my judgment, and not appropriate.

Again, I think the gentleman will do exactly the opposite of what he is standing here today telling us he intends to do.

So, my friends, I would suggest that we dispense with the Bedell amendment, defeat the Bedell amendment, retain in this legislation a 10-percent surcharge which will exist as the only surcharge on any of these reclamation project irrigation features in this country; and I think that is a very reasonable approach; it was a hard-fought compromise.

(On request of Mr. BEDELL, and by unanimous consent, Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota was allowed to proceed for 4 additional minutes.)

Mr. BEDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BEDELL. I particularly appreciate the opportunity to be heard, Mr. Chairman, because the last thing I would want to do is appear to be trying to single out my good friend from North Dakota.

The fact is, that in my amendment, which in 1982 did pass with a uniform standard that went further than this—it said "you can't even use water for that." Unfortunately that was knocked out in the conference committee. The House supported that and agreed to that.

This is the next bill. If it had been any other bill, I certainly would be doing the same thing. This is the way the project works, and this is what we have to do.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. If I might reclaim my time. The gentleman will admit, of course, that to have a project exist that has a 100-percent penalty with less than 1 percent of the irrigation and all the rest of the 99 percent of the irrigation have no penalty seems a contradictory policy.

At least the result, if the gentleman's amendment passes, would be to create a terribly uneven situation. Would the gentleman admit to that?

Mr. BEDELL. Yes. I guess the question is, if something is wrong, should we correct it, or since it has been wrong, should we say we are going to keep doing it wrong for the rest of our lives? My opinion is that we should correct it.

Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Yes, I will be glad to yield.

Mr. BEDELL. Does the gentleman believe that 10 percent would stop growing of surplus crops?

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Well, we talked about that the other day. In my judgment, the 10 percent will largely impede the irrigator from growing surplus crops, yes.

Mr. BEDELL. See, if it would stop it, it seems to me then we ought to have decent water policy which I would feel is 100 percent, and not have the taxpayers have to subsidize to grow crops, at the same time we are paying not to grow them, if that is the case.

If I can go further, the gentleman said that he needed time. How long will it be until this thing is completed and people start getting water from this project?

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Let me reclaim my time. The gentleman creates a case and then beats it over the head, and it is not a case at all. The case is not that we are going to have acres and acres of irrigation in the Lower James of North Dakota that is going to produce surplus crops.

That is not the case, and so you can create that and debate it and beat it, but it is not the case.

What I was trying to say to the gentleman earlier is that a 10-percent surcharge, in my judgment, is a very reasonable approach; one that does single us out, and one that the gentleman nodded his head affirmatively to that is probably an uneven policy to single us out; but one, nonetheless, that we accept.

Mr. BEDELL. If the gentleman will yield further. I am told the Garrison Study Commission projected for dry land farming in the South, 39-percent surplus crops; and with irrigation, it would be 75 percent. In the North, 25 percent going to 60-percent surplus crops.

□ 1150

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. I can tell you the preponderance of the crops grown now in areas that will be irrigated are crops that are declared to be in excess. I can also say the crops grown on land that is irrigated in North Dakota is like 90-percent nonsurplus crops. Most of the experts I have talked to indicate that the crops that will be grown on this irrigated land will be forage crops such as alfafa, such as dry edible beans, specialty crops that people can move in and out of. The last thing, I think, in the world that our farmers want to do is raise more crops that are in surplus that have a low price attached to them. A low commodity price does not get you much when you go to the country elevator. Your farmers in Iowa, I am sure, do not want to produce crops that are in surplus and find out when they harvest and sell them they do not get any money.

The gentleman from Colorado said this is a compromise. Well, it is a compromise of a lot of things. The State of the gentleman from Iowa, and he knows this well, his State has received substantial benefits from this project. He has never been down to the floor lauding that or complaining about it. It is part of what we do as neighbors. We build a project, some people get benefits, other people get costs. But all of us were promised, and this is part of the benefits structure that we were promised. In putting this together, we decided there were people like the gentleman from Iowa who felt very strongly about the surplus crop issue. We could not come out with a compromise that said let us have no surcharge. In fact, we created a surcharge and much to the consternation of some people around here, incidentally, who do not want to see a surcharge. But we created one and it is the only one that will exist.

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

This proposal to amend the project helps fulfill a commitment made to North Dakota over 40 years ago.

Perhaps no reclamation project has been the subject of as much study and restudy as the Garrison diversion project.

During the most recent formulation of the project, all points of view; Federal, State, local, agricultural, and evironmental, were carefully considered.

After consideration, all points of view were welded into the compromise package which is embodied in H.R. 1116 and is supported by all affected interested parties.

The project would be significantly scaled down in scope while cost-sharing requirements and fish and wildlife mitigation features would be significantly increased.

The scaled-down project represents a savings of $800 million below the current authorized project and $2.6 billion less than the project as originally authorized.

The project, as scaled down by H.R. 1116, already requires higher cost sharing than is currently required for other reclamation projects.

A key feature of this higher cost sharing is a 10-percent surcharge for farmers using irrigation water for surplus crops.

If H.R. 1116 is approved, Garrison will be the only project in the country with a surcharge for irrigation water used for surplus crops.

The surcharge not only supplements the existing cost sharing requirements of Federal reclamation law but provides a major incentive to farmers to grow nonsurplus crops.

As a farmer myself, I can assure you that a 10-percent surcharge for water provides a tremendous incentive to grow nonsurplus crops.

Increasing the surcharge will have the effect of discouraging a change away from surplus crops.

In order to shift to nonsurplus crops, farmers need time to allow for crop rotation and the purchase of different farm and irrigation equipment.

Irrigation water needs to be available and in place in order to make it possible to shift to nonsurplus crops.

A 100-percent surcharge will result in farmers not using irrigation water and continuing to farm as before.

If this amendment is adopted, it will not kill the project—it will kill the compromise—a compromise that greatly reduces the scope and cost of the project.

Good projects make good neighbors. We in Minnesota, Iowa, South Dakota, and other States in the region have benefited from the electricity, navigation and flood control benefits of Garrison.

It is time the citizens of North Dakota, who gave up five counties worth of their land, should derive at least a portion of the benefits from the project.

I note that the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee carefully considered the gentleman's amendment but rejected it by a 4-to-1 margin.

I urge my colleagues in the House to do likewise.

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the Bedell amendment to H.R. 1116 to require producers to pay full cost of water from the Garrison diversion unit as a condition for producing corn and other basic program crops designated by the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

The issue that accompanies all water-project legislation is under what terms and conditions shall the United States continue to develop its water resources.

Yes, we have surpluses now. Yes, agricultural land is a glut on the market. Yes, we have a budget deficit.

But the world is living hand-to-mouth. Surpluses of commodities and of land could disappear over night. It could stop raining in the incomparable Midwest.

The Garrison diversion unit and the O'Neill unit are not isolated projects, although they must stand on their own merits. They are, additionally, part of the mighty 10-State Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin Program. This program, begun in the 1940's is a long-range development program of water planning.

It contemplates the construction of about 150 water projects such as the Garrison and O'Neill projects, but some were designed for flood control, some for navigation, some for recreation, for municipal and industrial water supplies, and, yes, some for irrigation.

The intent of the Interior Committee in bringing forth this compromise bill at this time is to establish certain new precedents in this project that could be made applicable to other water projects not yet constructed.

Because Nebraska has reached a new consensus on a major water project in our State, a project known as the O'Neill unit, I am deeply concerned how the House disposes of this bill that reformulates and reauthorizes Garrison.

If Garrison is the stalking horse for other projects in other States, then Nebraskans must examine this legislation with care because the fate of the O'Neill unit, as would be modified in my bill, H.R. 1590, could well be decided also by the fate of Garrison.

Frankly, I am deeply opposed to any restriction on production of surplus crops in Federal water projects because it is unfair. It is unfair because similar restrictions do not yet exist in other Federal water projects. It is unfair to make national policy on a project-by-project basis. Policy should be made by the Congress in the usual way—by passing comprehensive, broad-based legislation that includes policy determinations affecting all producers everywhere.

Nevertheless, on the floor today, here, now, the committee has brought forth a bill that proposes to penalize producers in the Garrison project by an amount equal to 10 percent of the full cost of water produced in this Federal project. The committee rejected an amendment to eliminate this unfair provision. And it also rejected the Bedell amendment, which, of course, is far, far more unreasonable and unfair than the provision already in the bill.

So, the reclamation States, like Nebraska, are supposed to be glad that the surplus crop production surcharge is "only" 10 percent of full cost and not some higher figure.

I oppose the Bedell amendment because it is so bad and not because what is in the bill as presented to us is so terribly attractive.

We are seeking modification of the project in my State, the O'Neill unit.

Now, in this bill modifying the Garrison diversion unit, we in Nebraska can see the handwriting on the wall. This restriction on crop production is not and never will be on our agenda. It is an issue being forced upon the reclamation West by people who lack full understanding of the mystical importance of water in areas that do not have much precipitation compared to more fortunate regions of the East and Midwest.

Here in the House, which is increasingly dominated by urban-based Members, we have an increasingly tough job of education and reeducation with respect to water resource development in the United States.

We are building a 100-mile-long subway here in Washington, DC, for an amount approaching the $15 billion total investment in the reclamation West over the last 80 years. And that subway will never produce anything—surplus or otherwise—besides a spiraling operating loss that is projected soon to be an annual $300 million. And it is not even finished yet.

We are recommissioning battleships, which some experts say are totally obsolete and of only limited use, at costs in excess of what our O'Neill unit will cost, and, not far, I assume, from what Garrison's completion will cost.

And we are building the subway and fixing up the battleships with almost no outcry or clamor about the wisdom of such large public investments.

Yet, water projects, which produce food, make efficient use of water and return much of it to original sources, and create tax revenues, jobs, and other economic benefits—water projects are reviled as wasteful, pork-barrel political payoffs to Members of Congress.

I ask you what Communist country would not gladly exchange their system's discredited, inefficient agricultural disasters for our system. What sub-Sahara land, and Ethiopa, would not sacrifice its gross national product for our water resources development complex?

The Bedell amendment eventually would stop U.S. water development dead in its tracks if it is approved by the Congress and then becomes the pattern for other water projects.

The reason is simple. Farmers still have free choice in this country. Under Federal law, Federal water projects must have local sponsors capable of contracting for repaying part of the construction costs.

Under State laws, local sponsors can organize themselves into irrigation districts with taxing powers. But, in most States, farmers may petition out of these districts. They don't have to be in the the water project if they don't want to be.

At full cost, which in the case of the O'Neill unit would be around $300 per acre per year for 40 years, what farmer in his right mind would sign up for the project water?

Even at 10 percent of full cost, or $30, I question whether O'Neill unit producers would, under present circumstances, sign up for the project.

In my view, it makes little sense to set a flat "surplus crop production charge" for 10 percent of full cost before knowing, with respect to O'Neill, at least, how much the project will cost or when it may be completed. Far wiser, I say, would be to make the 10 percent a ceiling figure, instead of the bill's imperative directing a charge "equal to 10 percent of full cost * * *."

I wish to associate myself with the arguments against the Bedell amendment in a letter to Members dated April 22, 1986, and signed by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. DORGAN] and the gentleman from Minnestoa [Mr. STANGELAND].

I agree that the proposed amendment would destory the hard-won compromise on the Garrison project. I agree, for now, that we will have to accept the 10 percent.

And while I urge my colleagues to reject the Bedell amendment and approve the committee bill as presented to the House, I serve notice that I will oppose the inclusion in my bill, H.R. 1590, modifying the O'Neill unit in Nebraska, of not only any provision requiring full-cost penalty but any crop restriction at all.

If such a restriction is forced onto my bill, I will thereupon seek the guidance of my State's water policymakers and local sponsors as to whether to proceed further.

To reiterate, Mr. Chairman, I oppose the Bedell amendment, and I ask the House to reject it.

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, first to all, I would like to begin by commending the people who were responsible for negotiating out the bill that is before us. It is a very good bill, and I urge commendation of this House for them finally breaking a logjam which we have had in this area for quite a while, and getting it behind us.

Mr. Chairman, the author of the amendment, our beloved friend from Iowa, Mr. BEDELL, has decided to retire at the end of this session, his amendment will improve this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the gentleman's amendment.

I am aware that penalties for surplus commodity production are already in the bill. However, I have my doubts that the bill's penalties are severe enough to ensure that the newly irrigated lands won't be used for surplus crop production. There is no reason the Federal Government should provide any irrigation subsidy to farmers who use these lands for producing surplus commodities.

Farm programs are costing the taxpayers billions of dollars a year. It seems to me that we should make every effort to make sure that other Government programs don't result in increased production of commodities that are already in surplus. This gentleman's amendment gives us the opportunity to do just that.

The new farm bill established a huge conservation reserve under which we will pay farmers to take 40 million acres out of production over the next 5 years, in addition to the millions of acres of annual set-asides under the wheat and feed grains program. It would be ridiculous for us to turn around and pay irrigation subsidies to farmers in North Dakota for bringing new land into production of those surplus crops.

If a farmer still wants to produce these crops, let him pay the full costs of production as farmers in other States do. Let's make sure we aren't spending the taxpayers money to add to the surplus with these newly irrigated lands when we're already spending their money to reduce it. I urge my colleagues to support the amendment.

□ 1205

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETRI. I yield to my colleague from Iowa.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his statement.

I would like to point out just one or two things. First of all, the House clearly has spoken on this issue in 1982 when we passed in the House a provision with regard to water policy that said you simply will not deliver water for surplus crops. This is less onerous than that. And the only way we are going to get it if that was knocked out is each time come through and keep it in, since the House has already spoken. This is an effort to comply with what the House has already said.

The biggest concern that this gentleman has goes way beyond the cost of the subsidy for growing crops. It is that it will cost us about $2 more in additional subsidy to get other farmers not to grow those crops that we are paying farmers to grow.

Mr. STRANG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETRI. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STRANG. Mr. Chairman, I respect the gentleman's arguments, and I understand that nobody in this body, and would agree nobody in this body wants to participate in a plan which would simply have the Congress in the position of stimulating vast acreages of already surplus crops.

Mr. Chairman, I would ask my friend to listen to the words of our colleague from North Dakota, who pointed out that when you can put irrigation into a community and you have a community in which the only crops available are surplus crops because it is dry land, you cannot reasonably expect the crops to come irrigation to be surplus crops out of the self-interest of the farmer.

This particular amendment takes away from the farmer the opportunity cost which he simply must have to get through this greatest crisis in 50 years.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETRI. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, like a lot of Members, I am caught in a difficult spot; first, because of my respect for the work done by Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota and others. I mean, Congressman DORGAN is one of the bright present and future leaders of our country, and I am sure of North Dakota. I respect the gentleman a great deal. And between the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BEDELL], who I hate to see leave this body. The gentleman adds a great deal to our common sense.

But the question I have in listening to the debate today is if we do not want to pay farmers to grow surplus crops or to subsidize them, why do we not prohibit that in the bill? I think that is what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BEDELL] has tried to do.

Everyone says we are opposed to subsidizing the growth of surplus crops. Why do we not make that point?

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, let me say to Members of the House that I have stood with my colleague, Mr. BEDELL, in the last 12 years trying to reform reclamation projects. I have participated in and led fights against projects since my first year in this Congress that I felt were boondoggles, that I felt were pork barrel, that I felt did not meet the public interests.

The Garrison project was one of those projects. I voted many times against it, because I felt that it could not be justified.

A couple of years ago, the Appropriations Committee decided that they would make one last chance, that they would send this project back to the people of North Dakota, that they would send this project back to those people who were divided about it, to the Canadians, to the environmental groups, to those who were concerned about the local economies, to those who were concerned about the economies of this project, and see if they could reformulate it.

The commission reported this project. We took that commission, massaged it further, made further reforms, made it even tougher than that commission, and brought this project at the mandate of the Appropriations Committee to the floor of this Congress.

The provision that we are now arguing over, for those who are new to this fight, let me say is a major reform. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BEDELL] is correct when the gentleman says the previous law had a restriction on the delivery of subsidized water to newly irrigated land. But the people who put that in put it in for window dressing. They put it in to convince Members of Congress that somehow when we started irrigating lands in the fifties and the sixties in California that that would not hurt southern cotton, that that would not hurt crops in the southeastern part of the United States.

But do you know what? It never went into effect because it said it was from 10 years to the date of enactment of the bill, and it took longer than 10 years to build each and every one of these projects. So, in fact, it was window dressing.

Then we tried, and Congressman BEDELL introduced in the Reclamation Reform Act of 1982, a provision that would have tried to do the same thing in that bill. That was rejected by the House and the Senate in the conference report of the Reclamation Reform Act.

What we have here is the first real opportunity to reform the manner in which we deliver subsidized water in major Federal reclamation projects. It is my very honest belief, and I say this to Members of the Congress who I am asking to vote for this, that I am using my capital with and my credentials, as one who has participated in this fight, that this provision would not allow for the growth of those subsidized crops because the farmer would not find it in his economic interest to do so.

This is a substantial surcharge. This is over and above what the farmer will have to pay for the full repayment of this project back to the Federal Government. And that surcharge, certainly in this farm economy and in any farm economy that we see in the future, is the deterrent.

I think you have already heard a number of people speak against the Bedell amendment, and also speak against the committee, because they understand what we are doing. We are playing for keeps in this bill. This is a 10-percent surcharge when those crops are declared surplus.

I agree, and I have fought projects in my own State. I have fought with my colleagues from my own State with projects that they have, because I did not believe we should be doing what Congressman BEDELL has pointed out here. I believe that this is a deterrent. This is not some kind of window dressing to get you all to vote for it. This is not some kind of effort to pretend like we are doing something to be hard on this part when we are not. What we are doing here is a major, major redirection.

It is like what we have in some of the public works bills with local cost sharing. What we are saying to this farmer is, you want to participate in growing surplus crops with federally subsidized water, you are going to pay a penalty. You are going to pay a fee, and we believe in structuring this fee, given the cost of this project, that that will be a deterrent to that decision by that farmer.

Now I think that that is the best we can politically do, and that is far different from anything that has happened in either the Senate or the House in the 12 years I have been here with respect to reclamation.

Garrison provides us the opportunity to do that. It is the granddaddy of the water projects at this time. It is one that has been controversial. Let me say that it was not an easy time getting people to agree to this. But I think they also understand our own problems here in terms of the Federal budget. They also understand the farm economy and the weakness there. They understand the competition from farmers in other areas.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. MILLER of California was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. MILLER of California. They understand the competition from farmers in other areas who do not want to see this kind of competition. We believe that this will withdraw that.

We had a provision in California. But do you know what? It never went into effect either there, because by the time the Department of Agriculture had made its determinations in surplus crops, the farmers had already made their investment. Then they were told after the fact, so it was continuously waived for 10 years.

This one is real. This one is real. It is up front. And I think it is a correction in policy that has been badly needed over the years.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman does agree, does he not, that in 1982 the House passed legislation that said that surplus water will simply not be delivered for the production of surplus crops? Does the gentleman agree to that?

Mr. MILLER of California. I agree with that, and I believe that I supported that amendment by the gentleman.

Mr. BEDELL. And the gentleman does agree that there are projects at this time on which that is in effect, does he not?

□ 1215

Mr. MILLER of California. None that I know of.

Mr. BEDELL. Well, let me read them to you. The San Juan Channel, initial stage, in the Colorado River project, the Navajo Indian—you have the list there, I think. The one's and two's are projects in which the surplus crops cannot be grown for 10 years after.

Mr. MILLER of California. Let me say to the gentleman that the Reclamation Reform Act carries with it—

Notwithstanding any other provision of this law in the case of Federal reclamation projects authorized before the date of enactment, any restriction prohibiting the delivery of irrigated water for the production of excess.

That is my whole point, that that act in fact was not real, that in fact it did not prevent what you and I tried for years to prevent from happening. And I believe an upfront surcharge, in fact, will meet that goal that you and I have fought for in the Congress and that it is your goal today in offering your amendment. I think, in fact, this is the politically palatable way that you can do it without the absolute prohibition. I think the result is the same.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER] has expired.

(On request of Mr. BEDELL and by unanimous consent, Mr. MILLER of California was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes)

Mr. BEDELL. Does the gentleman agree that in this proposal, as it is in the bill, that farmers would pay 10 percent of the cost of delivering the water and the taxpayers would pay 90 percent; is that correct?

Mr. MILLER of California. That is not the case. The farmers are going to pay full O&M, as the Reclamation Reform Act requires, and then the farmers are going to pay an additional fee based upon—we needed to come up with what we thought was a dollar amount that would work as a disincentive. And it is a fee, it is not related to the notion that there is 100 percent subsidy and the farmer agrees to pay 10 percent of it. That is not what is happening here. I know that is the argument that the gentleman has made in the past.

This is a surcharge, it is based upon 10 percent of the cost of the delivery of the water, which is based upon the cost of the project, and in this case that is a very, very substantial fee. Again I will say I believe it is a disincentive.

Mr. BEDELL. If the gentleman will yield further, it seems to me it is important that we have this clear, that the farmer is going to pay 10 percent of the cost of delivering the water.

Mr. MILLER of California. No.

Mr. BEDELL. Of the interest cost of delivery of the water.

Mr. MILLER of California. No. The irrigation districts that contract with the Federal Government, should they decide to go ahead and build this project, should they decide that they can afford it—and that is up to some question right now, in this farm economy—should they decide, they will prepay the cost of this project. They will do that over a 40- to 50-year period in doing so.

It is like highways and airports. What we are saying is that in the case that where those farmers then want to engage in the farming of crops that are in surplus, they will pay an additional fee beyond what would ordinarily be charged in terms of the operation and maintenance repayment of this project over the 40-year life of the contract or 50-year life of the contract.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER] has again expired.

(On request of Mr. BEDELL and by unanimous consent, Mr. MILLER of California was allowed to proceed for 4 additional minutes.)

Mr. BEDELL. If the gentleman will yield further, I guess the issue is, it seems to me, if the 10 percent would prevent farmers from planting surplus crops, as the gentleman thinks it would, the 10 percent, then does it not make sense to say that we are going to remove the taxpayers from having to pay part of the cost, because if you are going to accomplish it, anyway, what is wrong with having water policy that clearly says that we do not think it is right to subsidize farmers to grow at the same time we are paying farmers not to grow crops?

Mr. MILLER of California. Let me ask the gentleman the reverse of that question: What is wrong is if this accomplishes the water policy you want to accomplish that we do not do it this way, what is wrong with doing it this way when in fact it will accomplish the same goal? As has been pointed out here by a number of people in the tortured path of this bill to the floor, the tortured path of this project is that this is a compromise, and you have to allow some people to walk away with some face, understanding the obligations that they have undertaken, the changes that they have agreed to, and you have to have them have the ability to hold their heads up.

We believe this does that while at the same time accomplishing the very purpose the gentleman is raising.

Mr. BEDELL. The gentleman asked me a question, so may I reply?

Mr. MILLER of California. Yes.

Mr. BEDELL. If they both accomplish it and if it would seem to make more sense to most Members, which I assume it would, that they would not——

Mr. MILLER of California. We will find that out in a little while. Let me reclaim my time. Let me just say, the answer is that I believe that purpose is being met, and I think this is the best way to do it, the most forthright way to accomplish that within the reclamation policy.

And let us not pretend for a moment—and let me keep my time for a moment—let us not pretend that you are going to take this one reclamation project and somehow you are going to change the agricultural policy in this country. The problems that run through the ag bill and the ag policy are far greater and wider in magnitude than this one. This addresses the contribution that has been made in the past by reclamation projects to that problem. That is all we can do here. I believe the committee bill in fact does that, as do many of the people who have fought side by side with the gentleman against wasteful projects.

Mr. BEDELL. The gentleman asked me a question. May I try to reply?

Mr. MILLER of California. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BEDELL. The gentleman asked me the question: Why should we change it if the 10 percent will accomplish it?

The reason that this gentleman thinks we should change it is that I believe that it does not make sense for taxpayers to subsidize the growing of more crops at the same time that we are paying farmers not to grow crops.

The 100 percent would accomplish that. The 10 percent does not accomplish that. The 10 percent still says that we will continue to offer subsidies to farmers to grow cros that are in surplus that we are paying other farmers not to grow.

So if they both accomplish it, it would seem to this gentleman that it makes sense to have a policy which I would think would make sense to the taxpayers.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

MR. MILLER of California. I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER] has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. MILLER of California was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, let me again underscore the point that irrigation opportunities in that area of North Dakota that will be irrigated under this project will allow the production of crops that are not in surplus from lands that are now producing crops that are in surplus. That is precisely what is going to happen. It is what the gentleman from Iowa is trying to say this morning needs to happen. I am saying that is what will happen if you have these irrigation opportunities.

But if you set up conditions that persuade people not to go ahead and make the front-end investments because they do not have the time, in an orderly way, with crop rotations, plantings, and other things, to accomplish this, then you will assure that those lands are going to remain in excess crops or surplus crops, we are not going to have the opportunity to switch to nonsurplus crops, and I think for that reason the amendment that the gentleman from Iowa has offered is completely counterproductive. I want to reemphasize once again that what we have done in this compromise is historic. It is the only place that it exists in Federal law when we pass this legislation. I think it is the right approach and it is the appropriate approach.

Mr. MILLER of California. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. STRANG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of California. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. STRANG. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would echo the gentleman's comments, and I would simply point out that the compromise which the gentleman has crafted is in fact a 75-percent increase over currently calculated ability to pay. That is a major disincentive, but it is not antifarm or antifamily or antiopportunity. I congratulate the gentleman on his compromise.

Mr. MILLER of California. I think the gentleman is quite correct. I think one of the serious questions that will be asked down the road is whether or not in this farm economy the farmers will engage this project at the base price, forget the 10-percent surcharge, whether or not they will be able to engage in the base price, and that is because of the delays we have had over the years in the construction of this project.

Mr. STRANG. If the gentleman will yield, let us point out that if you do not get this bill passed you are locking in those farmers to current surpluses. The only thing they can raise is wheat and corn. And this water will provide an opportunity for alternative crops.

Mr. MILLER of California. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of California. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SHARP. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman knows, I do not agree with him totally on this, though I am delighted in his work of trying to craft a better bill than the project originally shaped up to be, but I think it is important that we do pass the Bedell amendment. I think it is very important that we establish clearly we are not going to go forward in this country with dramatically contradictory policies in which we are going to be subsidizing crops that we are spending a fortune now to try to get out of production elsewhere in the country. I think it makes no sense for us. We have high deficits, and we have a farm crisis. The legislation, as it goes forward, costs us money and it subsidizes a product that we are spending a fortune to try to get off of the market.

So I hope that my colleagues will support the Bedell amendment on this to make it a much more rational kind of policy. I appreciate the situation of the gentleman from North Dakota and the years of commitment that people have made there. But, frankly, I think the wise thing for us to do in 1986 is to vote for the Bedell amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER] has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. MILLER of California was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, let me respond to the gentleman, and then I will yield.

I think the point is here, with the 10-percent surcharge, the subsidy in fact will not be extended to that land for that purpose. If that farmer desires to irrigate his land, he must do so in another crop in order to make a profit, because I think the 10-percent surcharge irradicates any possibility of that farmer making a profit on that land.

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of California. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. HUCKABY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana and in support of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa as such.

It certainly makes no sense at a time when we are trying to get a conservation reserve off the ground to literally buy out millions of acres of land in production today for these surplus crops to further compound this situation.

In addition to that, all the scientists are telling us we are on the threshold of a major breakthrough in bioengineering, in gene splicing, where we are going to see a doubling or tripling of yields within the next 10 to 15 years.

So it is highly unlikely that we will need this farmland within the foreseeable future to produce these surplus crops. I think the Bedell amendment makes sense, and I would urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I want to give my colleague and friend, the gentleman from California, a chance to perhaps explain to the Committee one more time why if indeed we want to stop the growth in surplus crops, namely, through the tool of reducing subsidies to those crops, why we should not impose the Bedell 100-percent test for which we are certain there will be no water to surplus crops, why we would oppose that and support a 10-percent test which leaves open the possibility of taxpayer subsidies to surplus crops. I do not understand that.

I would be glad to yield to my friend.

Mr. MILLER of California. Well, let me say to the gentleman, as I said earlier, I think that within the realm of the compromise that had to be reached here, by phrasing it in the manner of a surplus, I believe that that surplus, and in fact honestly believe, that the 10-percent surcharge when calculated will irradicate any possibility of a farmer making the economic decision to use that land to grow those crops. An outright prohibition of that flies in the face of the whole notion of reclamation projects. I saw the opportunity to provide this surcharge and accomplish the goals that I have stated have been Mr. BEDELL'S goals and my goals for many years. I think in fact that is accomplished by the bill. The gentleman may differ with that. But I think that to suggest that somehow this is the root of the agricultural problem in this country, when I see we are paying 15 cents for every pound of cotton, people are growing cotton only for one market. Here we are saying that we are going to go ahead and develop the land but we are going to take away, unlike all of the other support programs in the agricultural bill, we are going to take away the incentive to grow subsidized crops, but we are going to allow a farmer to develop that land, to have an adequate supply of water, to have a committed supply of water, and have the opportunity to branch out into that agriculture. Today that is not possible for these farmers, and I think that is the gist of the bill.

Mr. ROEMER. Let me reclaim my time. I thank the gentleman for his answer. Let me see if I can paraphrase his answer.

Mr. MILLER of California. Well, I would rather restate it than have the gentleman paraphrase it.

Mr. ROEMER. Well, I will give you a chance to do that, because you probably will not like my paraphrase.

The 10-percent rule is set for political reasons.

Mr. MILLER of California. No. The 10-percent rule——

Mr. ROEMER. I have not yielded yet. Let me finish my paraphrase. Maybe it will show how far off base I am.

The 10-percent rule has interwoven in it some pride of authorship and some political comity, and it has nothing to do with the stoppage of taxpayers' subsidy for surplus crops.

If we want to stop the subsidy of surplus crops, the way to do it is the 100-percent rule. If there is another reason, let us get to the heart of it.

I yield to my friend.

Mr. MILLER of California. I would say to the gentleman that I disagree with his characterization of my answer. I believe that the 10-percent rule adds on such an additional surcharge that, in fact, the subsidy is gone, that at that point there is no subsidy because the farmer will not make that decision. That goes to the economics of the farmland, to the cropping pattern and to the cost of raw material which, in this case, is federally developed water, that in that point it is gone.

This is not an attempt to appear to be doing something. It is the honest belief of this gentleman that, in fact, that goal is accomplished through the language in the legislation.

Mr. ROEMER. I accept that, and I thank the gentleman for his answer. I just take the position that if we are going to stop the subsidy, the way to do it is with the 100-percent rule.

□ 1230

It meets the test of common sense, economic need, and good policy.

I further agree with my colleague, the gentleman from California, that we ought not to make a mountain out of this one bill. This will not change agricultural policy in America. We ought to do that at some point, but this bill does not.

But as far as this test is concerned, I ask my colleagues to meet the Bedell standard, 100 percent.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROEMER. Yes, I am glad to yield.

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take anything from the skill and work of our colleague, the gentleman from California. He has done an excellent job on a very difficult bill, I know that; but I differ with the gentleman on the assumption that actually is prohibitive with the 10 percent. I know the gentleman believes in good faith that it is prohibitive by having the 10-percent surcharge, that therefore, the farmer will not want to grow any of the prohibitive crops; but the fact is each farmer is going to calculate that and there still is a major subsidy, water subsidy, here for the acreage, even with the 10-percent additional cost that they might have to pay.

It may well work out that a farmer may wish to do that.

I think we are not asking them to sit around calculating that. We want them to know exactly that they are going to have to pay the full freight if they are going to engage in subsidized crops.

Now, it is important also to remember that if they do not engage—I do not mean subsidized crops, but if they do not engage in prohibited crops, there is no difficulty with them using this land.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I just want to make a couple points. I commend the gentleman from California, the subcommittee chairman, for the way he has handled an extremely difficult situation.

My heart went out to the gentleman from North Dakota. I have been in the middle of these statewide water project fights most of my life and the gentleman has conducted himself with real skill and ability in getting this bill to the floor.

We debated the amendment that is now before us in the committee. We defeated the 100-percent version of it. We defeated an amendment which would have eliminated any surcharge, and I think we have got about the right place to do it.

One bill should not carry all the load. Things are changing in agriculture. I say to myself and my friends from the East and from the South that we are having upfront payments now for water projects. We are talking about realistic interest rates. The fight has not been in vain. The message is getting across on surplus crops.

But here is a little State, promised 40 years ago when the Government moved in and took some of their best bottom land, the best agricultural lands in the whole State, that justice would be done and 40 years later we are trying to do justice and we have a finely negotiated compromise settlement of this overall problem. It would be a shame to upset it.

If we pass the amendment, it could be very costly, because the Government is going to save a lot of money if we get this matter settled and do not have to keep the covenant in other ways, but it could be a very costly mistake, although well-intentioned, to adopt this amendment and I strongly oppose it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BEDELL].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote, and pending that, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently a quorum is not present. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 2, rule XXIII, the Chair announces that he will reduce to a minimum of 5 minutes the period of time within which a vote by electronic device, if ordered, will be taken on the pending question following the quorum call. Members will record their presence by electronic device.

The call was taken by electronic device.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments?

If not, the question is on the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Bosco, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 1116) to implement certain recommendations made pursuant to Public Law 98-360, pursuant to House Resolution 422, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute adopted by the Committee of the Whole? If not, the question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 254, nays 154, not voting 25, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pair:

On this vote:

Mr. Anthony for, with Mr. Zschau against.

Messrs. SPRATT, FOGLIETTA, and BARTLETT changed their votes from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Florida and Mr. ENGLISH changed their votes from "nay" to "yea."

So the bill was passed.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inform the House that despite the fact we are taking special orders, we understand the Rules Committee will meet at 1:30 and we are anticipating that legislation will be on the floor later today.

COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT BLOCK GRANT IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1986

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MITCHELL] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Community Development Block Grant Improvement Act of 1986. The Community Development Block Grant [CDBG] Program is the largest and one of the most important sources of community development funds available to low-income neighborhoods and families. It has had a significant impact in my district and I'm sure that's true of your district as well.

Yet, this successful program is threatened, not because of failures in the program as much as by its success. This program, established to benefit "principally persons of low and moderate income," is now seen by some as "not sufficiently targeted" to low and moderate income beneficiaries. It has been suggested that since it is not exclusively a low-income, safety net program, it should be cut. The most recent budget proposal would reduce the CDBG program by 10 percent below the current level for fiscal year 1985.

To cut CDBG would be a classic case of "throwing out the baby * * *." It makes far more sense to target the available money more narrowly to low and moderate income recipients than to reduce the money available.

For that reason, the Community Development Block Grant Improvement Act of 1986 will ensure that 100 percent of the CDBG money will go to low and moderate income beneficiaries. I invite you to join me as a sponsor of this legislation.

The bill will accomplish the following six goals:

First, require that all CDBG money be expended for the benefit of families and individuals with incomes of 120 percent or less of the median income in their area.

Second, further discourage displacement.

Third, require the development of an economic development strategy before any CDBF funds are expended on economic development projects.

Fourth, reinstitute the application process so that communities may receive advance approval for their CDBG plans.

Fifth, restore authority for multiyear grants to nonentitlement communities.

Sixth, encourage greater citizen review, community monitoring and participation.

I believe these are practical, sensible changes which will enhance the appeal of an already good program to help our low-income persons and families.

J.J. CROSETTI RECEIVES SOLIDARITY MEDAL FROM GOVERNMENT OF ITALY

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I inform my colleagues that the Government of Italy has decided to award a Solidarity Medal to J.J. (Joe) Crosetti, a native son of Watsonville, CA, and an outstanding citizen of Santa Cruz County for many decades. On July 13, Lodge No. 2016 of the Order of Sons of Italy in America will present this prestigious award to Mr. Crosetti, and I would like to take this opportunity to list the achievements of this great man.

Joe Crosetti is the chairman of the board of J.J. Crosetti Co., as well as Crosetti Frozen Foods, Crosetti Cold Storage, and Crosetti Orchards. He is also president of Transit Cooling, Inc. He is a leading member of the agricultural community of Watsonville and Santa Cruz County and his work on behalf of that community and his fellow citizens seems far beyond the possible accomplishments of one individual.

Joe Crosetti was born in 1908 in Watsonville. His parents were Frank and Margherita Crosetti, who were immigrants from Italy. Joe attended the Watsonville schools, graduating from Watsonville High School in 1927. That year, he formed his own band, and they went around the world playing for the Dollar Steamship Lines.

In 1935, Joe married Theresa Muzzio, and they celebrated their 50th wedding anniversary just last year. They have three children and six grandchildren.

Joe began his career working for the Horgan Co. A few years later, he started on his own, and today, his frozen foods plant employs 600 workers. His products are shipped around the world.

Among Joe's achievements and contributions to the agricultural and business communities of Santa Cruz County and California over the past several decades are the following: president of the Santa Cruz County Fair Board—six times; Exposition Hall at Santa Cruz County Fairgrounds dedicated in his honor—1969; member of California Board of Agriculture—8 years; State Fair Board vice president—8 years; chairman, State Horse Show—3 years; director of the 14th Agricultural District—40 years; member of first agricultural tour of Soviet Union; president, California-Arizona Farm Labor Association—6 years; president, Watsonville Chamber of Commerce—1947; Watsonville Chamber of Commerce Man of the Year—1963; president of Grower-Shipper Vegetable Association—1963; former member board of directors of Western Growers Association.

Joe has also been very active in charitable causes, serving as president of the Watsonville chapter of the American Red Cross for 42 years, as president of the Santa Cruz County Cancer Society. A number of local charities, as well as needy individuals and families in the area, have been able to count on his support over the years. In addition, he has been a member of the Elks Club for 51 years; a charter member, and the only honorary member, of the Lions Club; a Paul Harris fellow of the Rotary Club; and a member of the Commonwealth Club of San Francisco.

In 1965, Joe was honored by resolutions adopted by the California State Senate, Santa Cruz County, and the city of Sacramento. He was a member of the county grand jury from 1944 to 1946; a delegate to the Presidential convention of 1964; and a member of the electoral college in 1964.

Mr. Speaker, as a son of Italian immigrants, as a member of the agricultural community of neighboring Monterey County, and as Joe Crosetti's Representative in Congress, I am proud of his accomplishments. He is the kind of person upon which this country has been built—he has worked hard, made opportunities, succeeded, spread his success to his employees, to his colleagues, and to his community, and has contributed of his time and resources to those less fortunate than he.

I and my wife Sylvia, a friend and relative to Joe Crosetti, hope to be able to attend the ceremony at which Joe receives his Solidarity Medal. We will bring with us the well-deserved congratulations and respect of all my colleagues for this remarkable and outstanding citizen, farmer, father, and friend.

INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow I will introduce legislation to create a nonpartisan Presidential Commission to conduct an ongoing evaluation of international terrorism, monitor the activities of various agencies with jurisdiction over terrorism, and recommend specific steps the United States and its allies can take to combat its spread.

This legislation will include specific authority for the Commission to offer international bounties for the successful capture and prosecution of known terrorists under the laws of the nations against which the terrorist acts were committed.

I continue to support military action as an effective option to protect innocent lives from terrorists. A meaningful long-range policy against terrorism must also include other options. The containment of terrorism will require a broader and more comprehensive approach. The recent attack against Libya was justified, but we can not assume this is the last we will hear from Libyan-backed terrorists.

The mindless murder of Peter Kilburn and two British subjects, the assaults against our diplomats in Peru and Sudan, and other recent actions against Americans in Europe tell us that terrorism goes beyond regional borders and national political alignments. The problem is one which runs deep in the religious and cultural heritage of parts of the world and one which we can not expect to be resolved solely by short-term military action alone.

I hope the creation of this Commission will lead to a coordinated policy by which we act, not just react, against the terrorists. The United States can do more than just get tough. We can get smart. The international bounty is one way to use our resources to induce the cooperation of peoples throughout the world. Terrorism is not new. We have addressed it effectively in the past. We can do it again today.

AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION SERVICE

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COBEY] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. COBEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to urge my colleagues to reject the administration's proposed 59-percent reduction in funding for the Cooperative Extension Service, also known as the Agricultural Extension Service.

The fiscal 1987 budget proposed by the administration would reduce Federal funding for extension programs from $328 to $148 million—a cut of 59-percent.

This reduction would seriously hamper the efforts of a remarkably flexible, responsive program which has aided American farmers and farm communities.

In my State of North Carolina, this proposal would mean the layoff of 340 Extension personnel, including 110 Extension agents and 60 agricultural specialists. Pest management, small farmer assistance, and rural development programs, among others, would be curtailed or terminated.

In Utah, the proposed cut would wipe out a nutrition program for low-income people in rural areas and would eliminate such Extension programs as farm safety, farm financial management, and pesticide training.

In Tennessee, the 59-percent reduction in Federal funds would mean reducing by one-fifth the services conducted in farm communities across that State.

The New York Extension Service would lose 300 personnel if we adopt the cut that has been proposed. This would affect sea grant, conservation, and pest management programs based out of Cornell University.

These examples show that the administration's plan would have a significant impact on programs affecting America's farmers. At a time when we have many problems in agriculture, this is not the time to make deep reductions in the Agricultural Extension Service.

Congress has a special challenge to help extend the present economic recovery to America's farms. We must not forget that farmers provide the backbone of our economy, and since the days of Washington and Jefferson, farming has been important not only to our economy, but to our heritage as well.

Helping the small family farms across America is and should be a part of our Federal agriculture policy. The Extension Service is one of the most important aids to small family farmers, and we must keep it strong.

Since it was established as part of the Smith-Lever Act of 1914, the Extension Service has brought agricultural and scientific research from America's colleges and universities directly to America's farms.

Without the Extension Service, a great deal of research would waste away in scientific journals and classroom labs.

Extension staff and volunteers in more than 3,000 counties nationwide work directly with farmers to give them the latest information on efficient farm management. The amount of information passed on to farm families is amazing—techniques involving energy conservation, pest control, computerized farm management, farm machinery safety procedures, landscaping, home economics, nutrition, protection of the environment, and community planning. In addition, the Extension Service operates the popular 4-H program for youth—exposing many young people in rural areas to fields of knowledge they would otherwise never discover.

I should point out to my colleagues that those who benefit most from the Extension Service are not wealthy people, but low- and middle-income citizens in rural communities who make up much of Middle America. Their quality of life has been enhanced greatly by the efforts of the Extension Service.

As a member of the Congressional Rural Caucus and as a representative from a very rural State, I recognize, as many in this Congress do, the wholesome values that are nurtured in rural communities. In rural communities, there is a great emphasis on community, on family, on helping out your neighbor. I, for one, want to see rural communities prosper and grow stronger in the future. The Extension Service can help make that happen.

Through seminars, newsletters, brochures, training sessions, and individual conferences, the Extension Service gives farm families the tools to produce more efficiently the food products we consume. This, in turn, has undoubtedly led to lower food prices for the general public than would otherwise be the case.

Many farm families today live in a climate of uncertainty. Economic problems have caused tremendous stress for some. This is certainly not the time to reduce funding for a program that has helped many farmers economize and make it through the tough years.

The Extension Service can serve as a vital tool in our efforts to strengthen the farm economy.

Many in Congress may not be familiar with the Extension Service, but this 72-year-old program is present in all 50 States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, the Northern Marianas, and Micronesia. In each of these States and territories, a land-grant college or university operates an extension service for that area.

Let me just share with you some of the successes of the Extension Services around the country.

Extension education programs have played a direct role in the rapid expansion of the aquaculture industry in the Southeastern United States. Programs in water quality management, fish diseases, fish nutrition, and use of computer software in fish farm management have helped increase productivity. The Mississippi Extension Service, for example, has organized programs like this for catfish farmers, leading to a 17-percent increase in farm-raised catfish in the past year.

Extension's Integrated Pest Management [IPM] Program has helped reduce costs for farmers and has helped protect the environment. In Alabama, IPM reduced production costs of pecan growers by $1.9 million, increased income for cotton producers by $24.6 million, and reduced production costs for peanut farmers by $1.2 million. Insecticide and fungicide costs were reduced in States like Maine, New York, Utah, and West Virginia because of Extension's fruit IPM programs.

In California, Texas, Kentucky, Ohio, and other States, Extension personnel have helped farmers develop soil conservation techniques.

In Oklahoma, Extension personnel worked with key producers, feed industry, and pharmaceutical companies to bring about the use of protein supplements for summer stocker cattle. This resulted in an 8.4-million pound gain in meat at a value for producers of about $4.6 million.

The Extension Service has helped ease the financial and emotional stress that many farm families are experiencing today. The Service has helped over 100,000 farm families with intensive financial management assistance. This includes help in revising their financial and farm business plans and making changes to improve their financial situation. This assistance has been targeted toward areas where the financial crisis is most acute. In Iowa, for example, Extension's ASSIST Program had helped over 8,000 farmers in analyzing options for servicing debt and managing cash flow.

Extension helps bring the latest market information to all areas of the country with its Computerized Outlook and Information Network [COIN] system. To facilitate marketing decisionmaking, the Extension Service now obtains reports and information from several USDA agencies and makes them available electronically to Extension specialists within hours of their release. State specialists retrieve and adapt the information to local situations, and make their analyses available to farmers and others via codaphones, radio, TV, and State computerized videotext networks. They also distribute newsletters and write articles for trade newspapers.

These examples should demonstrate how important a county Extension agent is to local farmers. The Extension agent is a key source of vital information in thousands of rural areas across this Nation.

Our new Secretary of Agriculture, Richard Lyng, wasn't in Office when the administration's agricultural budget was formulated. That leads me to believe that the Office of Management and Budget is primarily responsible for the deep cut that has been proposed for the Extension Service.

In any event, Secretary Lyng said in an Associated Press interview shortly after he took office that he wants to emphasize during his tenure the services of the Department of Agriculture.

This, I believe, is the proper approach for any Secretary of Agriculture to take. The Secretary cannot force changes in many macroeconomic forces, such as interest rates and the value of the dollar, that affect directly the livelihood of farmers. He can, however, help provide key services to American farmers, such as export development programs, credit assistance initiatives, and support services such as the Extension Service.

The Extension Service is one of the key services in USDA that Secretary Lyng should emphasize. Thus, we should not drastically cut this program as the administration has proposed.

Many Members in this House care deeply about the budget deficit. I am a fiscal conservative and I share the budget concerns many of you have.

With the new balanced budget law that was passed last year, we now have a fixed spending limit. We must reduce the deficit to no more than $144 billion.

I am prepared to join my colleagues in cutting spending to meet that goal. In doing so, we must prioritize programs and be careful not to cripple useful Federal services.

I submit to you today that the money spent on the Agricultural Extension Service is a bargain for taxpayers. It is not a bureaucratic, unresponsive, slow-to-move agency. With Federal, State, and local government funds, the Extension Service in each State works directly with farmers to determine their needs, the problems they face, and how the Extension Service can be of help.

The Extension Service accounts for only seven-tenths of 1 percent of the roughly $53 billion budget for the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

Recently, my staff asked the Congressional Research Service to compare Federal funding increases for the Extension Service with increases in commodity support programs and the total USDA budget. What we found was interesting.

Since 1976, Federal funding of the Cooperative Extension Service has increased 50 percent. During that same time period, net outlays for Federal price supports and related programs increased 1,736 percent and the total USDA budget grew 393 percent. Clearly, the Agricultural Extension Service has not contributed to the increase in agricultural spending or in Federal spending.

For point of reference, I should point out that the Consumer Price Index since 1976 has increased 93 percent. Therefore, Federal funding of the Extension Service has actually lagged behind the inflation rate in the past 10 years.

Nevertheless, many Extension personnel I talk to understand the need to trim Federal costs. They are willing to accept the 4.3-percent cut in Federal extension funds that resulted from the across-the-board cut in most Federal programs on March 1 this year; but, to cut Federal extension funds further would, in my opinion, be penny wise and pound foolish.

There are plenty of better places for us to cut funds. Many people, for example, ask me why Congress doesn't close down some of our unneeded military bases. I believe we could consolidate some of the committees we have in Congress. We could stop subsidizing Amtrak which should be run by the private sector.

I could go on, but the point I wish to make is this: the Cooperative Extension Service deserves a higher priority in the Federal budget than it has been given. I think we should appropriate enough funds to continue extension services at the current levels.

For those who agree with me, I invite you to cosponsor House Resolution 413 which I introduced recently. This resolution expresses the sense of the House that Federal funding for the Extension Service be made at a level sufficient to continue the current operations of the Service.

The Extension Service deserves your support. Thus, I invite my colleagues to support House Resolution 413.

□ 1335

Mr. Speaker, I yield to my distinguished fellow colleague, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VALENTINE].

Mr. VALENTINE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I am speaking of the Reagan administration's proposal to reduce funding for the Cooperative Extension Service by 59 percent in fiscal year 1987.

For over 70 years the Agricultural Extension Service has brought the expertise and guidance of its agents to farmers and farm families all across America. I dare say that there are few people listening to me today who have not benefited in some way from programs sponsored and maintained by the Agricultural Extension Service.

While numerous Government-funded programs benefit their recipients indirectly, the Extension Service provides direct guidance and training to the thousands of Americans who turn to it annually for assistance. By proposing funding cuts of such magnitude for the Extension Service, the administration is sending a loud and clear message to farmers and their families that their needs are unimportant and can be ignored.

The Extension Service continues to be one of the most effective Federal agricultural programs. I will even go so far as to say that the Extension Service is among the most effective Federal programs of any kind. It has brought the benefits of the latest agricultural research and technology to farm families, which in turn has aided Americans living far from the barns and fields of rural America.

Mr. Speaker, at a time when American farm families are undergoing their worst crisis in 50 years, I would like to mention just a few of the ways that the Extension Service in my district—the Second District of North Carolina—is helping farm families survive.

In Caswell County, agricultural technicians are working one-on-one with small and marginal producers to help them diversify. Agents are also working with producers on farm financial records and budgets, encouraging better recordkeeping and farm management.

The staff of the Granville County Agricultural Extension Service is offering computer training for farmers, using software that calculates enterprise budgets, cash flow, balance sheets, income statements, family living budgets, and personal finance decisions. Extension agents are even setting appointments after regular hours and even on weekends to assist farmers with financial management.

In Johnston County, the Extension staff has initiated and developed the leadership needed to, among other things, secure countywide toll free telephone service, and a county produce market.

Perhaps most important of all, the Extension Service throughout the Second District is conducting workshops to help farmers alleviate family stresses brought on by the current economic crisis. Let us not add to their stresses by taking away the very funding for these workshops.

In North Carolina, the proposed cuts would mean a reduction of 340 Agricultural Extension Service positions and termination of the entire expanded Food and Nutrition Education Program, which provides nutritional education to more than 7,310 disadvantaged families. The impact would be devastating.

I find this administration's callous disregard of the needs of farmers and their families unconscionable and the gutting of a cost-effective program irresponsible. For an administration which constantly trumpets its pro-family outlook, this proposal would deal a heavy blow and ironic blow to families on our farms.

We all agree on the need to reduce spending, but the Cooperative Extension Service is no place to cut. I urge all my colleagues to join me in trying to maintain the full scope of extension programs. American farmers have given us their best over the years, and they deserve no less from the Congress.

□ 1350

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VALENTINE] for coming to the floor and, during this special order, helping to underscore the importance of maintaining at least the current levels of funding for this most important program for farmers, the Agricultural Extension Service.

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join my colleagues in opposition to the Reagan administration's proposed budget cuts in the Cooperative Extension Service [CES]. Extension programs have been a great success in rural, suburban, and urban communities, and it is my hope that Congress will oppose major cuts in this important educational program.

Mr. Speaker, the Cooperative Extension Service is the educational arm of the Department of Agriculture and provides information and advice for people about subjects ranging from crops to the dinner table, including agricultural production and marketing, nutrition, family living, and youth and 4–H programs. Funding is provided by a partnership of Federal, State, and county governments.

CES originally provided services only to rural areas, and retains the image of being a program that mainly serves the rural community. However, as a Representative of the Kansas City metropolitan area, a large number of my urban and suburban constituents have let me know the importance of these programs. The CES has surpassed its original mission of the education of rural residents and now is vital for the development of urban and suburban communities as well.

Extension programs reached more than 110,000 people in the Kansas City area in the last year. These people received expert instruction in home economics, food and nutrition, money management, energy conservation, and child safety. Approximately 3,000 people volunteered their time and effort to make these programs possible.

Mr. Speaker, CES programs have been especially helpful in depressed low-income areas in the inner city. For example, the Expanded Food and Nutrition Education Program, slated for elimination by President Reagan, teaches families to provide nutritional needs on a limited budget and how to grow and preserve food safely. This program served 6,777 families in Missouri last year, 95 percent of whom were below the poverty level. Extension programs also offer low-income residents instruction in urban gardening, weatherization, and do-it-yourself home repairs.

These programs also provide benefits above and beyond valuable infomation. The sense of pride, independence, and community spirit given by extension programs provide enrichment in addition to knowledge. The 4–H program, for example, has been teaching the fundamentals of citizenship and character to boys and girls for years.

Mr. Speaker, the continuing education provided by the Cooperative Extension Service programs should remain a priority of the Federal Government. The proposed cuts in these important programs would hurt residents of both the inner city and rural areas. Educational programs such as CES directly contribute to the strength and well-being of America, and should continue to be one of our country's priorities.

Mr. LUNDINE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my support and admiration for the excellent services which Cooperative Extension provides in the 34th Congressional District of New York and across the country.

The southern tier of New York has benefited greatly from the services which Cooperative Extension provides, and I am very concerned with the President's proposal to cut its budget by 67 percent in our State.

Since it was established in 1914, the Cooperative Extension Service has provided many important services in more than 3,000 counties nationwide. It has helped bring agricultural research from America's laboratories and college thesis papers directly to America's farms.

Most recently, the Cooperative Extension Service helped educate farmers in my area about the Dairy Termination Program. In fact, this education program drew the largest crowd ever to the Cooperative Extension Center in Cattaraugus County.

Through the Expanded Food and Nutrition Education Program [EFNEP], Extension Services have helped low-income families with young children receive valuable nutrition information in order to improve their diets and better use available food resouces.

Also, the 4–H program which Cooperative Extension runs, and in which 39 percent of the youth in upstate New York participate, has had a great effect on the personal development of our state's young people. I feel that these services are too valuable to give up.

In an effort to protect this important funding, I have become an original cosponsor of House Resolution 413, expressing support for providing the Federal funding needed to maintain the current functions of the Extension Service—a service which takes up only seventenths of 1 percent of the USDA budget. These Federal extension funds are matched with support from county governments and land-grant colleges to support the Extension Service in each State. I am hopeful that this resolution will send an important message to the President that the Congress will not support his plan to cut the funding for Extension Services.

I hope my colleagues will join me today in saluting the work of Cooperative Extension Services across the country, and will work to ensure that the Federal support for these important services is preserved.

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to cite the significant contributions of Cooperative Extension to the development of our country. Over the years, Cooperative Extension has been in the forefront of a governmental effort to make both farmers and nonfarmers alike more productive and self-sufficient. It did this with information about crop management, handling of chemicals, and many auxilliary services.

Indeed, other countries of the world have looked to Cooperative Extension and have emulated it as they provided agricultural information to their own populations in the hope that success similar to the U.S. program would ensue.

Today, this success is threatened. President Reagan plans to gut the Cooperative Extension budget in fiscal year 1987, but cutting an estimated $328 million back to $140 million. Unless the Congress intervenes, this proposed cutback will be on top of an additional cut this year as a result of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Deficit Reduction Act which will pare down Cooperative Extension's $343 million budget to $328 million.

Given this tremendous reduction is funding proposed by the administration, it seems very unlikely that important programs like food nutrition education, farm safety, financial management, so needed by farmers at present, pest control, 4–H, seminars in husbandry and home economics, and natural resource conservation will be undertaken at the county level without Federal help.

The assumption that the New Federalism of the administration covers common defense and scarcely anything else is playing its latest card in the proposed gutting of Cooperative Extension. I think that we should resist the emasculation of this significant program, Democrats and Republicans alike.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from North Carolina for taking out this special order. I think it is important for us to recognize the useful community services which the Extension Service provides. The Extension Service has strong, bipartisan backing. The Extension Service provides aid during tough times, especially to young people, and it deserves a higher priority in the Department of Agriculture budget than the administration is giving it.

The President's budget for fiscal year 1987 would target the Cooperative Extension Program for a 59-percent cut which, incidentally, would cut the Massachusetts program by 68 percent. I appreciate the need to cut the deficit, but it is inappropriate and unfair to ask the Cooperative Extension Program to carry a disproportionate share of the Department of Agriculture's burden. Overall, the Department faces a 12-percent cut.

I am especially disturbed that the budget request would completely eliminate the earmarked funds for the Expended Food and Nutrition Education Program [EFNEP], which in Massachusetts alone has helped more than 46,000 families and 219,000 children to more effectively meet their nutritional needs.

In addition, I am concerned that the President's proposed budget would restrict the use of these funds by stipulating that extension agents could perform other services only after the needs of farm operators have been fully met. While the agriculture programs are important, I am afraid that this plan represents a masked attempt to eliminate existing programs in home economics, community resource development, natural resources, and 4–H youth development. These programs are important in assisting individuals, especially the young, to develop the skills and knowledge that will help them to live more productive and responsible lives.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of the Cooperative Extension Program and in opposition to the President's proposed drastic cuts. In the administration's proposed fiscal 1987 budget, Cooperative Extension faces a cut of 59 percent—this in addition to the 4.3-percent cut sustained on March 1 as a result of the Gramm-Rudman deficit reduction package.

In New York alone, the Federal allocation would be reduced from $11.3 million to $3.6 million—a cut of 67 percent. In all, 5 major programs and approximately 300 positions are slated to be eliminated if a cut of this magnitude passes Congress. I am here to help my colleagues make all Members of the House aware of the tremendous importance of the Cooperative Extension Program to our Nation's farmers.

The President's budget proposal specifically eliminates several programs, including: Expanded Food and Nutrition Program, farm safety, urban gardening, pest management, financial management programs, and the Renewable Resources Extension Act. Other areas which would see substantial damage include 4–H and State home economics programs.

Lucinda Noble, the director of Cooperative Extension at Cornell University, of which I am an alumnus, noted that drastic personnel reductions would accompany a cut of the magnitude proposed by the administration. She added that some of the programs which would be the hardest hit are the Expanded Food and Nutrition Education Program, sea grant, integrated pest management, urban gardening programs, and renewable resources.

Mr. Speaker, more than 6 million people in New York State alone are served by Cornell's Cooperative Extension Service. Included in those 6 million are people from every county in the State.

Cooperative Extension is one of the most highly successful programs ever instigated by the Federal Government. Working with State and local governments, Cooperative Extension provides a tremendous amount of information for farmers and nonfarmers alike. It has kept the 4-H program, which is very important in the upstate New York area, alive and growing.

Ms. Noble noted a sad irony in the timing of these cuts. The first extension agent in New York State was employed 75 years ago this spring. During the diamond jubilee of Cooperative Extension in New York, it is tragic that we must make such an effort simply to assure this program's survival.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this special order will help those who were previously unaware of the tremendous importance this program plays in this country support our efforts to provide reasonable funding for Cooperative Extension.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. COBEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous material on the subject of my special order today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAYES). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

NUCLEAR WASTE POLICY ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1986

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BROYHILL] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with several of my colleagues in introducing the Nuclear Waste Policy Act Amendments of 1986. This legislation is necessary to derail a bureaucratic juggernaut that is now out of control, and which threatens to waste billions of electric ratepayers' dollars. I am, of course, referring to the Department of Energy's Second High Level Nuclear Waste Repository Program.

In January, the Department of Energy narrowed the number of areas under consideration for a second repository from 235 to 12 areas in 7 States. Two of the 12 areas are in North Carolina. I have reviewed the information available about these sites, and in a meeting last week with Secretary Herrington and Mr. Rusche, I stated that I was unalterably opposed to these areas being targeted as potential second repository sites.

I do not intend to review the basis for my position on these sites today. The State of North Carolina has recently submitted its views to the Secretary. The States excellent comments cover all of my concerns. I have every confidence that the Secretary will carefully review the State of North Carolina's views, and that the Secretary will reach the same conclusions that I have—that the North Carolina areas are not suitable for hosting a permanent high level waste repository.

However, in my review of the status of the Second Repository Program, a second issue came to my attention—the need for the Second Repository Program. After careful study, I have come to the conclusion that we do not need to pursue the development and siting of a second repository at this time.

The second repository was premised on the need to store at least 140,000 metric tons of high level waste by the year 2020.

Recent projections by the Energy Information Administration indicate, however, that the amount of waste needed to be disposed of will be far, far less than the 157,000 metric tons of waste projected back in 1983. The recent EIA projections range from 75,000 metric tons to 126,000 metric tons. This reflects a reduction of between 20 to 50 percent. I would ask the Speaker to include in today's RECORD, following my statement, table 7 of a publication by EIA entitled "World Nuclear Fuel Cycle Requirements 1985."

Back in 1983, the midcase EIA projection was over 130,000 metric tons of waste by the year 2020. Now our midcase projection, which assumes more than a doubling of our current nuclear waste capacity, is approximately 106,000 metric tons of waste. This is a drop of almost 20 percent in just 3 years, and falls about 35,000 metric tons below the 140,000 metric tons originally used to justify the second repository.

Thus, even under the very optimistic assumption of the doubling of our nuclear capacity, the 70,000 metric ton artificial cap on the first repository will not be reached under the mid-case scenario until sometime after the year 2010.

This point is documented even more clearly by comparing the high-case 1983 EIA projection, with EIA's current low-case projection. I believe the low-case projection is a more realistic figure. As I am sure everyone is aware, no new nuclear powerplants have been ordered since 1979. And I suspect none will be ordered for a long time. The low-case projection is consistent with the current state of the nuclear industry—for it only assumes 36 new 1,000 megawatt nuclear powerplants will be ordered and placed into service by the year 2020.

Under the more realistic low-case assumptions, we expect to produce a total of less than 90,000 metric tons of waste by the year 2020. This is a dramatic drop of almost 45 percent from our 1983 projection of 157,000 metric tons, and conclusively shows that the first repository, even if storage is limited to 70,000 metric tons, will provide ample storage capacity until almost the year 2015.

In a hearing before the Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on energy conservation and power this morning, Mr. Ben Rusche, Director, Office of Civilian Radioactive Waste Management, U.S. Department of Energy, devoted much of his testimony to the need for the Second Repository Program. But, I did not find his testimony persuasive. His position that current projections as to the amount of waste we will need to store are well beyond the capacity of the first repository is simply incredible. If anything, Mr. Rusche's testimony before our committee today has further convinced me that the Second Repository Program should be terminated immediately.

Two further points are very important to our assessment of the Second Repository Program. First, we must recognize that there is no technical reason for limiting the amount of waste that can be stored at the first repository to 70,000 metric tons.

Second, the Second Repository Program is expensive. In our meeting last week, Mr. Rusche estimated the cost of analyzing each of the 12 areas at between $500 million to $1 billion. This does not include the cost of actually building the repository—which will also cost billions of dollars.

In sum, the facts demonstrate that there is no need whatsoever to waste money on a Second Repository Program we may never need.

That is why I wrote to Secretary Herrington last week requesting him to suspend all second repository activities, to submit a request to rescind all fiscal year 1986 funding for a second repository, and to modify the Department's fiscal year 1986 budget and legislative request to terminate this program in its entirety. I ask that a copy of my letter to the Secretary Herrington be inserted in the RECORD at the end of my remarks.

I have not received an adequate response from the Secretary. It is for this reason that I am joining with my colleagues in introducing the Nuclear Waste Policy Act Amendments of 1986. This legislation will deauthorize all Second Repository Program activities by striking all references to the second repository from the Nuclear Waste Policy Act. In addition, this legislation will explicitly preclude any further expenditures on any activity relating to a second repository.

As I wrote to Secretary Herrington last week, I remain convinced that nuclear power is vital to the health of our Nation's economy and the competitiveness of American business. But, if we are to retain this option, we must concentrate our actions on steps that will reaffirm public and industry confidence in this resource. This means that the Department's resources must be concentrated on the development of the first repository.

I call on my colleagues to support this legislation, and ask their help in putting a stop to a bad case of costly bureaucratic mischief.

[1] Total spent fuel discharges include all discharges since 1957 that are not scheduled for reinsertion (1957 was the inception of commercial nuclear power in the United States). They are the sum of the unsmoothed annual spent fuel discharges.

[2] Preliminary data collected on form RW–859, "Nuclear Fuel Data," indicate that 11,991 metric tons of initial heavy metal have been discharged through 1984. The 11,991 metric tons consist of 11,723 metric tons in commercial storage, 14 metric tons stored by the Department of Energy for use in research, and 254 metric tons that were reprocessed. The 11,723 metric tons of initial heavy metal in commercial storage include some irradiated nuclear fuel that will be reinserted in future cycles of the nuclear reactors.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, April 14, 1986.

Hon. JOHN BERRINGTON,
Secretary, Department of Energy, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In January the Department of Energy issued a draft area recommendation report that narrowed the number of rock bodies under consideration for a second permanent high level radioactive waste repository from 235 to 12 potentially acceptable areas in seven States. Two of the twelve areas are in North Carolina. The first, called Rolesville Pluton, is twelve miles east of the city of Raleigh and covers sections of Franklin, Johnston and Wake Counties. The second, called the Elk River Complex, is fifteen miles west of the city of Asheveille and covers sections of Buncombe, Raywood and Madison Counties.

Mr. Secretary, I am unalterable opposed to including the two North Carolina areas among the location the Department of Energy has concluded are appropriate for further study. I have reviewed the characteristics of both North Carolina areas, and neither is suitable for hosting a permanent high level radioactive waste repository. Several adverse features have been identified that obviously disqualify both Rolesville and Elk River and make any further study of these two areas unnecessary. I would now like to review with you some of the adverse features that I found most compelling.

Reasonable assurance that the repository is safe from seismic activity must be of paramount concern in the choice of a host site. Such assurances cannot be confidently made with respect to the North Carolina areas.

The Elk River complex is bounded and cut by many faults and is located on one of the most seismically active regions of the eastern United States. Further, recent studies indicate that the entire Blue Ridge is part of a major overthrust belt, with the Elk River complex as a portion of a crystalline sheet that is less than one kilometer thick and which appears to overlay a major thrust fault. Shock waves from blasting a quarry located only four miles from Elk River would not only threaten workers at the repository, but may further weaken the long-term seismic integrity of the site.

The Rolesville Pluton is no better. It also lies in a heavily faulted zone. There are at least seventeen geologically young faults in the Rolesville area. Studies indicate that these faults were certainly active no more than two million years ago, and that movement along these faults could have taken place within the last few thousand years.

A second factor of critical importance in the placement of a high level radioactive waste repository is the hydrologic characteristics of potential sites. A repository cannot be built in locations where water migrates easily through a potential site, for this would significantly increase the probability of the repository contaminating groundwater. This is particularly important in areas like Rolesville and Elk River, where the local communities rely on untreated groundwater for drinking water.

The hydrologic characteristics of Rolesville and Elk River are not suitable for a repository. Groundwater in the Rolesville and Elk River areas is obtained from interconnected water bearing fractures that extend to unknown depths. Borings drilled by scientists from the Virginia Polytechnic Institute in the Rolesville area indicate the passage of hot water rich fluids through the rock and demonstrate the unacceptable possibility that an escape of radioactive material from a repository would contaminate groundwater.

The evidence that groundwater is circulating to the depths at which a repository would be built is even more compelling in the case of Elk River. About twenty thermal springs have been identified in the vicinity of the Elk River site. It is generally believed that these springs are the result of water being circulated to depths where the rocks are hot, and then returned to the surface so quickly that the water does not have sufficient time to cool to ambient termperatures. It has been reliably estimated that the groundwater is being circulated to a depth of 5,000 to 6,000 feet, well below the depth at which a repository would be built. Widespread mineralization along faults in the vicinity of the Elk River Complex confirms that the faults of this complex have served as flow paths for heated water.

This evidence of groundwater being obtained from great depths creates too great a possibility of groundwater contamination, and should disqualify both the Rolesville and Elk River sites. There is naturally occurring radon in the rocks and groundwater in the Rolesville and Elk River areas. The construction and operation of a repository is likely to release additional amounts of radon into groundwater and the atmosphere. The health risks associated with further releases of radioactive materials is unacceptable.

The geologic considerations outlined above are sufficient to disquality both North Carolina areas. However, there are also serious environmental and socioeconomic considerations that militate against consideration of the Rolesville Pluton and Elk River Complex.

Section 112(a) of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act requires disqualification of "any site from development as a repository if any surface facility of such repository would be located (1) in a highly populated area; or (2) adjacent to an area 1 mile by 1 mile having a population of not less than 1,000 individuals." Large portions of the Rolesville Pluton area currently under consideration by DOE do not comply with this requirement. At the time of the 1980 national census, three towns within the Rolesville Pluton had population densities greater than 1,000 people per square mile. These towns are Zebulon, Wendell, and Knightville. All these towns have continued to grow since the census.

It is only common sense for the repository not be built in an area of rapid population growth. Yet this is precisely what will occur should the repository be built at the Rolesville site. The Rolesville area is one of the fastest growing areas in the South. From 1970 to 1980, Wake County grew from approximately 229,000 to almost 302,000 or 32 percent. Johnson County grew 15 percent from 62,000 to 71,000. Franklin County also grew by almost 14 percent. There is no indication that this remarkable growth will subside in the foreseeable future.

Also, placement of a repository at either area would cause a major disruption of the local economy, which is heavily dependent on tourism. For example, the Falls Lake State Recreation area is only six miles from the Rolesville site. This recreation area is expected to have the capacity to accommodate over 6.5 million visitors every year. I agree completely with the North Carolina Department of Natural Resources and Community Development's conclusion that the public perception of the danger of a repository would severely impact on the attractiveness of the area to tourists.

This is also the case with the Elk River Complex which is in close proximity to the Great Smoky Mountains National Park, the Blue Ridge Parkway and the Shining Rock Wilderness. Placement of a repository at this location would compromise the isolation and scenic beauty of these three parks, and would undoubtedly "conflict irreconcilably with the . . . use of a component of the National Park System." 10 C.F.R. 960.5-2-5(d)(3).

There are two further environmental factors that I believe raise serious questions about the ability of a repository to be built and operated safely at the Elk River area. In November 1977, a severe flood struck Western North Carolina. Sixteen counties were declared a federal disaster area. The area of the most severe flooding included a large portion of the Elk River complex. I do not need to point out how serious flooding could be for the safe operation and maintenance of a repository. Also, I have been told that the types of sedimentary rocks present at the Elk River Complex are known producers of hydrocarbons. Should a discovery trigger an extensive drilling program sometime in the distant future, the drilling could pose a serious risk to the continued integrity of the repository.

This does not exhaust all of the reasons I believe the North Carolina areas should not be candidates for the second repository. Several additional factors have been brought to my attention by the North Carolina Governor's office, including the adverse impact on the preservation of structures of historic and architectural significance; the proximity of state-protected lands; and the difficulties with rail transportation. I understand that the Governor will be submitting the State's views to you very shortly. I have every confidence that you will carefully weigh those comments, and that you will reach the same conclusions that I have—that Rolesville Pluton and the Elk River Complex are not suitable for a permanent high level waste repository.

Finally, Mr. Secretary, I would like to raise one last issue, the status of the second repository program. I do not believe, Mr. Secretary, that our Nation needs to pursue the development and siting of a second permanent repository at this time.

The second repository was premised on the need to store at least 140,000 metric tons of high level nuclear waste by the year 2020. Recent projections by your own Energy Information Administration (EIA) indicate that the amount of waste needed to be disposed of will be far less than 140,000 metric tons. The projections range from 75,000 metric tons to 126,000 metric tons of waste. Even the middle case (106,000), which appears to be overly optimistic in that it represents more than a doubling of existing nuclear capacity, falls about 35,000 metric tons below the 140,000 metric tons originally used to justify the second repository. The EIA data concludes that the first repository will provide more than adequate storage capacity until sometime after the year 2010. Therefore, the wisest course of action is to terminate the second repository program and ensure that the first repository will be built at a site that can accomodate more than 70,000 metric tons of waste. To this end, I have joined Congressman Steve Neal in supporting H.R. 2439.

I am now, more than ever, convinced that the nuclear option is vital to the health of our nation's economy and the competitiveness of American business. But, if we are to retain this option, we must concentrate our actions on steps that will reaffirm public and industry confidence in this resource. For your part, you must concentrate the Department's resources on development of the first repository.

In these times of fiscal constraints, the entire repository budget must be dedicated to this task. For this reason, I respectfully request that you immediately suspend all second repository activities; submit to Congress a request to rescind all FY 1986 funding for the second repository; and modify the Department's FY 1987 budget and legislative request to terminate the second repository program in its entirety.

I look forward to working with you on this matter, and I can assure you of my dedication to the successful development of the first repository.

With best regards,

JAMES T. BROYHILL,
Ranking Minority Member,
Committee on Energy and Commerce.

H.R. 4668

A bill to amend the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 to remove the requirement of a second repository for the disposal of high-level radioactive waste and spent nuclear fuel, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as "Nuclear Waste Policy Act Amendments of 1986".

SEC. 2. REMOVAL OF DEADLINES AND REQUIREMENTS RELATING TO SECOND AND SUBSEQUENT REPOSITORIES.

(a) RECOMMENDATION OF CANDIDATE SITES FOR SITE CHARACTERIZATON.—Section 112(b)(1) of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 (42 U.S.C. 10132(b)(1)) is amended—

(1) in subparagraph (A), by striking "first";

(2) by striking subparagraph (C);

(3) in subparagraph (D), by striking "subparagraphs (B) and (C)" and inserting "subparagraph (B)";

(4) in subparagraph (F), by striking "(E)" and inserting "(D)"; and

(5) by redesignating subparagraphs (D) through (H) as subparagraphs (C) through (G), respectively;

(b) HEARINGS AND PRESIDENTIAL RECOMMENDATION.—Section 114(a)(1) of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 (42 U.S.C. 10134(a)(1)) is amended—

(1) in the second sentence, by striking "for the first" and all that follows through the third comma;

(2) by striking the fifth sentence; and

(3) in subparagraph (D)—

(A) by striking "for the first" and all that follows through the second comma; and

(B) by striking the following: "concerning the first repository to be developed under this Act".

(c) RECOMMENDATION OF SITE APPROVAL.—Section 114(a)(2) of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 (42 U.S.C. 10134(a)(2)) is amended—

(1) in subparagraph (A) by striking the second and fourth sentences; and

(2) in subparagraph (B)—

(A) by striking "deadlines" and inserting "deadline"; and

(B) by striking the following: "for the first site, and March 31, 1989, for the second site,".

(d) RECOMMENDATION AFTER DISAPPROVAL.—Section 114(a)(3) of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 (42 U.S.C. 10134(a)(3)) is amended by striking "first or subsequent".

(e) APPROVAL OF CONSTRUCTION AUTHORIZATION.—Section 114(d)(1) of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 (42 U.S.C. 10134(d)(1)) is amended by striking the following: ", for the first such application, and January 1, 1992, for the second such application".

(f) ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT STATEMENT.—Section 114(f) of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 (42 U.S.C. 10134(f)) is amended—

(1) in the fourth sentence, by striking "first";

(2) by striking the fifth sentence; and

(3) in the last sentence, by striking "first".

SEC. 3. REMOVAL OF VOLUME LIMITATION ON REPOSITORY.

Section 114(d) of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 (42 U.S.C. 10134(d)) is amended by striking the last two sentences.

SEC. 4. REVISION OF MISSION PLAN.

Section 301 of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 (42 U.S.C. 10221) is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(c) REVISION OF MISSION PLAN.—The Secretary shall make such revisions in the mission plan as may be necessary to carry out the amendments made to this Act by the Nuclear Waste Policy Act Amendments of 1986. In making such revisions, the Secretary shall comply with the procedures established in subsection (b), except that—

"(1) the draft of the revisions shall be submitted in accordance with subsection (b)(1) not later than 4 months after the date of the enactment of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act Amendments of 1986; and

"(2) the revisions shall be submitted in accordance with subsection (b)(3) not later than 6 months after the date of the enactment of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act Amendments of 1986.".

SEC. 5. PROHIBITION OF EXPENDITURES FROM NUCLEAR WASTE FUND FOR SECOND AND SUBSEQUENT REPOSITORIES.

Section 302(d) of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982 (42 U.S.C. 10222(d)) is amended by adding at the end the following new sentence: "No amount may be expended by the Secretary from the Waste Fund for any activity relating to a second or subsequent repository.".

Mr. COBEY. Mr. Speaker, today I join my colleague and friend, Mr. BROYHILL, in introducing legislation to amend the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982. This bill would remove the requirement of the second repository for the disposal of high-level radioactive waste and spent nuclear fuel. As you know, the NWPA calls for the implementation of a first repository with a 70,000-metric-ton limit in which waste will be collected. The act also designates a selection process to begin the search for the second repository site.

There has been adequate data to indicate that the need for storage facilities for over 140,000 metric tons of high-level nuclear spent fuel is highly overestimated. This figure assumes that the number of nuclear powerplants would double—approximately 131—between now and the year 2020, when the second repository would begin operation. Construction for new nuclear plants have not been initiated in the last 10 years. Therefore, I believe it would be quite accurate to state that our needs for this type of storage would be far less than the 140,000-ton capacity as provided for through the NWPA in 1982.

The Department of Energy has already expended a great deal of time, money, and effort on behalf of the second repository that first of all, has not even been approved by Congress, and second, but even more importantly, is not clearly needed. I strongly encourage my colleagues to support this measure and eliminate continuation of the second repository program.

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be an original cosponsor of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act Amendments which eliminates the need for a second nuclear waste repository by expanding the capacity of the first. Such a move addresses two of my biggest concerns about the selection process Congress began with the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982: safety and cost.

What we have seen, as the second site selection process has progressed, is a clear need to amend the original law. Yet we cannot deny the need to build a long-term nuclear waste storage facility.

There are several problems with the sites chosen for the second round. First, the sites chosen for further field work shall be potential safety hazards.

Serious geological questions have been raised regarding the natural fracturing and faulting of the granite rock formations which characterize the sites. These natural flaws could result in the contamination of groundwater near a repository, endangering the water supplies of many towns and villages.

Furthermore, all of the potential second round sites are only accessible by train routes and highways that pass through or near densely populated areas.

Second, there is a real question as to whether we really need a second site at all. The tonnage cap on waste placed in the first site is arbitrary. There is no reason we cannot lift that cap, as this legislation proposes, and abandon the expensive, unnecessary search for a second site altogether. It has been estamated that the cost of studying each potential site is at least half a billion dollars and as much as a billion dollars. That means that we'll be wasting anywhere from $6 to $12 billion just to study sites we do not even need.

With all the debate about how to cut Federal spending, it seems to me that passage of this bill would be a good place to start.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to add my name as an original cosponsor of the legislation being introduced today to amend the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982. This measure will remove, as potential sites for the second nuclear waste repository, the 12 sites designated in January by the Department of Energy. This legislation will save billions of taxpayer dollars. During this time of Federal budget belt-tightening, I am convinced that all taxpayers will rally behind the bill.

The Wolf River Batholith in Wisconsin is 1 of the 12 sites under consideration for the second nuclear waste repository. There is no question that if high-level nuclear waste is dumped in Wisconsin, the State tourist economy, our second largest industry, will suffer dramatic losses. In short, if tourism declines, then so does the economic health of Wisconsin.

A great deal of evidence has been released recently that indicates there is no need for a second repository. The projected amounts of nuclear waste were initially overestimated. With the new data, we have learned that one nuclear waste storage facility will be able to store all the nuclear waste that is produced in this country well into the 21st century.

It is now a matter of simple arithmetic. A second site would cost billions. Why spend billions of dollars for something that may never be necessary?

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation. It will assure that nuclear waste is properly stored. But in so doing it will prevent the needless expenditure of an outrageous sum of tax dollars.

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of and as an original sponsor of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act Amendments of 1986, being introduced today by my colleague from North Carolina, Mr. BROYHILL. Frankly, I am disappointed that this legislation is necessary. Unfortunately, it is made necessary by a series of inept and ill-advised bureaucratic decisions. Failure to act on this legislation will not only cost ratepayers billions of dollars, but will serve as a threat to our environment as well.

I do not intend to present a litany of technical data designed to demonstrate the Department of Energy's failures in selecting their 12 finalists for the sight of the Nation's second high level nuclear waste repository. Suffice it to say, those failings and oversights were many. This morning, I was privileged to sit in on a hearing of the Energy Conservation and Power Subcommittee on this very same subject. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to ask unanimous consent to include at this point in the RECORD the statement of the Governor of the Commonwealth of Virginia before that subcommittee.

Mr. Speaker, I think this serves as just one more piece of evidence that the Department's selection process was seriously flawed.

Like the distinguished ranking minority member of the full Energy and Commerce Committee, my review of the status of the second repository program led me to the conclusion that we do not need to pursue the development of a second repository at this time.

Let's remember that the second sight was premised on the need to store at least 140,000 metric tons of high level nuclear waste by the year 2020. Recent projections of EIA indicate that the amount of waste we will need to dispose of will be far less than the 157,000 metric tons projected back in 1983. EIA's recent projections range from 75,000 to 126,000 metric tons. This is a reduction of anywhere from 20 to 50 percent.

Back in 1983, the EIA midcase projection was over 130,000 metric tons by the year 2020. Now the midcase projection is approximately 106,000 metric tons. Mr. Speaker, we will have to double our current nuclear capacity to hit that projection. Even under the very optimistic assumption that we will double our nuclear capacity, the artificial cap of 70,000 metric tons at the first repository will not be reached until sometime after the year 2010.

This point is made even more significant when one compares the 1983 high case scenario with the current low case projections. Clearly, the low-case assumption is a more realistic projection of where we are headed. Everyone knows that no new nuclear powerplants have been ordered since 1979. The low-case assumption is consistent with the current state of the nuclear industry—it assumes 36 new 1,000 megawatt plants will be ordered and placed in service by 2020.

Under the low-case scenario we will produce less than 90,000 metric tons of waste by 2020. This is 45 percent below the 1983 projections of 157,000 metric tons. Clearly, the first repository, even if limited to 70,000 metric tons, will provide ample storage until almost 2015.

This morning, Mr. Ben Rusche, Director, Office of Civilian Radioactive Waste Management, U.S. Department of Energy devoted a great deal of his testimony to justifying the need for a second repository. Frankly, I was unconvinced and believe Mr. Rusche should stop defending a bad decision, and spend more time on other issues.

Mr. Speaker, the facts demonstrate that there is no need for a second repository program and I urge my colleagues to adopt this legislation.

STATEMENT OF HON. GERALD L. BALILES, GOVERNOR OF VIRGINIA, BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON ENERGY CONSERVATION AND POWER OF THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND COMMERCE, APRIL 23, 1986

Mr. Chairman and members of the Subcommittee, ladies and gentlemen: I am grateful for the opportunity to discuss with you today Virginia's serious concerns regarding the Department of Energy's administration of the Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1982.

Mr. Chairman, we recognize our responsibility to address the difficult problems presented by the management and disposal of high-level nuclear waste. Accordingly, Virginia has made a sincere and concerted effort to be a responsible partner in the process you and your colleagues created in 1982.

From the outset, Virginia has emphasized that the process of site selection must be based on the most capable research and the most accurate information possible.

The process must be based on facts—facts that will withstand the most critical review.

To manage the siting process otherwise would be subjective, unfair and dangerous.

It is on the basis of established and provable evidence—facts—that Virginia has approached its response to the Department of Energy's Draft Area Recommendation Report.

We are very concerned at this point that the Department of Energy is not responding to or may even be ignoring evidence produced through this process.

Our single greatest concern is the Department's apparent methods of scientific inquiry.

Time and again, in its consideration of potential Virginia sites, the Department of Energy has reacted to a lack of crucial data with a complacency that is alarming because it assumes that a site must be appropriate unless readily available data to the contrary disproves it.

Mr. Chairman, this is not an approach that instills confidence in a process that must be based on facts.

And it's certainly no way to choose a site for radioactive materials requiring isolation twice the length of the recorded history of human civilization.

This approach allows the Department, for instance, to conclude that a geologic fault ends at a state border—as you can plainly see in this Department of Energy map. (Figure 1) (Map not reproduced in RECORD.)

As point of fact, the "suitable" rock bodies within the fault areas shown on this map do not mysteriously end at the Virginia-North Carolina border. It seems that the Department of Energy had no information on the rock in Virginia, so they assumed that all the rock bodies must be suitable, even when more detailed mapping in North Carolina showed similar rock bodies just across the border to be heterogeneous mixtures of crystalline and noncrystalline rocks.

Mr. Chairman, Virginia's concerns go beyond the Department of Energy's "no data is good data" approach to the facts. Our concerns go to the heart of the evaluation itself. Our line-by-line analysis of the Department's report for the three proposed Virginia sites reveal numerous examples of either an unwillingness or an inability to interpret the facts the Department of Energy had about each site.

Let me cite just a few examples:

First, the Department of Energy identified an "unnamed uranium occurrence" to the southwest of the proposed Halifax-Pittsylvania site (SE-3). Virginians know it as the "Swanson Uranium Deposit." It has been the topic of protracted and lively debate in our state legislature for more than four years.

As Figure 2 shows, this uranium deposit is actually only 4.5 miles from the proposed Halifax-Pittsylvania site (SE-3); the Department of Energy's report, by contrast, places the deposit more than three times further away from the proposed site than it actually is.

Moreover, the Department's report states the probability of similar deposits within the proposed Halifax-Pittsylvania site (SE-3) as "very low."

As Figure 3 shows three geochemical uranium anomalies within the proposed Halifax-Pittsylvania site (SE-3) were identified by the Department of Energy's own National Uranium Resource Evaluation Program. This data was published and presented at the 27th International Geological Congress in August, 1985.

Second, as you are aware, shear zones and faults provide avenues for groundwater migration and prohibit the isolation and integrity necessary for a repository of this nature. Therefore, geologic faults and shear zones can pose serious risks.

Figure 4 shows the geologic map published by the Department of Energy in the Department's report which illustrates a single fault, the Chatham Fault (on the western portion of the map) and shows no shear zones. Note that the Department of Energy in its references cites a 1977 publication by Henika and Thayer.

However, Figure 5 shows the facts contained in the cited 1977 publication which shows a second fault, the Vandola fault, two miles closer to the site on the map from the Chatham fault as well as a number of shear zones within the proposed Halifax-Pittsylvania site (SE-3).

Third, the Department of Energy felt that seismic activity was insufficient in "the absence of further evaluation" to disqualify the proposed Hanover site (SE-1). But what is the level of seismic activity that has been documented in the region of Hanover site (SE-1)?

Mr. Chairman, in this instance, as shown in Figure 6, "X" marks the spot—or more accurately, the spots—of the epicenters of 216 earthquakes in and around the Virginia sites since 1774. The Hanover site (SE-1) is located within portions of the three counties outlined in the central section of the Figure 6.

For those of you interested in documentation of more recent earthquake activity near the Hanover site (SE-1), Figure 7 shows the number of earthquake epicenters registered just since 1978.

Why, we ask, does the Department of Energy want futher study in order to locate a repository in the midst of one of Virginia's most prolific earthquake zones—a zone whose quakes have been documented to occur high in the earth's crust at the very level at which a repository would be located?

A fourth and final example of our concerns over the Department of Energy's failure to adhere to its own criteria and the facts that are readily available is evidenced at the proposed Bedford County site (SE-2). The Department of Energy's own criteria, quite logically, provide that independent cities shall be excluded from consideration. Yet, the proposed Bedford County site (SE-2) actually includes portions of the City of Bedford.

Mr. Chairman, let me say unequivocally that complacency has no place in the search for scientific evidence.

Furthermore, the errors we have found in the Department of Energy's work raise serious questions as to the accuracy of the Department's report and the Department of Energy's commitment to the most objective and equitable siting process.

Our case is strong, our wish is clear, and our expectations are evident. We recognize that the Department of Energy has a difficult and challenging mission, and we appreciate the process that has allowed us to develop these facts.

But the facts—all of them—should dictate the next step in the process.

Mr. Chairman, the plain truth of the matter is that the Department's report ignores many facts—and misinterprets many others.

The facts—unadorned and unadulterated—demonstrate clearly that the three proposed sites identified by the Department of Energy in Virginia do not meet the Department of Energy's own criteria and should be eliminated from further consideration under the siting process.

RECESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the House will stand in recess for 15 minutes.

There was no objection.

Accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 55 minutes p.m.), the House stood in recess until approximately 2:10 p.m.

□ 1400

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. HAYES) at 2:13 p.m.

RECESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the House will stand in recess for 15 minutes.

There was no objection.

Accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 14 minutes p.m.), the House stood in recess until 2:30 p.m.

□ 1430

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker at 2:30 p.m.

VACATING THE PROCEEDINGS BY WHICH HOUSE RESOLUTION 427 WAS ADOPTED BY THE HOUSE ON APRIL 22, 1986 AND PROVIDING THAT SAID RESOLUTION SHALL BE CONSIDERED TO HAVE BEEN LAID ON THE TABLE

Mr. PEPPER, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 432, Rept. 99-553) which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

H. RES. 432

Resolved, That the proceedings by which H. Res. 427 was adopted by the House on April 22, 1986 are hereby vacated, and said resolution shall be considered to have been laid on the table.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 432 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House now consider House resolution 432?

The question was taken.

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present. The resolution requires a two-thirds vote for passage.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 333, nays 68, not voting 32, as follows:

Messrs. LEHMAN of California, MARTINEZ, and PASHAYAN changed their voted from "yea" to "nay."

Mrs. KENNELLY and Messrs. AUCOIN, ANNUNZIO, HAWKINS, SWINDALL, DAVIS, ROBERT F. SMITH, CROCKETT, HAYES, ROSE, FOGLIETTA, SMITH of Florida, and SCHUMER changed their votes from "nay" to "yea."

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the House agreed to consider House Resolution 432.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] desire time?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 432 vacates the proceedings by which House Resolution 427 was adopted yesterday and lays the resolution on the table. As my colleagues are aware, yesterday a resolution passed this House that had the effect of lifting the limitation on outside earned income for Members. The resolution now before the Members would restore the limitations that were in place before yesterday's action. In other words, House Resolution 432 would reimpose the 30-percent limitation on outside earned income for Members by vitiating the action taken by the House.

Mr. Speaker, it is clear that Members are concerned about the absence of full legislative scrutiny of the amendment to the rules of the House adopted yesterday. There is a general consensus that the sensitive issues of Members' compensation and outside income should be addressed through careful study and deliberation.

The committee wishes to make the legislative intent in this matter clear. The committee's action in reporting this resolution should not be viewed as an endorsement of the previous rule setting a ceiling on outside income of 30 percent of a Members' pay. Nor should it be viewed as a rejection of the 40-percent limit adopted by the House yesterday, or of any other higher or lower limit which might be proposed in any subsequent legislation, subject to the normal procedure. The resolution presented today simply responds to the concerns I have discussed, by restoring the status quo. The committee views it as important to do so promptly, to avoid arousing passions about matters which should be reviewed with care and sensitivity.

The controversy surrounding the previous resolution, and the pending matter, make it clear that the current limit on outside income, and the disparate practices of the two Houses, are issues of some importance, which deserve to be addressed through subsequent hearings and study in appropriate legislative fora.

The Committee on Rules, and other committees of appropriate jurisdiction, will continue their legislative and oversight reviews of the issues of Members' pay and allowances, limitations and standards governing honoraria and other outside income, and comparability of these matters between the two Chambers.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SENATE ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolutions of the Senate of the following titles:

S.J. Res. 214. Joint resolution providing for reappointment of Carlisle H. Hummel-sine as a citizen regent of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution;

S.J. Res. 215. Joint resolution providing for reappointment of William G. Bowen as a citizen regent of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution;

S.J. Res. 275. Joint resolution designating May 11 through May 17, 1986, as "Jewish Heritage Week";

S.J. Res. 286. Joint resolution to designate the week of April 20, 1986, through April 26, 1986, as "National Reading Is Fun Week"; and

S.J. Res. 296. Joint resolution to designate October 16, 1986, as "World Food Day."

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 56 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, April 24, 1986, at 11 a.m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

3365. A letter from the Acting Director, Defense Security Assistance Agency, transmitting notification of the Department of the Navy's proposed lease of defense articles to the Coordination Council of North American Affairs (Transmittal No. 28-86), pursuant to 22 U.S.C. 2796(a); to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SENATE—Wednesday, April 23, 1986

(Legislative day of Monday, April 21, 1986)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Our prayer this morning will be led by Dr. Billy Graham, worldwide known preacher. We are glad to have him with us.

PRAYER

The Reverend Dr. Billy Graham offered the following prayer:

Our Father and our God, as we approach the 200th anniversary of our Constitution, we praise You for this great Nation that is called America. We realize our greatness has come only because You have chosen to lead us and bless us as a nation, and we thank You from the bottom of our hearts for Your grace to us, which we do not deserve.

We thank You also for the firm moral and spiritual values of our forefathers—values which they found in Your everlasting Word. For them, the words "In God We Trust" were more than an empty slogan on our coins—they formed the very foundation of their lives and our society. We remember that Your Word has said, "Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord." (Psalms 33:12).

But, our Father, we confess we are in danger of slipping away from the moral and spiritual values which have made us great. We are in danger of losing our way in the midst of other voices that would urge us to put our trust in man rather than in You. And yet we know that any path which rejects Your truth and the values You have given us is a dead-end road that ultimately leads to only chaos and destruction. We know this has happened before in our history, and always we have been brought back as men and women have turned in repentance and faith to You. Our Father, once again we are in need of that same kind of spiritual awakening—a revival of the spirit which will touch our hearts and make us again seek first Your kingdom and Your righteousness. Convict us as a nation of our need of You, and cause us to return to You so we can find the right path again and have peace in our hearts and in our world.

What we pray for our Nation we also pray for each individual in this great body today. Where there are spiritual needs in our lives, cause us to face them honestly, and humbly turn back to You. Help us today to repent of our sins, accept Your gracious offer of forgiveness and new life, and repeat in our hearts those brave words of the Declaration of Independence: "* * * with a firm reliance on the protection of the Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

Bless also our families, and cause us in both our public and private lives to live according to Your will. Give wisdom also to each elected Senator in this body today as decisions are made that will affect our world and our people.

We also pray for our President, and for all others in our Nation, and in other nations, who are in positions of authority. Give us a new passion for justice, a new zeal for peace, a new commitment to compassion and integrity, and a new vision of what You desire us and this Nation to be.

All this we pray in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished acting majority leader is recognized.

PRAYER OF THE REVEREND DR. BILLY GRAHAM

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President pro tempore, we all thank deeply Rev. Billy Graham. He honors us being among us today. He is an inspiration to us all.

I met Reverend Graham many years ago, with my father, then Gov. Milward Simpson, and with former President Richard Nixon. I remember that very distinctly. On behalf of the entire Senate, I welcome you and express our thanks for your inspirational message, as expressed in that most moving prayer.

(Mr. LAXALT assumed the chair.)

Mr. THURMOND. Will the acting majority leader yield?

Mr. SIMPSON. I do.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, it is a genuine pleasure to have Dr. Graham here today. He is a great preacher, a great man, a great American.

Incidentally, his first big campaign was held in South Carolina. We are very proud that we started him off and he has done well ever since.

He has preached to more people than any man who ever lived. I think his popularity has been his true sincerity, his devotion to Christ, and preaching the Gospel from the Bible. We are indeed honored to have him here today and it is an honor for the Senate to have him to lead the prayer on this day.

Mr. HATFIELD. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMPSON. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I, too, would like to add my word of welcome to the Reverend Billy Graham for his prayer this morning in opening the Senate.

It has been stated that he has preached the Gospel to more people than any other person in history. I would like to say it is a very interesting point that whether it is in Moscow or whether it is any other part of the Iron Curtain countries, the Communist world, whether it is any city in our America, Latin America, Asia, or Africa, wherever in the world Reverend Graham has preached, he has had but one sermon and it has been a variation on the theme of God incarnate in Jesus Christ, the power and forgiveness of the resurrection of the crucifixion shown, the greatness and awesome power of the resurrection, and the great, magnificent power of Pentecost.

That has been his preachment; that has been his single message to people throughout the world. Indeed, it is a message of hope as well as a message of salvation.

I would like to say that my colleague JESSE HELMS and I have cosigned a letter inviting all Members of the Senate to the crusade, which opens for the first time in 25 years in Washington, DC, this coming Sunday, the 27th of April, and it will go through the period of May 4, for 1 week.

In that invitation, just one matter of logistics. There will be buses on Monday and Tuesday nights, April 28 and 29, departing from the Capitol at 6:45 p.m. Senators and their families who are interested in attending the crusade may call George Dunlop at 224-2035 for information on those buses. Those buses, by the way, are not provided at public expense but private expense.

Members of the staff are also going to be provided special transportation on Monday night, April 28.

I urge my colleagues and all members of their staff to avail themselves of hearing Reverend Graham if at all possible in their schedules. While in the midst of our frustrations and the pressure we work under, it is indeed an inspiring and an energizing experience in faith and trust in the sovereignty of God to rule in all these matters rather than to depend upon the machinations and the manipulations of a purely political intuition.

I am delighted to welcome Reverend Graham this morning.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. HELMS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished acting majority leader for yielding. Of all the Senators who are pleased to have Dr. Billy Graham here today, I suspect I am the most pleased because I believe I have known him the longest. Our friendship perhaps dates back longer than either he or I would like to acknowledge. He and his remarkable family have been wonderful friends down through the years.

There are many things that could and should be said about this man. Down in North Carolina, I say to my friend from Oregon, we like to identify the many products and commodities our State exports to countries abroad. The No. 1 export from North Carolina, in my book, is Billy Graham. He has been all over the world preaching the truth, the light, and the hope of salvation. We all are familiar with the extraordinary ministry and career of Billy Graham and the fine people associated with him, for example, T.W. Wilson and others. But I think it should be noted here that not only has Billy Graham preached throughout the world; he and Ruth have reared a family which is nothing short of remarkable.

For example, Mr. President, I have had the privilege of belonging to the same church in Raleigh, NC, with one of Billy's and Ruth's daughter, Anne, and her husband, Dr. Daniel Lotz. I know of no two other young people who have done more to inspire a large segment of the population of the Raleigh area than these two fine young people.

Mrs. Lotz, the former Anne Graham, began a Bible study class for young people several years ago. Every Wednesday morning, she has filled the sanctuary of the Hayes Barton Baptist Church, women of all ages who drive 30 to 40 miles or more to hear Anne Lotz lead in Bible study, thus walking in the footsteps of her distinguished father.

So I say to my friend, Billy Graham, not only am I pleased that you are here today. You honor this Senate by your presence just as you have honored this country. You are a great patriot, a great American, and a great friend.

Thank you, Mr. President. I yield the floor.

SENATE WELCOMES BILLY GRAHAM

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, we are deeply honored to welcome this morning, one of the leading figures of our times . . . the Reverend Billy Graham. His very special brand of inspiration has touched millions and millions of people the world over, and he has touched those of us here today.

History will show that he has brought the word of God to more countries and more people than any other man who has ever lived. He has served as a role model for our youth and a pillar of wisdom and strength for Presidents and Kings. But true to his humble approach to his Lordly duty, the Reverend Graham recently said "There are others who could have done it much better than I." In my view, I doubt that anyone who has ever heard you would ever agree with that statement!

Mr. President, I know my Senate colleagues join me in wishing Reverend Graham and his family all the best. May you carry on your amazing life of devotion for many, many more years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

SCHEDULE

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, there will be the remaining time for the two leaders under the standing order of 10 minutes each, of which a portion has certainly expired as I yielded to my colleagues.

There will be special orders in favor of the following Senators for not to exceed 5 minutes each: Senator HAWKINS, whose statement will be delivered by our President pro tempore of the Senate Mr. THURMOND; Senator BIDEN; Senator CRANSTON; and Senator PROXMIRE.

Then, there will be a period for routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 10:30 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein 5 minutes each.

Following routine morning business, the Senate will resume consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 120, the budget resolution. Rollcall votes can be expected throughout the day. However, any votes ordered on Senate Concurrent Resolution 120 after the hour of 3:30 p.m. will be held over until tomorrow, Thursday, April 24.

RESERVATION OF MINORITY LEADER'S TIME

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the minority leader's time be reserved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SENATOR HAWKINS' SPECIAL ORDER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The President pro tempore is recognized.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I have a statement on behalf of the able and distinguished Senator from Florida who, at this time, is in the hospital from an operation but who is improving fast and it is hoped she will soon be out.

The statement reads:

CRACK

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I am sorry to say, but it is time to add two new words to our drug dictionaries: those words are "crack" and "rock." These are street-talk for the latest, most deadly narcotic to hit our communities and threaten the lives of our children.

It is hard to exaggerate the threat posed by crack. According to Arnold Washton, a psychopharmacologist at Fair Oaks Hospital in Summit, New Jersey, "Crack is the most addictive drug known to man right now . . . it is almost instantaneous addiction, whereas if you snort coke it can take two to five years before addiction sets in. There is no such thing as the 'recreational use' of crack."

What is crack? Crack is a variation on cocaine. I am not going to contribute to the problem by describing how crack is made. It should be enough to know that this deadly substance can be produced by combining cocaine with products that are found in the family kitchen. What results when the process is finished is a white substance that resembles soap or a whitish gravel. Rather than being snorted like cocaine, crack is generally smoked in a water pipe.

Imagine a drug that is instantly addicting on its first use. Think of the threat this poses to our children and our neighborhoods. We all know that kids are curious. They like to go where they should not go, and do what they should not do. Sometimes that may even mean "experimenting" with drugs. We cannot condone this, but we can understand it—we have all been kids at one time.

But crack does not give a kid a chance. There is no such thing as "experimenting" when it comes to crack. Crack steals your future and robs your soul on its first shot. There are no second chances.

Crack is not just dangerous. It is deadly, and it is frightening.

But instant addiction does not tell the whole story for crack—there is more. And it gets worse. Crack is cheap. And by cheap I do not mean $50 a shot, or even $30 dollars. I mean 10 to 15 dollars. For the price of a couple of movie tickets, our kids can be hooked for life.

Crack is a drug dealer's dream come true. It is cheap, it is easy to transport and it produces its own customers. How? One use and you have a repeat customer.

The only good news about crack is that it is so new that it has not made inroads into many communities. But where it has, there are reports of violence and chaos. In New York and LA there are reports of places called "rock houses." A rock house is an apartment with a steel-reinforced door. The door has a small opening through which money is exchanged for crack. The steel door protects the dealers from thieves and police alike. In some communities there are even young gangs that protect these sleazy merchants of death.

We need to get out the word to our schools, neighborhoods and workplaces, that crack is deadly addicting. We need to tell our kids that playing with crack is like playing with fire. And we need to redouble our efforts in the war on drugs.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I just want to say that in my judgment, this is a most timely statement by the distinguished Senator from Florida. No one in the Senate has done more to reveal to the public the harmful effect of drugs than the able and distinguished Senator from Florida [Mrs. HAWKINS].

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR BIDEN

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BIDEN] is recognized.

A TIME TO ACT

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, it is time for the Congress and the President to get on with the business of adopting a budget. For the last 3 weeks the debate here in Washington has been focused on what I consider to be a very trivial issue—whose budget is to be considered and who will act first. Democrats and Republicans, the Senate and the House of Representatives, the President and the Congress have all been at odds over the mechanics of action—who goes first, who gets credit, who takes the blame.

Mr. President, I am sure you agree with me that that is not the issue. This is not a House budget; or a Senate budget; or a Republican budget; or a Democratic budget. What we are trying to adopt is a budget for the United States.

In my view, the American people do not care who acts on the budget first. They do not care about who gets credit for having their budget considered or who gets blamed for proposing a budget which contains some unpleasant news. They are concerned about budget policies that have increased the public debt by over $1 trillion in the last 5 years. They do want a budget which will start reducing the deficits, which have contributed to a trade deficit of $150 billion and the destruction of basic industries in this country.

The Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit reduction proposal, which I supported, was created in the hope that it would force Congress—and the President—to address the deficit problem. I and other supporters hoped that it could force a consensus in this body on fiscal policy where none would otherwise exist.

The budget now under consideration by the Senate has the makings of a consensus budget. It meets the deficit reduction targets of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings in ways that deserve careful consideration—in a balanced way. It restrains defense spending. It realigns some domestic priorities without hurting essential services. And it calls for paying for itself—an unusual circumstance in my 14 years in the U.S. Senate, Mr. President. We are actually introducing amendments to spend more money and at the same time we have a companion proposal, all one and the same, saying how we will raise the money to pay for that new spending. I think it is about time.

I am not giving this budget a blanket endorsement. I may vote for some amendments, some changes in spending priorities or additional priorities. But this budget does offer a sound base for the President and Congress to use in their consideration of Federal fiscal policy for the next fiscal year.

Up to now, President Reagan has refused to participate in efforts to shape a widely acceptable budget that would reduce deficits, and begin to meet his 1981 pledge to balance the budget. Congressional budget action has been stymied by President Reagan's intransigence, his unwillingness to negotiate for any budget but his own. Yet it is clear that his budget is not acceptable to a majority of either House. The budget process has been marking time while efforts were made to persuade the President to join Congress in this deficit reduction exercise. It is clear that, without his participation in the budget process, a consensus budget cannot finally be implemented.

This Nation needs a financial blueprint. It needs a plan that will shape legislation for the rest of the year—spending bills, reconciliation, and revenue. The country needs to know that we are on track to a lower, meaning $144 billion, deficit target for fiscal year 1987 and how we are going to get there.

The people of the United States want to know these things. They have a right to know them.

Our present budget process, as it was revised last year, is the best hope we have, in this Senator's opinion, to eliminate the deficits that threaten our economic vitality. But we must proceed quickly. Time is slipping away.

I urge the President to join with the leadership of both parties, in both Houses of Congress, to fashion a deficit reduction package that will begin to remove the specter of $200 billion yearly deficits that hangs over our economy.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

THE UNITED STATES MUST NOT BETRAY ITS WORD ON THE ABM TREATY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the Washington Post reported on March 26 that the Defense Department is considering appealing to the President for what they call a "less restrictive" interpretation of the antiballistic missile treaty. That "less restrictive" interpretation would constitute a shocking and deliberate betrayal of this Government's solemn treaty pledge. The treaty has been consistently interpreted by our Government to prohibit testing of such new technology weapons in space as lasers or particle beams. The Defense Department wants to interpret the treaty to prohibit only the actual deployment of these systems in space. The State Department disagrees. It wants to stand by the position our Government has held since 1972 that tests in space of these new weapons would overtly violate the treaty. Last year, President Reagan "split the difference." He decided that the new interpretation of the antiballistic missile treaty permitting actual space testing was legally correct. Nevertheless, the President announced that this country would follow the more restrictive interpretation, at least for the time being. Now Gen. James Abrahamson wants the President to lift restrictive interpretation and go directly to the tests. Abrahamson claims such a policy would be most cost effective. He says the tests would save money. They would save time. They would give a higher confidence in the results.

So what is wrong with this new interpretation of the treaty? The answer is: Plenty. Consider the judgment of the two American's who are best qualified to interpret that treaty. First, there is the legal adviser to the U.S. delegation that negotiated the treaty, John B. Rhinelander. Second, there is the chief negotiator of the treaty for the United States, Gerard Smith.

What does Rhinelander say about this interpretation of the treaty? In "Arms Control Today," the October 1985 issue, he wrote:

The new interpretation is grossly incorrect.

He added:

Unless the Congress intervenes and limits strategic defense expenditures according to the traditonal U.S. interpretation, wherein development and testing of space and other mobile basing modes are prohibited, all restraints on Reagan's star wars plan may come unleashed.

What position has Gerard Smith, the principle American negotiator of the ABM Treaty, taken? He has contended that if the United States engaged in the proposed tests under the new interpretation of the treaty, the treaty would become a "dead letter."

Mr. President, the word of the U.S. Government is at stake here. What do we mean when we talk about the integrity of our country? We mean that when our country makes a promise, it keeps that promise. We respect a person whose word is his bond. In the same way, we respect a nation that lives by its promises.

In the ABM Treaty, we have more than the promise of the President of the United States. We have that. We also have a treaty signed by the President. We also have a treaty ratified by this body, the U.S. Senate. This treaty promise was not ratified by a bare two-thirds majority. We have a treaty ratified by an overwhelming 89-to-2 vote. It would be a first-class blunder to do so, but we could honorably seek to renegotiate the treaty with the Soviet Union to change its provisions. We could honorably renounce the treaty. Our Government is not preparing to do that. It is preparing to ignore the clear understanding of our own preeminent experts so that we can pretend we are keeping our word. How can we do that? How can we flatly reject the judgment of the two experts who are obviously the top American authorities on the treaty?

Mr. President, let us face it. We should either renounce the ABM Treaty, root and branch, or we should desist from any star wars development that goes beyond laboratory research. Isn't it common sense that the whole purpose, the single purpose, of the ABM Treaty is to stop an antiballistic missile development by either superpower? That was our American purpose in negotiating the treaty. The treaty was an American initiative. It was resisted, strongly resisted, by the Soviet Union for years. We finally persuaded them that if an antiballistic missile race got underway between the two superpowers, significant arms control, for all intents and purposes, would be dead. Why would it be dead? Because an ABM system would force the adversary to resist any proposal to reduce or limit offensive nuclear arms. In fact, it would force both superpowers to strive to counter the opposition ABM system by a head-long, sled-length production and deployment of offensive nuclear missiles.

How did we get ourselves in a position where we are on the verge of killing the treaty this country conceived, drafted, and, after years of hard negotiations, succeeded in reaching agreement on and overwhelmingly ratifying? We did it by beginning the national commitment to the very antiballistic missile system our ABM Treaty flatly prohibits. Now the administration wants to test and build the ABM system our treaty was designed expressly to stop. In the judgment of this Senator, that is a tragic mistake. But the administration is making a worse mistake. It is not straight-forwardly renouncing the treaty. It is imposing a transparently self-serving reinterpretation of the treaty that is so conspicuously dishonest that the principle legal authority on the treaty, the American legal adviser on the very negotiations that achieved agreement on the treaty, says is "grossly incorrect." And the chief negotiator, Gerard Smith, has said that this reinterpretation will make the treaty a "dead letter."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article to which I referred by John B. Rhinelander, entitled "Reagan's 'Exotic' Interpretation of the ABM Treaty—Legally, Historically, and Factually Wrong," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REAGAN'S EXOTIC INTERPRETATION OF THE ABM TREATY

(By John B. Rhinelander)

A new version of the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty was introduced by National Security Advisor Robert McFarlane on a nationally televised interview program on October 6. McFarlane asserted that research, development and testing of defensive systems "involving new physical concepts . . . are approved and authorized by the treaty. Only deployment is foreclosed." According to this new interpretation, sea-based, air-based, space-based and mobile land-based "exotic systems and components," such as those being pursued in the Strategic Defense Initiative, may be developed and tested, but not deployed, consistent with the ABM Treaty. A review of the new treaty, its intent, the particular provisions in question, its negotiation and ratification record, and its subsequent application by the United States and Soviet Union reveal quite clearly that this new interpretation is grossly incorrect. Unfortunately, the result of McFarlene's announcement is much more than a legalistic squabble. Unless Congress intervenes and limits strategic defense expenditures according to the traditional U.S. interpretation, wherein development and testing of space and other mobile basing modes are prohibited, all restraints on Reagan's Star Wars plan may come unleashed. In the words of its chief negotiator, Gerald Smith, the ABM Treaty would be rendered a "dead letter."

On October 11, the President decided that he agreed "in principle, but not in practice" with this reinterpretation. Based on a Presidential Directive, Secretary of State George Shultz announced on October 14 before the North Atlantic Assembly that "a broader interpretation of our authority is fully justified," but SDI "will be conducted in accordance with a restrictive interpretation of the treaty's obligations." This leaves the United States legally free to return to the reinterpretation whenever the President and his advisors deem advantageous. The President has not said how long the administration would continue to abide by the "restrictive interpretation," which now represents presidential policy rather than a matter of law.

The legal rationale for the reinterpretation revolves around Article II(1) and Agreed Statement D. Article II(1), which defines ABM systems, includes the phrase "currently consisting of" immediately before the definitions of 'traditional' ABM components. The administration argues that "currently consisting of" would be better understood if the comma in the text were deleted and the text read "and only those consisting of." Therefore, the administration argues (1) the treaty, and particularly Article V(1), constrains only 'traditional' ABM technology (ABM interceptor missiles, ABM launchers and ABM radars). (2) The treaty permits development, testing and deployment of 'exotic' ABM systems and components, however based. (3) Agreed Statement D implicitly amends Article V(1) and Article III to prohibit deployment of 'exotic' systems and components whatever their basing mode.

This rationale is absurd as a matter of policy, intent and interpretation. If the President sticks with it as the best legal interpretation, he has effectively repudiated the ABM Treaty as a legal instrument. If the truncated treaty remains in effect, both the United States and the Soviet Union can develop and test, without quantitative or geographic limits, any sea-based or mobile land-based ABM system or component provided they utilize 'exotic' technology such as lasers.

But the result could be even more far reaching. Because the administration's new interpretation is that Article V(1) and other substantive articles of the treaty do not apply to 'exotic' systems and Agreed Statement D blocks only their deployment, then the limits on "ABM systems or components" throughout the treaty do not include 'exotic' systems. The consequences of this reinterpretation are dramatic when one considers that the principal U.S. concern historically has been, and apparently remains so within the Defense Department, Soviet 'breakout' capability based on 'traditional' or 'low-tech' systems. These remain tightly constrained notwithstanding the reinterpretation. On the other hand, most of SDI or 'high-tech' systems are now legally unconstrained by the treaty.

The new interpretation maintains several constraints on the 'traditional' systems of the Soviet ABM program: ABM deployment is limited to the one area surrounding Moscow; ABM tests must be limited to their two ABM test ranges; the development, testing and deployment of land-mobile 'traditional' ABM systems and components are prohibited; and the ban on the 'upgrade' of surface-to-air missile (SAM) system remains in full force. However, under the reinterpretation the Soviets now legally could place in the field an unlimited number of mobile land-based lasers (the Soviets have an active laser program) for ABM purposes across the Soviet Union provided they were labeled for "test" purposes.

The United States for its part is now free to exploit western technology in the full pursuit of Star Wars. A full-scale operational system, including large numbers of satellite battle stations and related sensors, together with fixed ground-based lasers apparently not limited to existing ABM test ranges, could now be 'legally' put in place as an extensive "test program" to prove out the new technology in a system configuration. U.S. allies would be free of any treaty restraints to participate in two-way transfers of most SDI technology, with the only legal constraints on 'west-west' technology being those under the Munitions Control and Export Administration Acts.

This result is clearly absurd. Unbeknownst to the U.S. SALT I delegation, the SALT I backstopping apparatus in Washington, the Nixon administration and each successive administration, and Congress, the United States would now have achieved the most one-sided treaty relationship imaginable.

The catch is, of course, it could not last for a minute. Arms control agreements are viable only as long as they are in the net interests of each party. Secretary Shultz has spoken of the need to "prevent the erosion of the ABM Treaty," but Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger, Under Secretary Fred Ikle, and Assistant Secretary Richard Perle have repeatedly stated that they have no use for the ABM Treaty and the sooner the United States is without it the better. Secretary Weinberger's November 13 letter to the President, leaked to the press on the eve of the summit, reinforces the view that treaty commitments that impinge U.S. programs are of little relevance to the Office of the Secretary of Defense. Unless the President or Congress repudiates this self-defeating step, OSD officials can claim that any action they wish to take short of full-scale final deployment is legally permitted under the treaty.

The rationale for the timing of the announcement of the initial reinterpretation immediately before the summit remains obscure. It has been clear that under the historic interpretation the evolution of SDI research into development and testing would have to be stopped somewhere between 1988, as I believe, and 1991, as even DOD officials have privately conceded, unless the Soviet Union agrees to amend the treaty or the United States formally withdraws from it. One of the political reasons for the administration's hasty initial reinterpretation may have been OSD's attempt to redefine the treaty before any commitments could be made by the President at the summit that might prevent a subsequent reinterpretation. To this end, an early reinterpretation was devised even though no presently scheduled SDI test could, in OSD's judgement, be inconsistent with the treaty during President Reagan's term of office.

Another reason may have been to encourage more allies to support SDI by participating in cooperative SDI research. Foreign corporations, particularly in the United Kingdom and West Germany, might be encouraged by the reinterpretation because cooperation might legally be extended from "research" to include "development and testing" with full sharing and two-way transfers. The actual effect on U.S. allies was the reverse because the political fallout of this full sharing in SDI technology directly associated with ABM systems or components would have formally associated allied governments with the repudiation of the ABM Treaty. That is a role that none of our allies is prepared to accept or condone.

The primary issue in the debate over the reinterpretation of the ABM Treaty is whether Article V(1) prohibits the development and testing of space-based and other mobile-type 'exotic systems' (e.g., space-based lasers). The secondary issue is whether any of the treaty's substantive constraints on "ABM systems or components" apply to 'exotic systems.' The answer is four-fold:

The prohibitions are clear from the text of the treaty, particularly Article II(1), which indicates the treaty is not limited to the ban on the then current technology, and Article V(1), which refers to "ABM systems and components" rather than traditional technology (i.e., AB interceptor missiles, launchers and radars).

The negotiating history, as interpreted in 1972 by the SALT I delegation and the backstopping representatives in Washington, supports the functional approach to the treaty, including the broad ban on space-based 'exotic systems,' as the only permissible interpretation.

This broad ban on 'exotic systems' has been the executive branch interpretation that has been accepted and relied upon by Congress since 1972, and even by the Reagan administration in successive arms control impact statements and its SDI report of April 1985.

Any other result is patently absurd and would frustrate the stated premise of this treaty: to prohibit the deployment of nationwide ABM systems or a "base" for such a system.

The Soviets accepted this interpretation during the negotiations as indicated by the treaty text and reflected it in their ratification proceedings. They have not taken any actions or made any official statements inconsistent with this interpretation. Though Soviet public statements on the issue since 1972 have been somewhat ambiguous, their recent statements have been explicit. General Secretary Gorbachev's interview in Time magazine last August includes a specific statement that is clear and unambiguous. The Tass statement of October 9, responding to the U.S. reinterpretation, removed any latent ambiguity from the current Soviet public position.

Marshal Sergei Akhromeyev's lengthy Pravda article on October 19, 1985, represents a definitive Soviet public affirmation of the broad ban in Article V. Akhromeyev, the Chief of the Soviet General Staff, said the ABM Treaty "absolutely unambiguously bans" the development, testing and deployment of space-based 'exotic' ABM systems. He explicitly confirmed the historic interpretation. This is a very important statement, particularly since it suggests a dividing line between permissible research and prohibited development and testing. The Soviets are backing off their unwarranted position that "research" was, could or should be banned.

The administration now contends that either the Soviet Union never agreed with the U.S. interpretation of the treaty or that the Soviet Union later modified their agreement or changed their interpretation during negotiations over Agreed Statement D. A review of the text of the treaty and a proper understanding of the purpose of Agreed Statement D disproves this reinterpretation. The formulation of Agreed Statement D was addressed during the negotiations only after the texts of Article II(1), III and V had been agreed. The text of Article III preserved the right of the United States, reflecting the position of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, to develop and test fixed land-based lasers but not to permit deployment. The Soviet delegates originally sought no limits on deployment on fixed land-based 'exotics.' Accordingly, the U.S. delegation insisted and the Soviets eventually agreed that Article III should authorize the fixed land-based deployment of only ABM systems and components that were based on "current" technology. However, development and testing, whatever the technology, of fixed land-based ABM systems and components could be carried out at ABM test ranges. Consistent with presidential instructions, ABM systems were defined functionally and the ban on all mobile-type 'exotic' systems, including those for space, was set at the development stage.

As formally accepted, Agreed Statement D was explicitly tied to Article III, which dealt with fixed land-based deployments. Both in its text and in the negotiating history, it had nothing to do with Article V. The reference to Article XIV in Agreed Statement D indicated that the treaty would have to be amended before a fixed land-based 'exotic' weapon, such as a laser, could be deployed.

While the language admittedly could be clearer, the United States has always understood that Agreed Statement D reinforced the Articles I(2) and III prohibition on deployment of fixed land-based 'exotic' systems unless and until the treaty is amended. Agreed Statement D certainly does not diminish or amend Article V(1).

The administration also contends that the ratification process was ambiguous and that neither the executive nor the Senate understood the "restrictive" interpretation. This position is clearly nonsensical.

The ratification hearings before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and particularly the Senate Armed Services Committee, led to a much fuller public record on many of the nuances. Some of the initial testimony of officials on 'exotic' systems did not clearly distinguish the treaty's provisions for banning only the "deployment" of fixed land-based systems from its broad ban on space and other mobile-type systems, but the record was frequently supplemented. This includes the submission for the record of the Senate Armed Services Committee by Ambassador Smith, prepared after an interagency review of reporting cables, in response to a question by Senator Jackson on the difference between research and development for purposes of Article V. This issue was important, of course, to the understanding at what point in the research and development cycle Article V applied to 'exotic' systems. The Armed Services Committee hearings include explicit confirmation submitted by Secretary of Defense Melvin Laird, Under Secretary for Defense Development Research and Evaluation John Foster, and Acting Chief of Staff of the Army General Palmer, that development and testing, as well as deployment, of space-based 'exotic' systems were prohibited. Senator Jackson, who was a critic of SALT I but voted for the ABM Treaty, educated other Committee members and even led witnesses on this point.

Finally, Senator James Buckley (R-NY) stated on the Senate floor on August 3, 1972, that he opposed the ABM Treaty and would vote against it largely because of the scope of Article V. He said: "Thus the agreement goes so far as to prohibit the development, test or deployment of sea-, air- or space-based ballistic missile defense systems. This clause, in Article V of the ABM Treaty, would have the effect, for example, of prohibiting the development and testing of a laser type system based in space which could at least in principle provide an extremely reliable and effective system of defenses against ballistic missiles. The technological possibility has been formally excluded by this agreement."

The vote in favor of advice and consent to ratification was 88–2. The administration's support for its reinterpretation rests on the implicit argument that testimonies of Pentagon witnesses before the Armed Services Committee are of little weight in assessing the Senate's understanding of the ABM Treaty. In fact, the more the administration argues its case, the more ridiculous it looks.

In my judgment, the Fiscal Year 1985 Arms Control Impact Statement prepared by the Reagan administration correctly states the agreement reached with the Soviets in 1971-72 on the meaning of Article V(1): "The ABM Treaty bans the development, testing and deployment of all ABM systems and components that are sea-based, air-based, space-based or mobile land-based . . . The ABM Treaty prohibition on development, testing and deployment of space-based ABM systems, or components for such systems, applies to directed energy technology (or any other technology used for this purpose). Thus, when such directed energy programs enter the field testing phase they become constrained by these ABM Treaty obligations." (Emphasis added.)

The SDI Report to Congress (April 1985), especially Appendix B, which gives the justification for the program under the treaty, is essentially consistent with this statement.

In summary, Article V of the treaty bans the development, testing and deployment of ABM systems or components of space or mobile-ground basing and, moreover, regardless of whether these systems are based on existing or 'future' technologies. In accordance with Statement D, to which the administration now refers so often, and Articles III and IV, the conduct of development and testing of ABM systems or their components based on other physical principles is allowed in areas that are strictly limited and defined by the treaty and only using land-based ABM systems.

The administration's justification for its reinterpretation is that the Soviets never agreed to, and cannot now be held to comply with, the historic U.S. position. Instead of reinterpreting the clear text of the 1972 treaty based on a selective review of the classified U.S. negotiating records, the better approach under international law and practice would have been to review post-ratification statements and conduct, which is at least as important as the negotiating record. As stated in the current draft of the Restatement of the Foreign Relations Law of the United States (Revised), "An international agreement is to be interpreted in good faith in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given to its terms in their context and in light of its objects and purposes." Further, "Subsequent practice between the parties in the application of the agreement is to be taken into account in interpreting the agreement."

If there were any legitimate doubt as to the meaning of the ABM Treaty, the best approach would have been to ask the Soviet negotiators in private in Geneva whether or not the Soviet Union agrees that Article V(1) bans the development, testing and deployment of 'exotic' space-based systems and ask whether the Soviets were prepared to be bound in writing. If the private Soviet response had been "no," then the administrations reinterpretation would have been justified. If the private Soviet response in Geneva were "yes," as one would expect from their public statements since 1972, then the October 6 reinterpretation and the October 11 recanting by the administration would have been unnecessary. Agreed statements on the basic points could have been negotiated quickly if deemed necessary for clarity.

If a private but positive Soviet response in Geneva were now rejected by the United States as "too late" because the United States wanted to keep open the option of reasserting its reinterpretation, then the OSD motive behind the initial change in U.S. position—to erode immediately and eventually destroy the ABM Treaty—would be clear. This now appears to be the case. The question was not asked before the reinterpretation was announced on October 6 because the Soviets would have agreed, which is not what OSD wants.

If arms control is to remain an element of U.S. security policy, the challenge will be to strengthen the ABM Treaty through specific, mutual and verifiable Agreed Statements and Common Understandings. This challenge can be met if the political will exists. The Standing Consultative Commission (SCC) was charged with seeking agreed interpretations as one of its assigned tasks. The SCC has been underutilized. It could easily, and quickly, negotiate Agreed Statements and review and revise Agreed Statement D to make its intended meaning clearer.

Before constructive steps can be achieved on comprehensive arms control reductions on offensive weapons, and assuming the Soviets are prepared to negotiate and not just posture, the President should publicly repudiate the reinterpretation he recently received from his advisors on a narrow scope of Article V(1) and other critical articles of the ABM Treaty. Congress could contribute to this result by approving next year a provision in the DOD authorization bill limiting SDI fund expenditures to the legal standard in the FY 85 Arms Control Impact Statement. This whole sorry business could lead to a constructive ending if the United States and the Soviet Union were to agree privately in the SCC, at the Geneva arms talks, or at the next summit on Agreed Statements that would clarify the overall scope of the ABM Treaty.

MYTH OF THE DAY: ALL DOMESTIC PROGRAMS RECEIVED A 4.3-PERCENT CUT ON MARCH 1

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the myth of the day is that all domestic projects except some welfare programs faced a 4.3-percent cut on March 1.

A case in point is the alcohol, drug abuse, and mental health block grants. Here is a case where some States are receiving no cut or very little cut in their allocation—a tiny fraction of 1 percent—and others, like Wisconsin, are receiving cuts as large as 15 percent.

Yet the mandate of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings was for equal cuts. In this case, an equal 4.3-percent cut.

Unfortunately, the deficit reduction language did not specifically override provisions in the existing law which are designed to correct imbalances in funding formulas. And that is precisely the case we have with the ADAMHA block grant.

Here is a block grant whose funds were amalgamated in the hectic rush to complete work on President Reagan's first major budget reform measure, the omnibus reconciliation bill of 1981. Consequently, some States were unfairly penalized by being allocated a share of the block grant completely unrepresentative of their share of the population. And, to add insult to injury, they were locked into formulas prohibiting them from exercising much flexibility in redistributing funds among alcohol programs or drug abuse programs or mental health programs.

For Wisconsin, a State with 2 percent of the Nation's population, we received less than 0.8 percent of the total block grant and, within that unfairly small amount, Wisconsin was prohibited from spending more than 10 percent of its block grant funds on mental health programs. A ridiculous restriction on top of an inequitable allotment.

That changed somewhat—but not enough—in 1984 when reauthorization legislation expanded the share of new funds going to States that had been disadvantaged by the old formula and increased flexibility was provided to the States to reallocate these funds among the programs covered by the block grant.

But the Department of Health and Human Services has used that reauthorization bill giving a larger percentage of new funds to the disadvantaged States as an excuse for an unequal application of the 4.3-percent cut mandated by Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. They believe that the "hold harmless" contained in that reauthorization language prohibits them from taking the cut in any other way.

In my view, their decision ignores both the letter and spirit of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings and I have introduced legislation (S. 2087) to assure that all States and territories receiving funds from the block grant face the same percentage cut. Wisconsin and other States that had been disadvantaged in the past by funding under the ADAMHA block grant are not asking for special treatment. We are willing to take our 4.3-percent cut as unwelcome as that is. We are simply seeking equity.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

THE BUDGET PROCESS

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, we continue to hear complaints that the President of the United States has not involved himself in the budget process, that he is reluctant to negotiate, that he is not participating to work out a budget resolution that is widely acceptable in Congress.

Let me simply observe that the President has a responsibility in this process, but he has met it. He has fulfilled the obligation under the law to prepare and to submit to Congress a proposal for the allocation of funds in the Federal Government for the next fiscal year. He has met his deadline. He has submitted a budget that meets the targets of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law. It calls for expenditures of funds that, together with projected revenues, do not exceed the predetermined target for a deficit for fiscal year 1987.

Let us be honest about this. It is Congress that has not met its responsibility. A deadline of April 15 has come and gone for the adoption of a resolution by Congress on the budget. The Senate committee has worked very hard, in my judgment, to sort through the various pressures and suggestions for the allocation of funds out of the Federal Treasury for the next year. They reported a resolution. But let us look at where there has been no action and a total breakdown in the fulfillment of duties and responsibilities, and that is in the other body. The Budget Committee there has not even met in a markup session to make a recommendation for a budget resolution for Congress.

So those who continue to point the finger at the President of the United States and criticize him ought to take a look at Congress. I think that is where there has been a failure to act. It is here in Congress that we need more of an effort to be made toward fulfilling commitments and responsibilities under the Budget Act and under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

I am disappointed in the fact that we see these deadlines come and go. I know it worries those who are trying to lead the committees with jurisdictional responsibilities to fulfill those responsibilities.

The distinguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. DOMENICI] has done an outstanding job, in my judgment, and I think the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. CHILES] has worked harder than most to try to help meet these deadlines and make the Budget Act work.

Last week, the Republican leader in the House, BOB MICHEL, and I introduced legislation—he in the House and I in the Senate—to create a temporary joint committee on the budget to try to help move along the reporting of a concurrent resolution, as required under the Budget Act, by Congress. Even though the Senate committee has acted, the House committee continues to take no action whatsoever.

We are suggesting that Congress ought to create this joint committee. The committees end up in conference ultimately, anyway, to try to work out the differences between the House and the Senate-passed resolutions. Why not start out working together? Let us report to the House and the Senate an identical resolution, and let the bodies work their will in their own way, and in conference let the joint committee sort through the differences and come back with a final product.

That, to me, would accelerate the schedule and the procedures under which we are operating. It should have been done earlier. There is a provision for this under the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law; and if the Supreme Court happens to decide that there is a constitutional problem, there is this joint committee created under the law that will fulfill the responsibility of presenting to the President the figures under which he can then issue a sequester order.

So it is not as though this has not been thought of before. We think it should be done now, no matter what the Supreme Court may say about the constitutionality of the budget process.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of a Dear Colleague letter which I sent around to Senators on Monday describing this new joint committee be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, April 21, 1986.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: I am writing to invite you to join me as a cosponsor of legislation which I feel will assist the Congress in dealing with the budget mandates we face in a more expeditious and effective manner.

I have introduced a concurrent resolution, S. Con. Res. 132, calling for the temporary establishment of a Joint Budget Committee. Congressman Bob Michel, Republican Leader in the House of Representatives, has introduced identical legislation in the House.

As we all know, Congressional budget deadlines have been difficult to meet in the past, and will be even more difficult this year under the new Gramm-Rudman-Hollings timetables. We have already missed the April 15 deadline for completing action on a concurrent budget resolution for fiscal year 1987. Clearly, without joint Congressional action, it may be impossible to meet other deadlines this year.

The Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law provides that, in the event that the reporting procedures now before the Supreme Court are invalidated, there will be established a "Joint Committee on Deficit Reduction", made up of the entire membership of the Budget Committee of the House of Representatives and the Senate. The purpose of this joint committee is to report and pass a joint resolution requiring the President's signature in order to implement any sequestration.

Congressman Michel and I believe that Congress should not wait until the Supreme Court rules in this case to establish such a Joint Budget Committee. The immediate establishment of a Joint Committee, and commencement of deliberations on a budget resolution for fiscal year 1987, would ensure the best and most efficient implementation of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings and the congressional budget process.

The temporary Joint Committee we are proposing would have the duty of reporting a concurrent budget resolution for fiscal year 1987. It would be composed of the entire membership of the Budget Committees of both Houses. The existing Budget Committee Chairmen would serve as co-chairmen of the new Joint Committee.

An Executive Committee made up of one-third of the membership of each Budget Committee would be established to facilitate the proceedings of the much larger Joint Committee. The Executive Committee would make recommendations to the full Joint Committee for its approval or modification.

Establishment of a Joint Budget Committee on a temporary basis would also provide a trial period for determining the feasibility of a permanent Joint Budget Committee, as well as other needed reforms of our budget process.

I hope you will join me by supporting this legislation, which would allow a reasonable and more efficient alternative for achieving our budget goals.

A copy of the concurrent resolution is attached. If you wish to cosponsor, please contact me or Linda Slade of my staff at 4-2508.

Sincerely,

THAD COCHRAN,
U.S. Senator.

S. CON. RES. 132

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring),

SECTION 1. TEMPORARY JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET.

(a) ESTABLISHMENT.—There is established a Temporary Joint Committee on the Budget (hereafter in this concurrent resolution referred to as the "Joint Committee").

(b) COMPOSITION.—

(1) The Joint Committee shall be composed of the entire membership of the Committee on the Budget of the House of Representatives and the Committee on the Budget of the Senate.

(2) The chairman of the Committee on the Budget of the House of Representatives and the chairman of the Committee on the Budget of the Senate shall serve as cochairmen of the Joint Committee.

(3) A majority vote of the members of the Joint Committee from each House shall be necessary for the Joint Committee to act.

(4) Vacancies in the membership of the Joint Committee shall not affect the power of the remaining members to execute the functions of the Joint Committee and shall be filled in the same manner as in the case of the original selection.

(5)(A) There is established within the Joint Committee an executive committee, to be composed of—

(i) 6 members of the Committee on the Budget of the House of Representatives designated by the chairman of such committee;

(ii) 5 members of the Committee on the Budget of the House of Representatives designated by the ranking minority member of such Committee;

(iii) 5 members of the Committee on the Budget of the Senate designated by the chairman of such Committee; and

(iv) 4 members of the Committee on the Budget of the Senate designated by the ranking minority member of such Committee.

(B) A majority of the members of the Executive Committee from each House shall be necessary for the executive committee to act.

(c) DUTIES.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, or any provision of the Standing Rules of the Senate or the rules of the House of Representatives, the Joint Committee shall have the duty to report concurrent resolutions on the budget required to be reported under title III of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974. It shall do so only after considering the recommendations of the executive committee.

(d) CONCURRENT RESOLUTIONS REPORTED BY THE JOINT COMMITTEE.—Any concurrent resolution reported by the Joint Committee shall be reported to each House of the Congress at the same time, in the same form, and with the same contents.

(e) DUTIES OF THE EXISTING BUDGET COMMITTEES.—Except as provided in subsection (c), the Committees on the Budget of the House of Representatives and the Senate shall have the duties assigned to them by the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974, by part C of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985, and by the Standing Rules of the Senate and the Rules of the House of Representatives.

(f) HEARINGS AND TESTIMONY.—The Joint Committee and any subcommittee thereof is authorized to sit and act at such times and places within the United States (whether the Congress is in session, has recessed, or has adjourned) to hold such hearings, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, documents, or vouchers by subpoena or otherwise, and to take such testimony, as it deems advisable. A subpoena may be issued over the signatures of either of the co-chairmen of the Joint Committee, or a designee of either, and may be served by any person designated by the person signing it. An oath may be administered by either of the co-chairmen of the Joint Committee, or a designee of either.

(g) STAFFING.—The staffs of the Committees on the Budget of the House of Representatives and the Senate shall serve as the staff of the Joint Committee.

(h) RECORDS.—The Joint Committee shall keep a complete record of all committee actions, including a record of the votes on any question on which a record vote is demanded.

(i) TREATMENT OF MEMBERSHIP UNDER SENATE RULES.—For purposes of paragraph 4 of rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, service of a Senator as a member of the Joint Committee, or as a co-chairman of the Joint Committee, shall not be taken into account.

(j) The Joint Committee shall cease to exist at the close of the second session of the 99th Congress.

(k) EXERCISE OF RULEMAKING POWER.—The provisions of this section are enacted—

(1) as an exercise of the rulemaking power of the Senate and the House of Representatives, respectively, and as such they shall be considered as part of the rules of each House, respectively, or of that House to which they specifically apply, and such rules shall supersede other rules only to the extent that they are inconsistent therewith; and

(2) with full recognition of the constitutional right of either House to change such rules (so far as relating to such House) at any time, in the same manner and to the same extent as in the case of any other rule of such House.

DIRKSEN AWARD FOR DISTINGUISHED REPORTING TO STEVEN ROBERTS

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, every year, the Everett M. Dirksen Award for Distinguished Reporting of Congress goes to an outstanding journalist. This year's recipient is Steven V. Roberts of the New York Times. Steve was awarded the honor recently in a ceremony in Illinois, and it seems appropriate for those of us in Washington who appreciate Steve's work to recognize him for this achievement.

The judges for this year's award noted the impressive competition and the quality of the articles submitted for consideration. Steve Roberts earned the award, said the judges, for the "unusual range and scope of both news stories written under the pressure of deadline and in-depth profiles of major congressional figures."

As an elected official with decades of experience as a Member of the House of Representatives, as a Senator, and as majority and minority leader, I know the important role journalists play in contributing to the understanding of Congress. I appreciate how difficult it is to fulfill that role. It is important that we continue to honor journalists such as Steve Roberts who meet that challenge. The people who benefit most are his readers and our constituents. I join with the judges in recognizing "his ability to put daily events in perspective" and his "perceptiveness in analyzing the legislative process and Congress as an institution."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. DOMENICI addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield myself such time as I need at this point.

Mr. President, I compliment the distinguished minority leader on his remarks with reference to Mr. Steve Roberts. I have had the opportunity to read what he writes, and, I say to the distinguished minority leader, to be covered to some extent in my activities by him as he worked for his paper, and their readers. I concur with the Senator's statement as to his effectiveness. Even as a politician I would say that clearly I find him to be extremely objective. Obviously, he also seeks to find the facts before he writes, and in that respect I am positive that those who granted him the award did so with every one of those important facts in mind, and made a right decision.

I compliment the distinguished minority leader, and compliment Mr. Steve Roberts for having garnered the award that was referred to by the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator, the chairman of the Budget Committee.

As one who regularly watches Washington Week In Review, as one who has said upon many occasions that Washington Week In Review is truly one of the great programs to which we have access because it is a panel of learned journalists and commentators who state facts, but leave to the viewers the making up of their own minds.

I always enjoy listening to Steve Roberts on that program. He is a distinguished journalist, a distinguished panelist, and I feel that Steve is one of those who on that distinguished program has performed well, and I, as a regular viewer, have benefited. I am sure thousands and hundreds of thousands of others have benefited from the evaluation and analyzation of events that we regularly hear and see on that program.

If I am not able to be at my home by 8 o'clock on some Friday evenings, my wife always records that program for me. I look forward to it. I learn a great deal from it. It is not opinionated as are so many programs in which we know, when we see a particular individual on such and such program, where he is coming from before he even speaks. Washington Week In Review is not like that, and it is a great service to its audience.

I compliment Steve Roberts again on his participation in Washington Week In Review.

Mr. SASSER. Will the distinguished minority leader yield?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield further time from this side, and yield to the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, Mr. SASSER.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I wish to join in these accolades to a very distinguished journalist, for a very distinguished newspaper, Mr. Steven Roberts, of the New York Times.

I must say that I join in these compliments with some degree of trepidation. Mr. Roberts is a tough, hardnosed reporter, and I have some anxiety that in an effort to protect his reputation for objectivity, he might feel compelled to write a tough story about those of us here this morning that compliment his distinguished career as a journalist. But, to commend his illustrious reporting is worth the risk.

It is appropriate that those of us who watched this talented reporter's performance in covering the Congress over the past few years make some statements about the highly professional way in which he conducts himself. I find that Steven Roberts has an extraordinary degree of perception about what goes on in this very complex institution.

This understanding is passed on to his readers, he does a great service, not only to Congress, but more importantly to those that he seeks to inform through the columns of the great newspaper for which he writes.

Mr. Roberts reports on the Congress and those who work in the institution with extraordinary objectivity and perception. His unfailing good humor, even under the "pressure of the merciless deadlines of his profession is striking and many times I learn from Mr. Roberts' reporting much appreciated by his colleagues in the press. Facts that I had not known before even though I may have participated in the debate, on an issue or have participated in shaping the legislation. He pulls together in his news stories that is the subject of his story the very complex factors that go into producing legislation in this body. He is a gifted journalist who strives mightly to get the story—and get it right. When I see the bead of prespiration forming on Steve Roberts' upper lip—I know he's after the facts and pushing hard. I am pleased that the distinguished minority leader yielded to me for that purpose. May I add my compliments to Steve Roberts for winning the Everett Dirksen Award. He deserves it.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the very distinguished Senator from Tennessee, Mr. SASSER.

I am delighted that he shares this view.

I close by saying that Steve Roberts' professionalism, his objectivity, and his fairness are of the highest order. In that regard, the "cup" of Steven Roberts "runneth over."

Mr. DOMINICI addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I am sure Steve Roberts is listening. I do not know what this discussion will do to him. [Laughter.]

He was indeed superb before we spoke. I hope we have had only a salutary impact on his objectivity. I am sure that is the case.

IN RECOGNITION OF STEVE ROBERTS

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I want to join in saluting Steve Roberts of the New York Times as this year's recipient of the Everett M. Dirksen Award for Distinguished Reporting on Congress.

Steve Roberts is widely respected for his impartial professionalism. In Congress, competing sides present conflicting arguments on countless issues. It takes a gifted observer to sort the facts on both sides, present a balanced account and do it fluently under the strain of an editorial deadline. Steve Roberts has done that with unfailing integrity.

Many of the issues he reports are endlessly complex, several hotly partisan, and each of real concern to shifting segments of the country's population. Therefore, every journalist who covers the Congress carries a special responsibility, one so important that it is safeguarded in the Bill of Rights.

The spirit and practice of the free press is manifest in the work of Steve Roberts. He brings to his duties the caution of a skeptic, and the devotion of a journalist who cares deeply about national policy. And he applies the eye and ear of a precise analyst in reporting the often bewildering work that goes on here.

So I offer my congratulations and thanks to Steve Roberts for work well done, and ongoing.

STEVE ROBERTS RECEIVES AWARD FOR REPORTING ON CONGRESS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I want to join my colleagues in congratulating Steve Roberts, reporter for the New York Times, on being recognized by the Everett Dirksen Foundation for excellence in writing about Congress.

Covering Congress is not an easy job. There are 535 individual stories happening at any given time. And being able to ferret out the important story, plus the whys and hows of the event, takes a dedicated, veteran reporter. Steve Roberts is that kind of reporter.

Steve has made his career at the New York Times. He started here in Washington in 1964, straight out of college, working for James Reston. Since then he has written for the paper from New York, California, and Greece. In 1977 he came back to the Times Washington bureau, and for the past 6 years has been stationed here on Capitol Hill.

His commitment to covering Congress, as an institution and through the men and women who are Congress, shines through in his reporting. Those of us who are the subject of this reporting, can ask for no more.

Mr. President, once again I want to salute Steve Roberts for receiving this special honor, and wish him every success in future endeavors.

PASSOVER AND THE POPE

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, Passover is an appropriate occasion to recognize the very special and unique Jewish culture and tradition in America. It is important to embrace the distinctiveness and fraternity of several Christian, Jewish, and other traditions in this diversified Nation.

When Jews around the world sit at the dinner table this evening to enjoy Seder, conversation may turn to the first papal visit to a synogogue made by Pope John Paul II last week. This is recognized around the world as an important gesture of reconciliation between the Roman Catholic Church and Italians and world Jewry. The Pope has committed the Catholic Church to the findings of the Second Vatican Council of 1962-65 which stated that Jews are not responsible for the death of Christ Jesus. He reiterated this declaration condemning "the hatred, persecutions, and displays of anti-Semitism directed against the Jews anytime and by anyone." He further repeated the interfaith spirit of Vatican II by recognizing the independent identity of the Jewish religion "beyond any syncretism and any ambiguous appropriation."

Both the Jews and Catholics have experienced religious persecution and hatred in this country. Discrimination requires constant vigilance. Whatever affirms the dignity and identity of religions and its peoples must be applauded. This is especially welcomed in light of the needless hardship and suffering. The Pope's action of reconciliation is of historic and human significance worldwide. It is also of particular importance for Jewish-Catholic ties in America.

THE PANAMANIAN AMBASSADOR'S REMARKS ON THE STRENGTHENING OF DEMOCRATIC INSTITUTIONS

Mr. ZORINSKY. Mr. President, Monday afternoon, the Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs of the Foreign Relations Committee held a second hearing on the situation in Panana. The hearings served to underline the serious issues facing that nation which is important to U.S. interests in Latin America and the Caribbean. I have been concerned about recent developments there including the role and influence of the Panamanian Defense Force in national political and economic life, the pressures on the opposition, especially La Prensa, and the handling of the economy.

After meeting with Ambassador Bazan, I believe that the government of President Delvalle understands these concerns and wants to work toward the strengthening of democratic institutions and toward free and democratic elections. On April 15, Ambassador Bazan addressed the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars of the Smithsonian Institution on this theme. In light of increasing interest in Panama in the Congress, I recommend that my colleagues read Ambassador Bazan's statement. I ask unanimous consent that the Ambassador's remarks be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF PANAMANIAN AMBASSADOR BAZAN

The Wilson center is an appropriate forum for presenting political issues involving the realities of present day Panama. President Wilson, a scholar and politician, approached political questions with responsibility and a sense of fairness. We shall attempt to follow such a course on this occasion.

It is not uncommon for political issues to be presented in emotional terms using strong adjectives to create vivid impressions. Yet to achieve a responsible review of political questions, I believe one should approach the subject in a dispassionate and balanced manner to produce a credible and in-depth understanding of the issues.

To achieve this we cannot afford the use of stereotypes or isolated cases to prove points or project consequences. A comprehensive review of the facts as a whole, placed in the time and in context, will give us a true measure of the issues and their consequences.

I believe that the broadening of Panama's "middle class," coupled with the improved educational levels throughout our country, has made it mandatory for us to address the issues, in Panama in an objective, sober and responsible fashion.

In order to examine and discuss fundamental issues in such a manner, all of us should abstain from dwelling in the past since socio-political issues are ever changing, as are the realities we live from day to day.

The people of Panama are only too conscious of the difficult conditions we are facing today. They know, we know, that our destiny lies in democratically elected civilian governments that rely on citizen interaction. They are also aware of the cyclical ups and downs of our political history, and have the patience and good sense to continue on their quest for a better quality of life, in a peaceful way. They respond to the natural law of self-preservation by working and seeking improvement within the realm of organized society. They show approval or disapproval through peaceful means, they do not waste their efforts, or their lives, on adventurous schemes that are contrary to their common sense and committed purpose in life.

Throughout our Republican history, the ploy of rattling the voters with attacks on the traditional whipping boys, the Americans, the Canal and U.S. military bases and the military of Panama, has been an inveterate tactic of whomever was in the opposition at a given time. The issue of the Canal and the U.S. bases has been significantly lessened by the effect of the Torrijos-Carter Treaties of 1977.

The Americans are charged in some quarters with meddling in our country, but now they are also invited to do so by some sectors of the opposition, which adds a new and puzzling twist to the practice. As to the issue of the military, a strongly emotional attitude seems to force an indictment against an institution on the basis of allegations.

Such attitudes would seem to reflect backward political progress. Opposition politicians in other Latin American countries, upon reaching power through democratic elections, recognize the proper place of the military in the socio-political life of the country. I submit an illustration: President Vinizio Cerezo, of Guatemala, stated recently: "The Army should be involved in the social progress, and guarantee this process in the interests of the people. . . . I should be committed to the general progress of institutionality in the country."

Panama is a young country compared to most of the other Latin American States. It has its own history, that is essentially unique. Many accomplishments have been offset in part by political restlessness that must be attributed to various currents of thought that compete for power. An ever present reality, throughout, has been the presence of a public force of law and order which encompasses military defense and police work. This force has been an instrument of civilian rule and, for some 10 years after 1968, was also a deliberating body with wide powers in the actions of government directed, for the most part, to better the lot of large segments of the underpriviledged.

Our country is now into its ninth decade of existence, and its complexity in all respects, has become enormous. It has followed a rapid evolution and undergone a great number of experiences.

The Republican form of government has been a tradition and a dedication for the Panamanian people, in spite of the fact that there have been several interludes, a kind of growing pains, that jolted the projected, even course set by our Founding Fathers.

These interludes have taken various forms that go from political adjustments to Coups D'Etat, and a long period of revolutionary experimentation. These situations are real, have happened, and have had consequences. Definitely, the political trajectory of Panama has not been a smooth one, but one thing is certain: The basic democratic principles and ideals of our people have always survived, and still constitute the essence of our political deportment.

With the signing of the treaties of 1977, Panama started on the road to democratization. On that year, the military pledged a return to civilian, democratic institutions, which included the conditions necessary for political interaction, civil liberties, free press and the formation of political parties.

We are now on the threshold of accomplishing the phase of that transition period that was officially initiated in 1978 with elections for representatives. Political timidity at that time delayed effective political participation in government by the traditional politicians that opposed the prevailing regime, but the door still remained open for the registration of political parties that subsequently participated in the 1980 elections for legislative positions.

The elections in 1984 produced a president and two vice-presidents, 67 congressmen and 505 municipal representatives. In addition, 65 mayors were elected in as many cities for the first time since 1956.

It is important to understand that many of these positions are occupied by members of the opposition. Consequently, there is a healthy and comprehensive public debate of issues in which the expressions of all parties come to bear.

In this fashion, the stage was set for political recovery through a government that would be a solid bridge, an effective transition to a continuous democratic, republican way of life. The succession of an elected vice-president to a president that had lost the necessary political support, followed along constitutional lines and have created a mandate which he is determined to carry out.

It may be of interest to know that the Republican Party, to which President Delvalle and I belong, chose to form part of the coalition of parties that constitute the present government, based upon the premise that it was the path to democratic ways, as well as a means of contributing to an effective and prompt transition to civilian rule.

Such attitude was by no means a whimsical one; the Republican Party, to which we belong, has from its inception, participated in four political campaigns and was on the winning side on all of them, even though on two of the campaigns it had left the government to join the opposition.

The government of Eric Arturo Delvalle has pledged a responsible and purposeful approach to the problems that confront the country. This is not just rhetoric. The pledge is being translated into fact with energy and dedication.

It is a matter of fact that President Delvalle was entrusted with a stagnant nation with strong objections to the manner in which the executive had handled the negotiations with creditor institutions. The pulse of the nation had all but ceased, and political, social and economic activity showed symptoms of an ominous and critical lethargy.

The first few months of President Delvalle's term had to be dedicated to restore confidence in the government, and, most important, to consolidate the political forces that conform it. This was not an easy task, but the resulting efforts have been rewarding. Concurrently, a prompt solution to financing the country's debt had to be sought. An economic program that was politically viable in the face of the realities of the country was elaborated to be negotiated with the creditor institutions.

Throughout this effort, it was essential to convey to one and all, that the projections of the economic program were designed to address both the immediate solution of the financial problem, and the long term goals of economic reactivation of the country. The encouraging signs of economic recovery detected in the early part of 1986, added to the measures enacted, will provide a framework that shows clear signs of an upswing and a promising forecast of success. For the first time in more than a year we are seeing a perceptible increase in sales, construction, bank deposits, and a significant growth in the volume of goods flowing through our colon free zone to world markets.

It must be stated with satisfaction that this return to fiscal responsibility was achieved by this civilian government within our constitutional procedures.

The Government of Panama has emerged stronger by this experience. It has to withstand organized protests, strikes and the expected criticism by opposition parties, but there is a perceivable current of support for our efforts throughout the country, as well as signs of optimism that had not been in evidence for some time.

It should be of interest to know, that the role of the defense forces has receded as confidence in the ability of civilians to run and manage the affairs of state grows in a manifest way. This confidence is essential for the proper functioning of a government in a stable, democratic, open market society. It is a solid accomplishment and a sign of good things to come.

The government of President Delvalle has given the higest priority to the strengthening of the country's democratic institutions. It implies wide involvement of the citizenry in all matters which contribute to the process of taking Panama along the path of development. We have the people, the know how, the infrastructure, and the resources to forge ahead. We have a government that encourages investment and production. We are obtaining, through a deliberate purpose, a sense of propriety and recognition that reinforces the action of all productive forces in the country, and the consequences are evident, Panama is on the move again.

An essential ingredient for a country's economic and social well-being is to function in a climate of peace. It is plain that Panama does not have any armed uprising, nor the presence or actions by any guerrilla group whatsoever. The country is relatively calm, and dedicated to daily chores designed to fulfill expectations.

There is freedom of speech, freedom of the press, the expression of the thoughts of all citizens can take place without any form of censorship or impedence.

Individual rights are respected and exerted freely within the law. Grievances and complaints are resolved either by means of dialog or legal recourse.

It is important that these realities of Panama, in their fullest context, be well known in this country because, as Senator Helms said a month ago, "the positive interests of the United States and of Panama are inextricably intertwined to the benefit of both countries. We want to do everything to see that those benefits continue for everyone."

As my country's Ambassador to the United States, I am fully conscious of such a special relationship. During my first official meeting with President Reagan, I assured him that Panama is a country dedicated to peace and democratic way of life, that our Government is determined to solve our own problems within the realities that we live. We expect the assistance of the Government of the United States to achieve our purposes under the best of circumstances. We aim to preserve and reaffirm the bonds of friendship and cooperation that have existed for a century between our countries.

I was reassured and gratified upon receiving President Reagan's thoughts: "I realize that Panama is presently experiencing a period of economic difficulty. It is encouraging to hear of the efforts of President Delvalle and his government to develop a program of realistic reforms not only to weather the immediate crisis but to provide an economically sound basis for sustained growth. We wish you success in the task of developing this program and of securing broad support for it. We stand ready to assist sound development plans, conscious that Panama's destiny is Panama's responsibility first and foremost."

I should like to end my remarks with a most significant quote from President Delavalle in his speech to the prestigious Council on Foreign Relations in New York City early this month:

"The election process which will start two years from now, will again allow the people of Panama to exercise their sovereign voting rights.

"Toward this goal, my government is firmly committed. Today, the fundamental goal of the executive branch, the legislative assembly, the Supreme Court and the political parties is to strengthen the democratic process and maintain Panama's political stability within a civilian environment."

May I be allowed to add that President Delvalle, on repeated occasions, has made a call to all citizens, including obviously the opposition parties, to act on behalf of the better interests of Panama, and has invited them to join in the strengthening of our democratic institutions and to participate in the task of guiding the country toward the fulfillment of its promise for a higher quality of life for all Panamanians.

DEATH OF NORMAN L. CAHNERS

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, many people in the Greater Boston area and elsewhere were saddened by the recent death of Norman L. Cahners. Norman Cahners was a creative and omnipresent force in the business, civic, and charitable worlds. His public spirit, generosity, and concern for the enrichment of the cultural, intellectual, and artistic dimensions of our society were demonstrated time and time again throughout over four decades of service to Greater Boston and New England. The vast diversity of his interests and his energies was reflected in the numerous prestigious awards he received throughout his lifetime.

To name but a few, he won acclaim for developing innovative procedures for materiel handling in World War II; for his dedicated involvement with the Boy Scouts of America; and for his outstanding leadership, achievements, and ethical standards in business and in the community.

I ask unanimous consent that the Boston Globe article paying tribute to Mr. Norman L. Cahners be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NORMAN L. CAHNERS

Although he knew he was battling a fatal illness, Norman L. Cahners had hoped to join a Museum of Science group now visiting the Amazon and viewing Halley's Comet. The indomitable drive of this business and community leader, who died last Friday, enabled him to live and travel well beyond the limits of most dreams.

Among the many Boston educational, medical and cultural institutions that Cahners seved as a trustee, board member and worker, the Museum of Science was a special challenge, because he felt that he could make a contribution to integrating the work of the institution with community life.

Cahners' skill as a leader first became apparent when he was a top sprinter on the 1936 Harvard track team. During World War II, while serving in the Navy, he developed techniques for the rapid handling of war materiel and started a magazine on materiel-handling that dealt with the transport of all kinds of supplies and goods.

Based on that experience, Cahners began to publish industial magazines in many technical fields. Today, the company has become the largest publisher of industrial magazines in the world.

In his private life, Cahners often counseled talented young people on career decisions, keeping track of them for years to see what turn their lives and taken.

His business success made possible major contributions to many schools and institutions. With his late father-in-law, Sidney Rabb, he established a professorship in psychology at the Harvard Business School.

Creation of a "climate of excellence" in industry, to enable persons to rise as high as their abilities can take them, was a special interest. Too often, Cahners felt, the human element was neglected by industry leaders.

In a lifetime of exploring how things work and ways to build an environment in which people can work better, Cahners set a path worth following.

A TRIBUTE TO FATHER ROBERT C. NEWBOLD

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I want to take a moment to honor Father Robert C. Newbold, one of Rhode Island's most respected and revered educators, who is stepping down after 17 years of faith service as rector of Our Lady of Providence Preparatory Seminary [OLP].

Few individuals in the State's history, Mr. President, have affected as many people as positively as Father Newbold. During his rectorate at OLP, he oversaw the growth of one of the strongest overall academic and athletic programs in Rhode Island secondary schools.

Also in his tenure there, he served admirably as executive secretary of the State interscholastic Committee on Athletics. To say this is merely a "challenging" job is a classic understatement. Indeed, more politicking and debate may take place in Rhode Island interscholastic committee meetings than on the floor of the U.S. Senate. Because Father Newbold is the right person for the job, however, because he has his priorities straight, the committees affairs are run fairly and smoothly.

Consequently, those who prosper most are the thousands of student-athletes who have participated in Rhode Island's interscholastic leagues in the past and who continue to participate today. On these fortunate people Father Newbold's imprint is lasting.

Mr. President, Father Newbold's credentials as an educator are impeccable. He received his theological training at St. Bernard's Seminary and was ordained into the Catholic priesthood on December 22, 1945. He earned both his masters and Ph.D. in American history from the University of Notre Dame. In addition to teaching in various capacities at OLP, Father was a professor in American history at Providence College for 8 years. A history authority, he has written a book on 19th century American history.

These numerous valuable experiences, Mr. President, amply prepared Father Newbold for the many challenges which confronted him as rector and administrator.

On Friday, April 25, a testimonial dinner will be held in Father Newbold's honor at the Rocky Point Palladium in Warwick, RI. Hundreds of his friends and colleagues, and many State religious and political leaders will be in attendance.

By his selfless service and tireless devotion to Our Lady of Providence Prep for the past 17 years, Father Robert Newbold has been a safeguard of virtue and a beacon of integrity for all those who have passed through its doors. I hope that his work has been as rewarding for him as it has been for the many Rhode Islanders whose lives he has touched.

THE PRESIDENT'S SALT II DECISION

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, we all owe President Reagan a debt of thanks for his decision to maintain the policy of restraint in any action that might violate the terms of the Salt II agreement. The President took the comprehensive, long-range view on this issue in spite of public and private advice to the contrary. His judgment in this matter has been prudent and mature and I believe we shall all be safer and better for it.

It was obvious that some short-term advantage might have been gained by ignoring Salt II, but a little reflection is enough to indicate that it would not be long before the Soviet Union balanced the score and resumed the contest. President Reagan has wisely rejected this course of action.

It is a necessary feature of the American political system that each of us express a view on important issues. All too often that view is critical or negative because we attempt to alter the course or bring about a change of policy. But it is equally necessary to support and defend actions that we think are right and I am glad to be able to do so in this instance.

An interesting and useful comment on the President's decision appeared in the New York Times on April 22, 1986. It is of special value because its author, Paul Warnke, is uniquely qualified by experience and intellect to form a knowledgeable opinion. His judgment is independent of any partisan bias in this case because he speaks as a Democrat praising a Republican President. It is worth reading.

I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Warnke's article be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE STAKES IN REAGAN'S SALT DECISION

(By Paul C. Warnke)

WASHINGTON.—Ronald Reagan has made one of the most important decisions of his Presidency. The disclosure yesterday that he would uphold the SALT II treaty could be a long-awaited first step toward a more comprehensive United States-Soviet arms control regime. At the very least, he has narrowly avoided a long-lasting setback for nuclear sanity.

It was not, however, an easy decision for him to make—and the fact that he did, against the advice of some of his key strategists, and perhaps even against his own earlier inclinations, makes him even more deserving of our praise.

On May 20, the Nevada will begin its sea trials. With its 24 missile launchers, this Trident-class submarine would have put the United States over the SALT II treaty's limit of 1,200 multiple-warhead missiles by 22. Mr. Reagan has now chosen to continue compliance with the treaty by dismantling at least the same number of missiles by retiring and destroying two older Poseidon submarines.

Critics of arms control, citing purported Soviet treaty violations, had been pushing harder than ever for the President to abandon SALT II. Moreover, he faced a self-imposed dilemma. When he chose last June to abide by SALT II for the time being, he also declared that future Soviet violations would be answered with the policy of "proportionate response"—that is, selective countervio-lations.

On the surface, the President's choice seemed simple. Most of the allegations of Soviet violations of SALT II were of questionable validity, and none involved anything of real military significance. And, since the Soviet Union is in a far better position than we are to expand its strategic nuclear weapons in the absence of SALT II's restraints, continued compliance is clearly in the best interest of our national security.

These facts is themselves dictated that the President reaffirm SALT II and continue his course of the past five years. But there is a lot more at stake this time. In the first place, Gramm-Rudman-Hollings may succeed where the Soviet negotiators in Geneva have failed. The President's budget request for defense may be cut by up to $60 billion in 1987 alone. Unless he is willing to slash conventional forces to the bone, cuts in strategic weaponry are unavoidable. This is especially so with the Strategic Defense Initiative budget growing by leaps and bounds. If the President won't cut back through negotiations, it will likely be done for him.

Secondly, the Soviet Union would not have waited forever. Mikhail S. Gorbachev made a number of important concessions in his three-month-old sweeping arms control proposal. Our reply in February contained nothing new, and amounted, if anything, to a hardening of our earlier position. If his offers had not been taken more seriously, Mr. Gorbachev might have decided to junk SALT II himself, even if Mr. Reagan had not. Facing his own hardliners, Mr. Gorbachev could not have waited indefinitely while America answered him with little more than contempt.

Third, the Strategic Defense Initiative is looking more and more like a turkey. Ballooning budgets and a splashy public-relations campaign cannot hide news of test failures, skeptical scientists and sharply reduced expectations. The longer we wait, and the clearer it grows that the Initiative is far less than advertised, the less likely it is that the Soviet Union will give up much in exchange.

In short, Mr. Reagan stood at a crossroads. After five years of stalemate in arms control, events were perilously close to getting out of his hands. He had to decide just how serious he was about negotiating with Moscow—and act accordingly.

It could not have been easy for him. The chaos over arms control policy in this Administration is the stuff of legend. For example, when Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger recently charged that the Soviet Union had exceeded SALT II's limits on strategic launchers, the Joint Chiefs of Staff explained they had not. One week after the Central Intelligence Agency admitted that it had been overestimating its measurements of Soviet nuclear test yields, the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency reiterated its charge that Moscow had violated the 150 kiloton threshold for underground nuclear tests.

Whether by design or by accident, the Administration's intransigence on arms control has brought some grudging but significant concessions from new Soviet leadership. And the Strategic Defense Initiative, for the time being at least, worries Mr. Gorbachev enough that we could well trade limits on its development for deep cuts in the Soviet Union's most threatening offensive weapons. Mr. Reagan's commendable action may help to keep this "window of opportunity" open.

Paul C. Warnke, chairman of the Committee for National Security, a public policy organization, was director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency and chief United States negotiator in the SALT II talks in 1977 and 1978.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is now closed.

CONCURRENT RESOLUTION ON THE BUDGET, FISCAL YEAR 1987

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will now resume consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 120, which the clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 120) setting forth the congressional budget for the United States Government for the fiscal years 1987, 1988, and 1989.

The Senate resumed consideration of the concurrent resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico is recognized.

Mr. DOMENICI. Thank you, Mr. President.

I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I wish to take just a few moments, since today is the day that the U.S. Supreme Court is going to hear oral arguments in the appeal of Synar against United States, constitutional challenge to Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

I am sure that from what I have heard, and particularly what I have heard from some of the House Members and some of the House leadership, that there is sort of a sigh of relief around anticipating that the Supreme Court is going to affirm the lower court in Synar versus United States and that the pressure is off. I have heard that from some of the House leadership the other day.

Obviously, the Senator from New Mexico has been assuming that if we do not get a budget which meets the deficit reduction target, it means we are going to have an across-the-board sequester. I have assumed one way or another it is going to happen.

There are those who assume this is going to be a very predictable decision by the Supreme Court, that they are just going to automatically affirm that lower court decision that the Comptroller General cannot make the final calculations and send the order to the President for signature. I believe that the case is clearly to the contrary.

We have had another court case in the meantime that is not nearly as heralded as Synar against United States. But I wish the Senate to know that in Ameron against U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, the Court has ruled exactly to the contrary on exactly the same issue.

In that case, Ameron against U.S. Corps of Engineers, the third circuit examined the same issues—namely, the characterization of the Office of the Comptroller General—and came down with a well-reasoned opinion that I will include in the RECORD. That opinion held exactly the opposite with reference to constitutional separation of powers as it applies to the characterization of the Comptroller General.

Let me give you a brief summary of the case.

The Competition in Contracting Act [CICA], which was enacted as part of the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984, permits a bidder who disputes the terms or awarding of a Government contract to challenge the award by filing a protest with the Comptroller General.

The filing of a protest stays the awarding of the contract until either the Comptroller General makes a decision on the protest or the agency head certifies in writing that urgent circumstances require that the contract be awarded.

Decisions of the Comptroller General are limited to recommendations that the agency terminate or rebid the contract, issue a new solicitation, refrain from exercising options under a contract, or award a different contract.

At issue in this case was the power of the Comptroller General to lift stays on contracts.

In the words of the Court of Appeals:

If the Comptroller General . . . is deemed to be an agent of Congress, then his possession of executive powers and duties is arguably unconstitutional. On the other hand, if he is an executive agent, then the performance of executive duties by the Comptroller would arguably create no constitutional problem.

Unlike the district court in Synar, the 3d Circuit Court of Appeals found that the Comptroller General is definitely not an agent of Congress. The court held:

The power of removal does not determine to which branch the Comptroller belongs. Rather, if anything, it is the power of appointment that should control. . . . Indeed, a practical analysis of how the Comptroller General and the GAO actually function reveals that the removal power vested in Congress is a power of limited importance. . . . With a 15-year, non-renewable term, the Comptroller General . . . appears to be one of the most independent officers in the whole of the federal government. . . .

The Appeals Court then explicitly disagreed with the Synar decision:

We decline to follow the approach taken by the Synar court. . . . The core principle of Humphrey's Executor, a key precedent in this area of the law, "was that Congress could create agencies exercising dual functions and which were independent of unfettered executive control. In their blend of powers and functions, the Comptroller General and the GAO closely resemble the Federal Trade Commission and other fourth branch agencies."

Mr. President, if the Supreme Court follows the very compelling reasoning of the 3d Circuit Court of Appeals, Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, in its entirety, including the GAO's function as an arbiter and as the one that sends the order to the President confirming the across-the-board cuts, will be upheld.

This should be sobering news to those who believe the Supreme Court will remove the prospect of future sequester orders.

Mr. President, I send a copy of the Ameron decision to the desk and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the decision was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OPINION OF THE COURT

GARTH, Circuit Judge:

This appeal presents, in a rather prosaic setting, a problem of profound constitutional significance concerning the division of power among the three branches of our federal government. At issue is the constitutionality of the automatic stay provisions of the Competition in Contracting Act (CICA), Pub. L. No. 98-369, Subtitle D, 98 Stat. 1199-1201, codified at 31 U.S.C.A. § 3553 et seq. (West Supp. 1985). The United States Army Corps of Engineers and the other executive department defendants [hereinafter referred to collectively as the Army] appeal from a decision of the district court declaring the CICA stay provisions to be constitutional and ordering broad injunctive relief to plaintiff Ameron and the Congressional intervenors.

We now affirm the district court's holding that the Comptroller General, as head of the General Accounting Office, is an independent official with duties involving both the legislative and executive branches of the United States government. As such, he may constitutionally exercise the powers conferred upon him by CICA. We also conclude, however, that the injunction granted by the district court was broader than necessary to grant the full relief to which plaintiffs were entitled, and therefore modify the injunction as specified below.

I.

A.

Congress created the General Accounting Office (GAO) and the Office of the Comptroller General by the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921, Pub. L. No. 13, § 301, 42 Stat. 20, 23. The 1921 Act was the culmination of Congressional efforts over many years to provide accountability for the federal government's finances. The original Comptroller of the Treasury was an executive officer within the Treasury Department. 1 Stat. 65-66 (1789). The Comptroller continued as an executive officer with executive functions under subsequent enactments. See, e.g., Act of March 3, 1817, 3 Stat. 366; Dockery Act of 1894, 28 Stat. 162, 205.

When they were created to replace the Comptroller of Treasury, the GAO and the Comptroller General were initially empowered to report to Congress and assist Congress in the budget process. 1921 Act, §§ 304-312, 42 Stat. 23-26. Even in 1921, however, the Comptroller General, even though created in part to assist Congress, was assigned duties that were not traditionally "legislative": auditing and setting public accounts, countersigning treasury warrants, prescribing "the forms of keeping and rendering all public accounts"—these and other executive duties were given to the GAO and the Comptroller General by the 1921 Act, which also abolished the Comptroller of the Treasury. §§ 301, 304, 310. The parties do not dispute that the Comptroller General continues to perform significant duties that are both "legislative" and "nonlegislative," i.e., executive, in nature.

As an adjunct of its account-settling role, the Comptroller General over the years began to hear protests from disappointed bidders on government contracts. See Wheelabrator Corp. v. Chafee, 455 F.2d 1306, 1313 (D.C. Cir. 1971). This role was formalized by the Competition in Contracting Act (CICA) in 1984. 31 U.S.C.A. §§ 3351-3356 (West Supp. 1985). CICA was enacted to remedy a major loophole in the long-standing GAO review procedure: by the time the GAO reviewed most bid protests, the protests had become moot because either the contract had been let or the contractor was engaged in performing under the contract. While GAO regulations provided for a stay of either the granting or performance of the contract in some circumstances, See Merriam v. Kunzig, 476 F.2d 1233, 1236 & n.1 (3d Cir. 1973), this stay was easily overridden by the contracting agency involved. The result was that most procurements became faits accomplis before they could be reviewed. This situation was identified by Congress as a contributing factor to the crisis of waste in federal procurement. In particular, Congress recognized as a problem that of $168 billion in government contracts awarded in fiscal year 1983, only about one-third, $54 billion, was awarded on a competitive basis. Competition in Contracting Act of 1984: H.R. Rep. No. 1157, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. 12 (1984). In enacting CICA, Congress attempted to provide effective review of bid challenges, and in the process to encourage competition in contracting. See Opinion of District Court, slip op. at 31.

In relevant part, CICA permits a potential or actual bidder who disputes the terms or awarding of a government contract to challenge the procurement or the award of the contract by filing a protest with the Comptroller General. Upon receiving the protest, the Comptroller General must "within one working day" notify the agency involved, which must then make a report on the challenged contract. 31 U.S.C. § 3353(b)(1).

The filing of a protest freezes, or stays, the awarding of the contract or any action under it until either the Comptroller General makes a decision on the protest or the agency head certifies in writing that "urgent and compelling circumstances which significantly affect interest of the United States" require that the contract be awarded, 31 U.S.C. § 3553(c)(2), or that "the best interests of the United States" require that performance proceed under a contract already awarded by the agency. 31 U.S.C. § 3553(d)(2).

The Act requires the Comptroller General to issue a final decision on the protest within 90 working days unless he determines in writing that the circumstances of the protest require more time. 31 U.S.C. § 3554(a)(1). The Comptroller General may also exercise an "express option" to expedite review of certain cases within 45 calendar days, 31 U.S.C. § 3554(a)(2), and may dismiss patently frivolous or meritless claims on a summary basis. 31 U.S.C. § 3554(a)(3).

The power of the Comptroller General in rendering his decision is limited to a recommendation that the agency, inter alia, terminate or rebid the contract, issue a new solicitation, refrain from exercising options under a contract, or award a different contract consistent with law. 31 U.S.C. § 3554(b)(1). The only affirmative power provided to the Comptroller General is to award a prevailing protester its bid and proposal preparation costs, as well as its costs and attorneys' fees in filing and pursuing the bid protest. 31 U.S.C. § 3554(c)(1).

President Reagan signed CICA into law as part of the omnibus Deficit Reduction Act of 1984, but he declared the automatic stay provision unconstitutional upon the advice of the Attorney General and ordered the executive department not to observe it. Accordingly, the Office of Management and Budget issued instructions to executive agencies to proceed with the procurement process "as though no such [stay] provisions were contained in the act." OMB Bulletin No. 85-8 at 2 (Dec. 17, 1984).

B.

The mundane facts underlying the present controversy belie the compelling nature of the constitutional question before us. In late 1984, Ameron submitted a bid on a proposed contract to clean and repair sewer lines at West Point, New York. The Army's "Invitation for Bids" required an interested party to submit along with its bid a bond guaranteeing 20 percent of the bid amount. When the sealed bids were opened, Ameron was the apparent low bidder with an offer of $1,033,000, about $200,000 less than the next lowest bidder, defendant Spiniello Construction Company. However, Ameron's bid was rejected because the dollar amount of the bond had been altered without any indication that the surety had agreed to be bound by the change. Although Ameron contended that the change was merely the result of a typist's error,[1] the agency rejected Ameron's bid as non-responsive to the terms of the invitation and awarded the contract to Spiniello. See Affidavit of Michael K. Collinger at 1-2.

On March 1, 1985, within ten days of the awarding of the contract, Ameron filed a protest with the Comptroller General, claiming that the Army had wrongfully rejected its bid. Three days later, Ameron filed suit in federal district court claiming that the Army had arbitrarily rejected its bid and seeking a preliminary injunction to restrain the Army and the victorious bidder from proceeding with the contract pending the outcome of Ameron's protest to the Comptroller General. Ameron also sought a temporary restraining order enjoining performance of the contract.

The district court first denied the request for a temporary restraining order, and then granted it on March 7, 1985 when the stay provisions of 31, U.S.C. § 3353(d)(1) were brought to its attention, pending a hearing on the preliminary injunction to be held March 18, 1985. After hearing argument on March 18 and granting the motion of the Senate, the Speaker, and the Bipartisan Leadership Group of the House to intervene as plaintiffs to support the constitutionality of CICA, the district court eventually granted the preliminary injunction on March 27, 1985. 607 F. Supp. 962 (D.N.J. 1985).

In an oral opinion delivered from the bench, the court rejected Ameron's claim that the Army had acted arbitrarily. That ruling is not before us on appeal. The court concluded, however, that Ameron was entitled to a preliminary injunction enforcing a stay because the CICA stay provision was constitutional. The court held that Congress could delegate the non-legislative power to lift the stay to the Comptroller General because he was appointed by the President in accordance with the Appointments Clause of the Constitution, Art. II § 2, C1.2, and therefore was not merely an agent of Congress. Id. at 971-74. The Army filed a timely notice of appeal from the injunction ruling. A month later, on April 29, 1985, the Comptroller General issued a decision denying Ameron's protest on the merits.[2] The parties agreed that this did not render the case moot, and proceeded to file cross-motions, for summary judgment.

The court thereafter denied Ameron's motion for summary judgment on the merits of its bid protest, but granted the motion of the intervenors for a permanent injunction ordering the federal government to comply with and implement 31 U.S.C. § 3553. 610 F. Supp. 750 (D.N.J. 1985). We reproduce the full text of the court's order in the appendix.

The court also declared 31 U.S.C. § 3553 to be constitutional, and joined OMB Director David Stockman and Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger as necessary defendants. Although the injunction contains no language limiting its application to less than the entire federal government, it is apparent from the court's oral opinion that it intended its order to have controlling effect only within the District of New Jersey, See id. at 756. The Army appealed again, and the appeals (Nos. 85-5226, 85-5377) were consolidated for review by this court.

II.

At the outset, we must determine if this case was rendered moot by the disposition of Ameron's original bid protest by the Comptroller General. Although the Comptroller General's decision lifted the stay provided by CICA, arguably obviating the need for an injunction, it is urged that this case is not moot. Even when no more relief may be granted to a plaintiff, a case may continue to decision and remain viable on appeal if the problem presented is "capable of repetition yet evading review." See In re Kulp Foundry, 691 F.2d 1125, 1128-29 (3d Cir. 1982). This standard applies if 1) the problem allegedly causing injury is resolved within too short a time period to ever be fully litigated and appealed, and 2) the party seeking relief is likely to be subject to the same injury in the future. Murphy v. Hunt, 455 U.S. 478, 482 (1982). See also Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113, 125 (1973).

The parties agree that this case is an appropriate one for application of the rule, and we concur. A bid protest will usually be resolved within 90 days, so that by the time a case be appealed to this court, it will almost always face the prospect of being regarded as moot. Moreover, Ameron, as a company frequently seeking government contracts, represented that it is likely to be faced with a similar situation again: desiring to protest a contract decision but being unable to obtain the statutorily guaranteed stay while its protest is being reviewed. Lest the issue presented evade review, we hold that the present dispute is not moot, and we proceed to consider this case on the merits.

III.

As the Supreme Court observed in Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 124 (1976), "The principle of separation of powers was not simply an abstract generalization in the minds of the Framers: it was woven into the document that they drafted in Philadelphia in the Summer of 1787." The Constitution creates three distinct branches of government and vests specific powers in each. This design is intended to block tyranny by any one branch by providing a series of checks and balances to diffuse concentrations of power. "The hydraulic pressure inherent within each of the separate Branches to exceed the outer limits of its power, even to accomplish desirable objectives, must be resisted. INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919, 951 (1983).

Nevertheless, the Court has rejected any notion that the branches are hermetically sealed. While the Constitution diffuses power the better to secure liberty, it also contemplates that practice will integrate the dispersed powers into a workable government. It enjoins upon the branches separateness but interdependence, autonomy but reciprocity." Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 635 (1952) (Jackson. J., concurring). See Buckley, 424 U.S. at 121. Moreover, this court has recently emphasized that separation of powers analysis must focus pragmatically on whether the challenged provision actually or potentially interferes with the ability of the affected branch to accomplish its constitutionally assigned functions. In re The President's Commission on Organized Crime Subpoena of Nicodemo Scarfo, No. 85-3023, slip op. at 11 (3d Cir. Feb. 14, 1986). See also Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. 425, 443 (1977).

In applying the separation of powers principle, which is not explicitly mentioned in the Constitution but which undergirds the Constitutional philosophy, the Court has more than once felt compelled to rein in one or another branch of government. The Court has held that Congress, as the legislative branch, may not delegate to itself or its agents executive or judicial power, Hampton & Co. v. United States, 276 U.S. 394, 406 (1928); that the executive may not exercise legislative power belonging only to Congress, Youngstown; and that executive and administrative duties of a non-judicial nature may not be imposed upon Article III judges. United States v. Ferreira, 54 U.S. (13 How.) 39, 50-51 (1952). See generally President's Commission (Scarfo), supra.

Moreover, the power of appointment and removal must be exercised in conformity with the separation of powers. Congress may not curtail the power of the President to remove purely executive officials, Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 51 (1926), but may create agencies which exercise mixed duties whose members may be protected from removal by the executive without cause. Humphrey's Executor v. United States, 295 U.S. 602, 629 (1935). Congress may not, however, retain for itself the power to appoint officials of the government who exercise executive power. Buckley, 424 U.S. at 126.

While disputing the application of these rules to the case at hand, the parties do appear to agree on one point: the key issue in this case is the characterization of the Office of the Comptroller General. If the Comptroller General, as the Army argues, is deemed to be an agent of Congress, then his possession of executive powers and duties is arguably unconstitutional. On the other hand, if he is an executive agent, then the performance of executive duties by the Comptroller would arguably create no constitutional problem.

The only other court that has addressed the question whether the Comptroller General may constitutionally exercise the powers granted under CICA concluded, following the reasoning of the district court in the present case, that the Comptroller could constitutionally exercise mixed powers. See Lear Siegler, Inc. v. Lehman, No. CV 85-1125-KN, slip op. at 7-11 (C.D. Cal. Nov. 21, 1985).

In a recent decision, a three-judge panel in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia [3] held that certain provisions of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985, popularly known as the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act, were unconstitutional because they vested executive powers in the Comptroller General, Synar v. United States, No. 85-3945 (D.D.C. February 11, 1986). Under the Synar analysis, the Comptroller General was not permitted to exercise these powers under the Constitution. The court did not reach a firm conclusion regarding the characterization of the Comptroller General as an agent or member of a particular branch of the government, but concluded that executive power to mandate budget cuts could not be delegated to "an officer removable by Congress." Id., slip op. at 48.

In resolving the central question of characterization as it is presented on this appeal, we confront plausible arguments on both sides. Several factors weigh in favor of considering the Comptroller General to be an executive officer. Foremost among these factors is that the Comptroller General exercises significant executive functions in managing the accounts of the federal government and is appointed by the President—factors which, in and of themselves, arguably render the Comptroller an "Officer of the United States" under Buckley, 424 U.S. at 126. The historic roots of the Comptroller's functions in the Treasury Department also militate against finding that the Comptroller is merely a legislative agent.

Against these factors, the Army marshals a great welter of dicta and conclusory statements to the effect that the Comptroller General is not an executive officer but rather an agent or member of the legislative branch. Several courts, first of all, have stated without extensive analysis that the GAO is an arm of the Congress. See. e.g., McDonnell Douglas Corp. v. United States. 754 F.2d 365, 368 (Fed. Cir. 1985): United States v. McDonnell Douglas Corp., 751 F.2d 220, 224 (8th Cir. 1984); M. Steinthal & Co. v. Seamans, 455 F.2d 1289, 1305 (D.C. Cir. 1964). The Army also cites to numerous points in the legislative history of the 1921 Act and in other statutes where the GAO is characterized or labelled as a "legislative" agency. See, e.g., 61 Cong. Rec. 1080 (Comptroller General "is to be the arm of the Congress": Rep. Good); id. at 1081 (Comptroller General is "representative of Congress" unlike Director of the Bureau of the Budget "who serves the President and is the personal representative of the President": Rep. Byrns); 2 U.S.C. § 701(e) (Comptroller General listed as within the "Legislative Branch" in the Ethics in Government Act); 59 Stat. 616 (1945) (GAO stated to be part of legislative branch in Reorganization Act of 1945).

While we recognize the authority cited by the Army, we nevertheless cannot resolve the issue before us merely on the basis of the quantity of citation. We must beware of what Justice Cardozo described as "the tyranny of labels." Snyder v. Massachusetts, 291 U.S. 97, 114 (1934). Indeed, in Buckley, the Supreme Court specifically noted that "irrespective of Congress' designation [of the Comptroller General as a "Legislative Officer"], cf. 31 U.S.C. § 65(d), the Comptroller General is appointed by the President in conformity with the Appointments Clause [and therefore may exercise executive functions]. "424 U.S. at 128 n.165.

Instead of "decision by label," we must focus on function and reality. Clearly, the GAO and the Comptroller General perform legislative and non-legislative duties. Indeed, they also perform quasi-judicial functions. In that respect, they resemble the modern regulatory agency. Therefore, the mere recital by the Army of the Comptroller General's legislative functions, which involve investigating and reporting to Congress, does not make the Comptroller General an agent of the legislature.

In characterizing the Comptroller General as an agent of the legislature, the Army also stresses the power of Congress to remove the Comptroller from office. The Army argues that Congress may constitutionally remove only its own agents, i.e., members of the legislative branch, and that Congress therefore in reserving to itself the power to remove the Comptroller General had implicitly acknowledged that the Comptroller General is an agent of the legislature. By the same token, argues the Army, Congress must have recognized that the Comptroller General could not be an agent of the executive, because Congress may not constitutionally remove from office agents who are purely executive in character.

To support this argument, the Army relies heavily on Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52 (1928), in which the Supreme Court held that the Prsident's power to remove purely executive officers could not be curtailed by Congress. However, Myers was severely limited by Humphrey's Executor, in which the Court approved Congress's attempt to insulate members of the Federal Trade Commission from removal without cause by the President.

"We think it plain under the Constitution that illimitable power of removal is not possessed by the President in respect of officers of the character of those just named [members of FTC, ICC and Court of Claims]. The authority of Congress, in creating quasi-legislative or quasi-judicial agencies, to require them to act in discharge of their duties independently of executive control cannot well be doubted; and that authority includes, as an appropriate incident, power to fix the period during which they shall continue in office, and to forbid their removal except for cause in the meantime. Fot it is quite evident that one who holds his office only during the pleasure of another, cannot be dependent upon to maintain an attitude of independence against the latter's will."
295 U.S. at 629.

It is not clear whether Congress's power to limit removal by the President includes the power to retain to itself removal power over "mixed-power" officers of the United States. There are two questions implicated by the Army's argument on this issue, however, which must be addressed separately: (1) whether the provision permitting Congress to remove the Comptroller General is constitutional, and (2) whether the mere existence of this provision renders the Comptroller General an agent of Congress for the purposes of this case.

A.

The first question is not ripe for review in this case at this time. Congress has never tried to remove a Comptroller General and is unlikely to do so in the foreseeable future. The constitutionality of the removal provision, therefore, has yet to be tested, and because Congress in this case has not sought to remove the Comptroller General, we do not deem the constitutionality of the removal provision to be justiciable. See Hastings v. Judicial Conference of the United States, 770 F.2d 1093. 1100-01 (D.C. Cir. 1985).

By so holding, we decline to adopt the contrary conclusion reached in Synar, supra. In Synar. the court concluded that the issue of Congress' power to remove the Comptroller General was ripe for review, relying upon Northern Pipeline Construction Co. v. Marathon Pipe Line Co., 458 U.S. 50 (1982), in which the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional the delegation of Article III powers to bankruptcy judges not appointed in conformance with Article III. The district court in Synar held that since the Supreme Court had relied in part on the fact that bankruptcy judges could be removed for cause, the question of congressional removal power over the Comptroller General was similarly ripe for review. Slip op. at 29–30.

Northern Pipeline, however, does not control the present case. The Court struck down the statutory scheme in that case as facially violative of Article III, in that bankruptcy judges were appointed to fixed 14 year terms and could be removed for cause. Since the Court found that the judges therefore were clearly not Article III judges under the plain language of the Constitution, the unconstitutionality of their appointment and exercise of power was immediately ripe for adjudication.

By contrast, in this case, there is no challenge to the appointment of the Comptroller General, which is agreed to be in conformance with the appointments clause, nor to the Comptroller General's 15 year statutory tenure. The only issue raised in this context is the constitutionality of the congressional removal provision, which has never been exercised in more than 60 years. Therefore, unlike Northern Pipeline, where the constitutionality question was ripe, here an additional act must be undertaken in order to meet the "ripeness" requirement. That act would be an attempted removal of the Comptroller General by Congress.

Moreover, even if the question were justiciable, and the provision granting Congress the power to remove the Comptroller General were found to be unconstitutional, that would only be because of a determination that the Comptroller General is indeed a member of the executive branch. The remedy in such a case would not be to hold the "stay" powers of the Comptroller General to be unconstitutional, but to sever as unconstitutional the provision which grants Congress the power to remove him. See Myers, 272 U.S. at 176.[4]

B.

As to the second question—whether the existence of Congress' power to remove the Comptroller General is determinative of the particular branch of which the Comptroller General is a member—our answer is that the power of removal does not determine to which branch the Comptroller General belongs. Rather, if anything, it is the power of appointment that should control. See Buckley v. Valeo, 428 U.S. 1, 126(1976). Moreover, the fact that the Comptroller General is not under executive control does not necessarily mean that he is under legislative control. Indeed, a practical analysis of how the Comptroller General and the GAO actually function reveals that the removal power vested in Congress is a power of limited importance. In more than 60 years of the GAO's existence, Congress has never exercised its power to remove a Comptroller General.

Viewed pragmatically, the Comptroller General functions independently of Congress in exercising his role of reviewing bid protests. There is no evidence in the record that Congress has ever, as a body or through individual members, exerted control over this process. With a 15-year, nonrenewable term, the Comptroller General therefore appears to be one of the most independent officers in the whole of the federal government, and one whose functions are drawn from each of the branches. See Constitutionality of GAO's Bid Protest Function: Hearings Before the Subcomm. on Legislation and National Security of the House Comm. on Government Operations, 99th Cong., 1st Sess. 35–36 (1985) testimony of Prof. Sanford Levinson [hereinafter cited as Hearings].

It is not surprising that, like many modern governmental units, the Comptroller General cannot neatly be labelled as totally the creature of one branch or another. This was recognized more than 20 years ago in United States ex rel. Brookfield Construction Co. v. Stewart, 234 F. Supp. 94, 99 (D.D.C. 1964) aff'd, 339 F.2d 753 (D.C. Cir. 1964):

"The Comptroller General is the head of the General Accounting Office, 31 U.S.C. § 41. Unlike heads of most departments and establishments of the Government, he occupies a dual position and performs a two-fold function. First, he makes investigations of matters relating to the receipt, disbursement and application of public funds, and reports the results of his scrutiny to the Congress with appropriate recommendations. In addition he pursues investigations that may be ordered by either House of Congress, or by any Committee of either House, in matters relating to revenue, appropriations or expenditures, 31 U.S.C. § 53. In performing these functions the status of the Comptroller General is that of an officer of the legislative branch of the Government. The Congress has comprehensive authority to undertake investigations in aid of legislation, or in connection with the appropriation of funds. Investigations are an aid to legislation and to the making of appropriations and are therefore auxiliary to the basic functions of Congress. The Congress may conduct investigations either through Committees or through an official such as the Comptroller General.

"The Comptroller General has also a second status as the chief accounting officer of the Government. His second principal function is that of approval or disapproval of payments made by Government departments and other agencies, as well as of settling and adjusting accounts in which the Government is concerned, 31 U.S.C. § 71. This is an executive function and in performing it the Comptroller General acts as a member of the Executive branch of the Government. The dual status of the General Accounting Office is not anomalous, for many regulatory commissions fulfill in part a legislative function and in part carry out executive duties, Humphrey's Executor v. United States, 295 U.S. 602, 55 S. Ct. 869, 79 L.Ed. 1611, Cf. Myers v. United States, 272 U.S. 52, 47 S.Ct. 21, 71 L.Ed. 160. Thus we have developed in comparatively recent years a fourth type of Government agency—one that combines two kinds of basic powers."

Id. at 99–100 (quoted with approval by court below, 607 F. Supp. at 970–71). We adopt the reasoning of the court in Brookfield Construction that the GAO is best viewed as a part of a headless "fourth branch" of government consisting of independent agencies having significant duties in both the legislative and executive branches but residing not entirely within either.

The description of the Federal Trade Commission contained in Humphrey's Executor provides a close analogy for describing the GAO and the Comptroller General:

"The commission is to be non-partisan; and it must, from the very nature of its duties, act with entire impartiality. It is charged with the enforcement of no policy except the policy of the law. Its duties are neither political nor executive, but predominantly quasi-judicial and quasi-legislative. Like the Interstate Commerce Commission, its members are called upon to exercise the trained judgment of a body of experts, 'appointed by law and informed by experience.' [citation omitted].

"[The Commission is to be 'independent of any department of the government . . . a board or commission of dignity, permanence, and ability, independent of executive authority, except in its selection, and independent in character.' "

295 U.S. at 624–25 (quoting statement of Senator Newlands).

The district court correctly followed Brookfield Construction in holding that the GAO is a hybrid agency of the kind described in Humphrey's Executor and that the Comptroller General may constitutionally exercise executive functions in reviewing bid protests because he is appointed pursuant to the Appointments Clause and performs executive duties. Although a legislative officer may not be given executive duties, many executive or "fourth branch" officers perform mixed duties and therefore function in dual capacities. As the Supreme Court noted in Springer v. Phillipine Islands, 277 U.S. 189 (1928):

"Not having the power of appointment, unless expressly granted or incidental to its powers, the legislature cannot engraft executive duties upon a legislative office, since that would be to usurp the power of appointment by indirection: though the case might be different if the additional duties were devolved upon an appointee of the executive."

Id. at 202, quoted with approval in Buckley, 424 U.S. at 136–37.[5]

Our decision that both the GAO and the Comptroller General discharge their assigned functions with a measure of independence from both the legislative and executive branches undermines the Army's reliance on Buckley and Chadha. In both of those cases, the legislature usurped the executive's power by subjecting agency actions to direct political control. In Buckley, it did so by appointing members of the Federal Election Commission. In Chadha, it did so by ordering the deportation of an alien by a resolution not passed by both Houses or presented to the President. Here, no political, i.e., legislative control is being asserted over any executive prerogative; an additional executive power or non-legislative function has merely been assigned to an agency which from its inception has been functionally independent of political control.[6]

It must not be overlooked that through CICA, the act in question here, Congress has given the Comptroller General no ultimate veto over government appropriations. It has done no more than to furnish the Comptroller General with a tool to prevent faits accomplis and to encourage competition in contracting. The power of the contracting executive agency to override the stay in important circumstances provides a safety valve for any possible abuse by the Comptroller General. Most importantly, the long history of independence of the GAO supports the district court's view that the stay provision does not operate to permit intrusion by the legislative branch into executive or judicial decision making. Thus, the delicate balance of power among the branches of government has not been endangered or upset by our answer to the second question which we posed: that the mere existence of the power of Congress to remove the Comptroller General does not render the Comptroller an agent of Congress for the purpose of this case.[7]

IV.

Although we hold that the district court properly upheld the constitutionality of the Comptroller General's stay powers, the Army argues forcefully that the injunction granted was unnecessarily broad. We recognize that the Army in so arguing must overcome the considerable discretion granted to the district court in framing injunctions. Lemon v. Kurtzman, 411 U.S. 192, 200 (1973). The trial court must be given leeway to fashion effective remedies to correct offenses to the Constitution. Ramirez de Arellano v. Weinberger, 745 F.2d 1500, 1521 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (en banc). Nevertheless, injunctive relief should be no broader than necessary to provide full relief to the aggrieved party. Califano v. Yamasaki, 442 U.S. 682. 702 (1979).

The Army argues that the district court attempted to require observance of the CICA stay provisions on a "government-wide" basis, i.e., nationally. On its face, the court's order contains no limiting language to rebut this reading. However, it is apparent from the court's oral opinion that it intended to order the federal government to observe CICA only within the District of New Jersey—the court's proper jurisdiction. See 610 F. Supp. at 756. Nevertheless, we agree that the injunction, even thus construed, went beyond that which was necessary to secure Ameron's rights.

There is no dispute that the Congressional intervenors were proper parties for the purpose of supporting the constitutionality of the CICA stay provision. See Chadha, 462 U.S. at 940.[8] To the extent, then, that the court declared CICA to be constitutional, the Congressional intervenors had standing to obtain the relief granted. However, the intervenors lack their own standing to obtain an injunction forcing compliance with the law. Nothing in the Ameron controversy gives Congress a direct "stake" in the enforcement of CICA. Once a law is passed and upheld a constitutional, Congress's interest in its enforcement is no more than that of the average citizen. See Moore v. House of Representatives, 733 F.2d 946, 951-52 (D.C. Cir. 1984), cert. denied, 105 S. Ct. 779 (1985). An ordinary citizen, in turn, has no standing to obtain an injunction to enforce the law, absent a personal stake in such enforcement. Allen v. Wright, 104 S. Ct. 3315, 3326 (1984); AFGE v. Pierce, 967 F.2d 303, 305 (D.C. Cir. 1982). The Congressional intervenors, therefore, do not have independent standing to seek an injunction ordering the federal govenment to enforce CICA.

However, despite their lack of independent standing, the intervenors may be entitled to injunctive relief on the same grounds and to the same extent as was available to Ameron. See Director OWCP v. Perini North River & Associates, 459 U.S. 297, 302-305 (1982) (to the extent OWCP Director does not have separate standing, he may seek reversal of lower court decision on grounds available to nonappealing aggrieved party). The question then is: what relief was available to Ameron?

In the absence of a certified class action, Ameron was only entitled to relief for itself. National Center for Immigrant Rights v. INS, 743 F.2d 1365, 1371-72 (9th Cir. 1984); Davis v. Romney, 490 F.2d 1367, 1366 (3d Cir. 1974). While the district court's entry of a declaratory judgment of constitutionality [9] may serve as precedent for subsequent cases; an injunction directing the Army Corps of Engineers to honor the stay provision of CICA only in the case provides full relief to Ameron. See Baeder v. Heckler, 768 F.2d 547, 553 (3d Cir. 1985) (striking down nation-wide injunction but leaving intact holding that regulation was invalid and grant of injunctive relief in plaintiffs case).

Ameron and the Congressional intervenors make several arguments in support of the broader relief granted. First of all, they argue that the Army never made any formal objection to the proposed scope of relief. We are not impressed with this claim, since the Army made clear during its colloquy with the district court that it objected to the broader injunctive relief granted. See May 28 transcript at 25-29.

More importantly, Ameron and the Congressional intervenors argue that the broader injunction was justified as a response to two expressions of defiance by the executive of each of its coordinate branches: First, the executive declared a duly enacted and signed law (CICA) to be unconstitutional and second, the executive intimated that it would not follow court decisions upholding that law.

As to the first issue, the record shows that upon the President's orders, the Attorney General instructed all executive agencies to ignore the stay provisions in CICA.[10] The Justice Department sought to justify this action as within the President's duty to defend the Constitution: "[I]n the case of a conflict between the Constitution and a statute, the President's duty faithfully to execute the law requires him not to observe a statute that is in conflict with the Constitution, the fundamental law of the land." Hearings at 318 (testimony of Acting Deputy Attorney General D. Lowell Jensen). See also Meese, President's Right to Challenge Law, N.Y. Times, May 21, 1985 (Letter to the Editor) Supp. App. at 180.

This claim of right for the President to declare statutes unconstitutional and to declare his refusal to execute them, as distinguished from his undisputed right to veto, criticize, or even refuse to defend in court, statutes which he regards as unconstitutional, is dubious at best.[11] The question of the President's actions, declarations, and purported refusal to order compliance with CICA, however, was not properly before the district court. Therefore, our task on this appeal is similarly limited to ruling only on the constitutionality of the statute before us, and on whether the remedy fashioned by the district court granted appropriate relief to the parties actually before the court. We are faced with no justiciable claim against the President stemming from an alleged usurpation of power.

The second challenged assertion of power by the executive branch is the threat of Attorney General Meese not to follow court decisions in this case. According to the Attorney General's testimony before the House's Committee on the Judiciary on April 18, 1985, the district court is not a "court of competent jurisdiction" to decide constitutional questions. Transcript of House Hearings at 24-25. Moreover, Mr. Meese declared the government's intention not to follow the district court's decision granting a preliminary injunction in Ameron until there was "an appellate decision." Id. at 31. Questioned further, Mr. Meese suggested that even a decision of this court—the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit—might be ignored until the Supreme Court finally laid the matter to rest. Id. at 35-36. However, following the granting of permanent relief by the district court, the Army agreed to honor the stay provisions of CICA pending the disposition of this appeal. See Brief of Appellee-Intervenors Speaker and Bipartisan Leadership Group of the House of Representatives at 18-19.

In framing its relief, the district court was understandably concerned with the executive challenge to its power. The district court engaged counsel for the Army in a discussion regarding the district court's competence to rule on CICA's constitutionality. In so doing, it elicited a concession that the court did have jurisdiction to rule on the question and to enforce its view through injunction in the District of New Jersey. May 28 transcript at 27. In its oral opinion, the court stressed its rejection of the executive's assertion of power to ignore an order of the district court and the suggestion of Attorney General Meese that the district court was not a court of "competent jurisdiction." 610 F. Supp. at 755-56.

It should be too obvious even to require restating that the district court, as an Article II court, has the power to rule on the constitutionality of an act of Congress and to impose appropriate remedies to compel compliance with an act found to be constitutional. That the executive in this case questioned this elementary principle did not, however, alter the specific task before the district court: to frame an injunction no broader than necessary to grant the full relief to which Ameron and the Congressional intervenors were entitled.

As Justice Douglas observed in his Youngstown concurrence, "[T]he emergency did not create power; it merely marked an occasion when power should be exercised." 343 U.S. at 629. Similarly, here, the felt need to reassert the constitutional scope of its power in the face of executive challenge did not create power in the district court that it did not already have, or change the judicial standards for the granting of injunctive relief. We therefore affirm the district court's obviously correct ruling that it is a court of competent jurisdiction to decide constitutional questions, even though we find the granted injunctive relief to be too broad under the circumstances of this case.

An injunction applying only to Ameron—ordering application of the CICA stay provisions in Ameron's case—would have provided Ameron with complete relief. While it was within the constitutional power of the court to grant broader relief, jurisprudence governing injunctive remedies will not permit it. We therefore affirm the May 20, 1985 order of the district court,[12] except as to its final paragraph which we modify. See Evans v. Buchanan, 555 F.2d 373, 381 (3d Cir. 1977) (en banc). The final paragraph of the district court's order originally provided:

"FURTHER ORDERED that defendants U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, Caspar W. Weinberger and David Stockman are permanently enjoined from applying Federal Acquisition Circular 84-6 or OMB Bulletin No. 85-8 insofar as they conflict with 31 U.S.C. § 3553, and are permanently enjoined to secure the issuance of regulations which comply with and implement 31 U.S.C. § 3553."

We hold here that this provision granted relief broader than that to which Ameron was entitled. We therefore substitute for that provision in the district court's order the following language appropriate to the case before us:

"FURTHER ORDERED that defendants U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, Casper W. Weinberger, and David A. Stockman are permanently enjoined to comply with and implement 31 U.S.C. § 3553 in the case of Ameron, Inc.'s bid protest filed March 1, 1985."

V.

The May 20, 1985 order of the district court, as modified herein, will be affirmed in all other respects.

APPENDIX

Text of District Court Order of May 20, 1985

This matter coming on to be considered by the court on application of Charles Tiefer on behalf of the Speaker and Bipartisan Leadership Group of the House of Representatives as plaintiffs-intervenors, and Morgan Frankel, on behalf of the Senate, plaintiffs-intervenor, and it appearing from the papers submitted, the prior oral argument, the entire record in this case, and the Opinion of this Court filed on March 28, 1985, that there are no material facts in genuine dispute regarding the issue of the constitutionality of the stay provision in the Competition in Contracting Act, 31 U.S.C. § 3553, and that plaintiff and the intervenors are entitled to judgment as a matter of law, and for good cause

It is on this 20th day of May 1985:

ORDERED that in issuing its Opinion filed March 28, 1985, and in issuing this Order, this Court has been exercising the historic jurisdiction regarding the constitutionality of Acts of Congress, possessed by the Judiciary alone, of a court of competent jurisdiction;

FURTHER ORDERED that intervenors' motions for summary judgment be, and they are hereby granted; and it is

FURTHER ORDERED that 31 U.S.C. §§ 3353 be and it is hereby declared to be constitutional; and it is FURTHER ORDERED that defendants U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, Caspar W. Weinberger and David A. Stockman are permanently enjoined from applying Federal Acquisition Circular 84-6 or OMB Bulletin No. 85-8 insofar as they conflict with 31 U.S.C. § 3553, and are permanently enjoined to secure the issuance of regulations which comply with and implement 31 U.S.C. § 3353.

HAROLD A. ACKERMAN
U.S.D.J.

Becker, Circuit Judge, concurring in part:

I join in Parts II and IV of the majority's opinion, and in its judgment. I disagree fundamentally with the majority's analysis in Part III however, and write separately to explain my views.

I.

Central to the majority's finding that CICA is not unconstitutional is its conviction that the Comptroller General occupies an indeterminate place in our constitutional scheme, belonging to neither the legislative, nor the executive, nor the judicial branch. Relying on United States ex rel. Brookfield Construction Co. v. Stewart, 234 F. Supp. 94 (D.D.C. 1964), aff'd., 339 F.2d 753 (D.C.Cir. 1964), the majority states that "the Comptroller General cannot neatly be labelled as totally the creature of one branch or another," Maj. Op. at 27, and that "the GAO is best viewed as a part of a headless 'fourth branch' of government," Id. at 28.

Having thus severed the Comptroller General from any constitutional moorings within one of the three branches of government, the majority argues that because the GAO and the Comptroller General are "functionally independent of political control," id. at 31, and because the GAO has a "long history of independence," id. at 32, the powers granted the Comptroller General are not unconstitutional. According to the majority: "the delicate balance of power among the branches of government has not been endangered or upset [by the provision of CICA permitting congressional removal for cause of the Comptroller General]," id., and CICA is thus constitutional.

In my view, the majority's argument has gone awry on its very first step, its refusal to place the Comptroller General in one branch of government or another. The Constitution establishes three branches of government, not four. Moreover, because ours is a government of enumerated powers, there can be no branch of government not established by the Constitution. It therefore follows that there can be no fourth branch, headless or otherwise.

I admit that scholars often refer to administrative agencies as the "fourth branch" of government. See e.g., Strauss, The Place of the Agencies in Government: Separation of Powers and the Fourth Branch, 84 Colum. L. Rev. 573 (1984). The Supreme Court, however, has not acknowledged that administrative agencies, even the so-called independent regulatory agencies, belong to a category all their own. To the contrary, the Supreme Court continues to frame its separation of powers analyses in the context of the familiar triumvirate of branches. See, e.g., INS v. Chadha, 462 919, 951 (1983) ("The Constitution sought to divide the delegated powers of the new Federal Government into three defined categories, Legislative, Executive, and Judicial."); Buckley v. Veleo, 424 U.S. 1, 120 (1976) (in analyzing the constitutionality of the powers of the Federal Election Commission, an "independent" administrative agency, the Court referred to the "fundamental principles of the Government . . . that the powers of the three great branches of the National Government be largely separate from one another."). The majority's insistence on a fourth branch, while perhaps intellectually fashionable, is thus contrary to the jurisprudence of the Supreme Court.[13]

I do not deny that administrative agencies are and must be a part of our government, and I do not suggest that they lack legitimacy simply because they were not envisaged by the Founding Fathers. Administrative agencies developed as a response to the needs of a complex society, and so long as our society remains as complex as it is, we shall need them. My point is simply that courts engaged in constitutional analysis must work within the framework established by the Constitution, and the Constitution does not allow for any more than three branches of government. If the administrative agencies cannot fit within this framework then the framework should perhaps be changed, but if this is to be done it must be by constitutional amendment, not judicial disregard of the present Constitution. Even a living constitution cannot grow a new branch.

In analyzing the case before us, our first task must therefore be to decide to which of the three branches of government the GAO belongs. The next step in the analysis is to classify the powers conferred on the Comptroller General by the allegedly objectionable provisions of CICA. Only then can we decide whether those powers violate the Constitution.

II.

A.

Because the office of the Comptroller General is created by statute, the Comptroller General's status within the government is a matter of statutory interpretation which, like all statutory interpretation, is controlled by legislative intent. Paskel v. Heckler, 768 F.2d 540, 543 (3d Cir. 1985); Murphy, Old Maxims Never Die: The "Plain Meaning" Rule and Statutory Interpretation in the "Modern" Federal Courts, 754 Colum. L. Rev. 1299, 1299 (1975). There is copious evidence in the legislative history that the GAO (and therefore the Comptroller General) was intended to be in the legislative branch. This evidence is summarized concisely by the majority, and there is no need to repeat it here. See Maj. Op. at 19-20; see also Maj. Op. at 19 (citing cases that arrive at the same conclusion). Because there is no evidence of legislative intent to the contrary, I believe that it is incumbent upon us to hold that the Comptroller General is within the legislative branch of government, despite the inconveniences that may attend such a holding.

The majority's reluctance to classify the Comptroller General as legislative stems from two sources: (a) the fact that certain of the Comptroller General's functions are executive in nature, see infra at 6-7, and (b) the fact that the Comptroller General is appointed by the President. See Maj. Op. at 18-19. Although both of these facts are relevant to the question whether any of the statutes affecting the Comptroller General unconstitutionally violate the principle of separation of powers, see infra 10-12, neither is relevant to the logically prior question: to which branch does the Comptroller General belong? As I have noted, because the office of the Comptroller General is created by statute, his status must be determined by the legislative intent.[14] In this case, the legislative intent is clear—he belongs to the legislative branch.

B.

Having determined that the Comptroller General is a member of the legislative branch, the next step in the analysis is to determine whether CICA grants the Comptroller General any functions that are executive or judicial rather than legislative. On this point, the parties agree that the following powers granted to the Comptroller General by CICA are not legislative: the powers to (i) review protests and issue recommendations on their adequacy, 31 U.S.C.A. § 3554 (West Supp. 1985), (ii) lift the automatic stay imposed by the filing of the protest, id., and (iii) demand attorneys fees and costs on a finding that the solicitation was unlawful, id.

I agree with the parties' conclusions. Although the meanings of "legislative," "executive," and "judicial" are somewhat indeterminate, I find it hard to believe that the powers listed above would fit under any of the more common understandings of "legislative power." In exercising these powers, the Comptroller General acts on a case-by-case basis; he applies law rather than makes it. The powers are executive, or even quasi-judicial, rather than legislative. Although in other contexts the distinction between executive and judicial would be quite important, here it is not, and I therefore pass over it. The important point, which no party contests, is simply that the Comptroller General, a legislative officer, undeniably exercises non-legislative powers.

C.

The inquiry cannot end here. The three branches of governement, although separate, are not airtight. See Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, 433 U.S. 425, 443 (1977); United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683,

703 (1974). The Supreme Court has adopted a flexible approach, and has expressly endorsed the eloquent language of Justice Jackson in Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sanger, 343 U.S. 579, 635 (1952) (Jackson, J., concurring):

"While the Constitution diffuses power the better to secure liberty, it also contemplates that practice will integrate the dispersed poweres into a workable government, it enjoins upon its branches separateness but interdependence, autonomy but reciprocity."

The doctrine of separation of powers thus allows for some overlap among the branches. It could scarcely be otherwise, for virtually every branch has members who perform work that can be characterized as belonging to another branch. In the judiciary, for example, the Chief Judge, Circuit Executive, and Clerk of this Court exercise administrative responsibility that is executive rather than judicial. Every legislator has aides who do similar administrative/executive-type work. Administrative agencies that are within the executive branch often engage in both rulemaking, which is legislative in character, and adjudication, which is, of course, judicial.

The proper question in the separation of powers context, therefore, is not merely whether members of one branch do work that falls within the description of another. Rather, the question is whether, by that work, the branch to which those members belong infringes so substantially on the other branch that the infringed-upon branch cannot carry out its constitutionally assigned functions. This test was explicitly enunciated by the Supreme Court in Nixon v. Administrator of General Services, supra, 433 U.S. at 443: "[I]n determining whether the Act disrupts the proper balance between the coordinate branches, the proper inquiry focuses on the extent to which it prevents the Executive Branch from accomplishing its constitutionally assigned functions."

Even this test is not immediately accessible, for "constitutionally assigned functions" is not a readily definable term. Each branch has many constitutionally assigned—or, at least, constitutionally permitted—functions. To give definition to the term, it is therefore necessary to place the problem in context, that is, to identify the objectives to be served by the principle of separation of powers and see if those objectives are threatened by the Comptroller General's CICA-derived powers.

Although scholars may debate the intricacies and wisdom of separation of powers, the original intent of the Founding Fathers in creating our system of divided powers is very clear and can be briefly stated. The principal goal of the Founding Fathers in enacting a system of separated powers was the protection of individual liberties. The colonists had experienced virtual tyranny at the hands of all three branches in their recent histories, see G. Wood, The Creation of the American Republic 1776-1787 668-70 (1969); Levi, Some Aspects of Separation of Powers, 76 Colum. L. Rev. 369, 373-76 (1976), and had concluded that only by diffusing power within the government could individual liberty be preserved. Echoing Montesquieu, James Madison wrote "[t]he accumulation of all powers, legislative, executive, and judiciary, in the same hands . . . may justly be pronounced the very definition of tyranny." Federalist No. 47 (Madison) in The Federalist, 373-74 (Hamilton ed. 1864); cf. Montesquieu, The Spirit of the Laws, 38 Great Books of the Western World 70 (Hutchins ed. 1952) ("When the legislative and executive powers are united in the same person, or in the same body of magistrates, there can be no liberty."). See also Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sanger, supra, 343 U.S. at 635 ("the Constitution diffuses power the better to secure liberty") (Jackson, J., concurring). [15]

We are now in a position to ask the central question in this case: do the executive-judicial powers conferred upon the Comptroller General by CICA threaten to coalesce powers in one branch such that individual liberty—in this case, the liberty of those in Ameron's position who bid for contracts covered by the CICA—is threatened? I think not. Three factors in particular convince me that the threat is not severe. First, CICA permits the executive branch unilaterally to override the automatic stay by submitting to the Comptroller General a written statement of "urgent and compelling circumstances which significantly affect interests of the United States." 31 U.S.C.A. § 3553(c)(2)(A). Thus, there need be no severe effects on the prerogative of the executive as a result of the Comptroller General's powers.[16] Admittedly, § 3553(c)(2)(A) is not an executive carte blanche. The "urgent and compelling circumstances" must in fact exist, and I presume that this would be determined by a court of law—the third branch. Nevertheless, the limitation on the Comptroller General's powers is real and diminishes the threat to the goals of separation of powers.

Second, Congress has no voice in the Comptroller General's day-to-day operations, and it holds no sword of Damocles over the Comptroller General's head. Congress' only power over the Comptroller General, its power of removal, is circumscribed because it requires a joint resolution of Congress, and must be for one or more of five specified reasons: permanent disability, inefficiency, neglect of duty, malfeasance, or conduct which is felonious or involves moral turpitude. 31 U.S.C. § 703(e)(1982). The joint resolution will likely be more difficult to pass than a majority vote in one house, and the five reasons, although not so narrow as to deny Congress any leeway, circumscribe Congress' power to some extent by providing a basis for judicial review of congressional removal. The result of this limitation is that, as a practical matter, Congress has not exercised, and probably will never exercise, such control over the Comptroller General that his non-legislative powers will threaten the goal of dispersion of power, and hence the goal of individual liberty, that separation of powers serves.

It is particularly instructive in this regard to compare this case with INS v. Chadha, supra, heavily relied upon by the Army. Although both cases involve an infringement by the legislative branch into the domain of the executive, the nature the infringements are very different. The unicameral legislative veto struck down in Chadha had all the earmarks of a hastily considered, unjust bill of attainder: there was neither a published committee report nor a debate, but only a conclusory statement on the floor of the House by a single Representative. Congress made the decision to deport Chadha by an unrecorded vote. Id. at 926-27 (Opinion of the Court); id at 963-64 (Powell, J., concurring). Here, by contrast, there is no direct congressional involvement, and consequently the danger sought to be avoided in Chadha—the involvement of political passions in quasi-judicial proceedings—is simply not present. Bidders like Ameron realistically need not fear significant and improper congressional involvement.

Finally, it must not be forgotten that the President appoints the Comptroller General. Although the power of appointment does not give the President continuing control over the Comptroller General, it does give the President the opportunity to put into that office someone who will be respectful of the prerogatives, and sympathetic to the problems, of the executive branch. Once again, this is a significant feature of the case before us that lessens the severity of the congressional infringement on executive powers and distinguishes this case from those, like Chadha, in which the infringement and threat to liberty is more severe.

III.

My analysis is in many ways similar to the majority's. For both of us, the independence of the Comptroller General from congressional control and the limited power of the Comptroller General over the President are central to our decision. The majority might thus contend that our differences are merely semantic, and that I toil under a "'tyranny of labels.'" See Maj. Op. at 20 (qouting Synder v. Massachusetts, 291 U.S. 97, 114 (1934) (Cardozo, J.)). But the majority would be wrong. What is at stake is our adherence to the system of government established by the Constitution. It is essential that we write—and think—only in terms of the three branches, and that we permit no more than the terms of the Constitution, fairly interpreted, will allow.

I can only surmise that the majority was attracted to the concept of the headless fourth branch because of its fear that the Comptroller General, and all other "independent" administrative agencies, could not survive an analysis that allowed for only three branches of government. I have explained, see supra II.C., why I believe the concept of separation of powers is sufficiently flexible to accommodate the CICA. I assume that similar analyses would lead to the same results for most other administrative agencies, although I cannot be sure.[17] I am certain, however, that if some agency powers cannot fit within a government of three branches, or if certain legislation permitting one branch to affect the affairs of another cannot be countenanced within the three-branch framework, then those agency powers and that legislation must fall. The judiciary cannot invent a fourth branch to house them. Otherwise, we risk the very tyranny the Founding Fathers sought so ingeniously to avoid.

FOOTNOTES

[1] The original typed bond amount of $1,200,000 was "whited-out" and the bond amount of $3,000,000 was typed over the corrected portion of the bond document. App. at 8-9.

[2] In essence, the Comptroller General held that it was not arbitrary for the Army to reject Ameron's bid due to the altered bond document.

[3] The three-judge court was convened pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 2284. See Synar v. United States, No. 85-3945, Slip op. at 5 n.1 (D.D.C. Feb. 11, 1986).

[4] The Synar court rejected a similar argument on the ground that it had no authority to "choose" whether to invalidate the Comptroller General's powers or Congress' removal power. In so doing, the court observed that courts faced with constitutionally incompatible statutes generally "set aside that statute which either allegedly prohibits or allegedly authorizes the injury-in-fact that confers standing upon the plaintiff." Slip op. at 32.

However, if the question of Congress' removal power is ripe in this case at all, than a fortiori it is also within the authority of the court to declare that power unconstitutional, making a "choice" unavoidable. In the context of the present case, it would seem more logical to sever this never-used power rather than to strike down Congress' new statutory scheme in CICA. By contrast, in Synar, the court addressed a congressional scheme providing for "fallback" procedures in the event that the involvement of the Comptroller General in deficit reduction was deemed unconstitutional. See slip op. at 33-34.

[5] In contrast to our holding, the Synar court held that the Comptroller General's significant executive powers under the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act placed it in a "no-man's land" controlled by neither Myers, which concerned purely executive officers, nor Humphrey's Executor, which concerned officials exercising only incidental executive functions along with primarily quasi-legislative or quasi-judicial powers. Slip op. at 44. The Synar court then focused almost exclusively on the question of the removal power and, finding the retention of that power by Congress to be incompatible with the Comptroller General's exercise of executive budget-cutting functions, struck down the applicable parts of the Act.

Just as we have declined to follow Synar with respect to the constitutionality of Congress' removal power, we also decline to follow the approach taken by the Synar court here. The core principle of Humphrey's Executor was that Congress could create agencies exercising dual functions and which were independent of unfettered executive control. In their blend of powers and functions, the Comptroller General and the GAO closely resemble the FTC and other "fourth branch" agencies. There is, therefore, little basis for distinguishing Humphrey's Executor in the present case. We need not reach the question whether Congress might at some point violate the separation of powers by assigning to the Comptroller General or some other official independent of executive control too great a preponderance of fundamentally executive powers or functions. This is not such a case.

We do note, however, that the result in Synar seems to be based, at least in part, on the court's perception that "[i]t is not as obvious today as to it seemed in the 1930s that there can be such things as genuinely 'independent' regulatory agencies." Slip op. at 40. However, as noted infra at note 6, the principles underlying Humphrey's Executor have been widely accepted for half a century. We do not read INS v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919 (1983) to the contrary or as undercutting these principles.

[6] Although the issue is not squarely presented by this case, we have not been unaware of the current public debate over the constitutionality of the entire scheme of independent agencies constituting the "fourth branch." In particular, we recognize that Attorney General Meese has questioned whether agencies exercising executive power may be kept independent of presidential authority. See A Question of Power, A Powerful Questioner, N.Y. Times, Nov. 6, 1985, at B8, col. 3.

We note that the constitutionality of independent agencies has been settled for half a century. See Humphrey's Executor v. United States, 295 U.S. 602, 629 (1935). However, to the extent that the Attorney General finds constitutional support for his assertion that every agency must be considered a part of a particular branch of government, this argument may cut against the Army's position in this case. In a September 13, 1985 speech reported in the New York Times, the Attorney General said: "Federal agencies performing executive functions are themselves properly agents of the executive. They are not 'quasi' this or 'independent' that. In the tripartite scheme of government, a body with enforcement powers is part of the executive branch of government." N.Y. Times, supra, at B8, col. 5-6.

Since it is undisputed that the Comptroller General and the GAO perform significant executive functions along with their legislative functions, the Attorney General's view would seem to regard them as part of the executive branch, a position contrary to the Army's argument in this case.

[7] Because we hold that the Comptroller General is not exclusively a legislative agent, we need not reach the questions of whether the automatic stay could survive as a "report and wait" provision and whether, if unconstitutional, the Comptroller General's stay-lifting power is severable.

[8] Chadha actually only held that Congress properly interevenes to defend its statue when both plaintiffs and government defendants agree that a statute is unconstitutional, i.e., when there is no one to speak for the constitutionality of the statute. Here, where Ameron argued that the statute was constitutional, arguably there is less need to recognize Congress's standing. However, the parties agree, and we concur, that Congress has standing to intervene whenever the executive declines to defend a statute or, as in this case, actually argues that it is unconstitutional.

[9] See Appendix to this opinion for the district court's order of May 20, 1985.

[10] Pursuant to the Attorney General's instruction, the Office of Management and Budget issued OMB Bulletin No. 85-8 (Dec. 17, 1984), which required, inter alia, that:

"Agencies shall take no action, including the issuance of regulations, based upon the invalid provisions [of CICA].

"With respect to the "stay" provision, agencies shall proceed with the procurement process as though no such provision were contained in the Act. Pursuant to the provisions of the Federal Acquisition Regulations, the agency may voluntarily agree to stay procurements pending the resolution of bid protests, but the grant of such a stay must be based upon other valid authority and may not be based upon the invalid stay provisions of the Act.

"Agencies shall comply with the provisions of 31 U.S.C. § 3553(b) concerning the submission of reports to the Comptroller General on protested procurements.

"With respect to the damages provision of the Act, agencies shall not comply with declarations of awards of costs, including attorneys' fess or bid preparation costs, made by the Comptroller General.

"Agencies shall comply with 32 U.S.C. § 3554(e) concerning submission of reports to the Comptroller General on unaccommodated recommendations."

[11] See Kendall v. United States, 37 U.S. 524, 613 (1838) ("To contend that the obligation imposed on the President to see the laws faithfully executed, implies a power to forbid their execution, is a novel construction of the Constitution, and entirely inadmissable.") The President's job is to execute law, not to create it. Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 587 (1952). Moreover, "it is, emphatically, the province and duty of the judicial department, to say what the law is." Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137, 177 (1803). Absent a patently unconstitutional law or one infringing liberty interests or other fundamental rights of individuals, the President's asserted power and "duty" not to execute laws he finds to be unconstitutional is questionable. See Hearings at 39, 44 (testimony of Prof. Sanford Levinson); id, at 46-47 (testimony of Prof. Eugene Gressman).

[12] See Appendix to this opinion for the full text of the original order of the district court.

[13] Although in FTC v. Ruberoid Corp., 343 U.S. 470 (1952). Justice Jackson did refer to administrative agencies as "a veritable fourth branch," id. at 487, (Jackson. J., dissenting), that was merely descriptive: Justice Jackson was hardly setting it forth as part of a new framework for constitutional analysis. Indeed, his qualification of the description—"a veritable fourth branch"—suggests that he did not intend to be taken literally.

The only other occasions on which any member of the Supreme Court has used "fourth branch" in an opinion when referring to administrative agencies have also been in dissents and have been similarily off-hand and descriptive, rather than analytic. See Process Gas Consumers Group v. Consumer Energy Council of America, 463 U.S. 1216, 1219 (1983) (White, J., dissenting); INS v. Chadha, supra, 462 U.S. at 984 (White, J., dissenting)(quoting FTC v. Ruberoid, supra).

[14] The Senate argues in its brief that the fact that the Comptroller General is appointed by the President precludes his being part of the legislative branch. In making this argument, the Senate relied on Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976). See also Maj. Op. at 19 (citing Buckley for the proposition that the executive functions of the Comptroller General and his appointment by the President "arguably render the Comptroller an 'Officer of the United States,'" i.e., a member of the executive branch.). This reliance is misplaced, for Buckley never suggested that all those appointed by the President are necessarily members of the executive branch of government. Buckley held that only those appointed by the President could be "Officers of the United States," but we are concerned here with the obverse problem, never contemplated by Buckley, whether all those so appointed are necessarily Officers of the United States.

The only reference in Buckley to the Comptroller General came in a footnote in which the Supreme Court rejected an analogy between the members of the Federal Election Commission (who were not appointed by the President) and the Comptroller General. The Court said that "irrespective of Congress' designation [of the Comptroller General as a legislative officer], the Comptroller General is appointed by the President in conformity with the Appointments Clause." Buckley v. Valeo, supra, 424 U.S. at 128 n. 165. This offhand reference is not sufficient to support the Senate's point that appointment by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate automatically makes one a member of the executive branch. The Buckley Court intended to distinguish the Comptroller General from the members of the Federal Election Commission, not to establish a general rule for a situation that was not before it.

Not only is the Senate's reliance on Buckley weak, but there are counter-examples that disprove its thesis. There are undisputed legislative officers who are appointed by the President—the Librarian of Congress, 2 U.S.C. § 136 (1982), the Public Printer, 44 U.S.C. § 301 (1982), and the Architect of the Capitol, 40 U.S.C. § 162 (1982). Thus, the manner of appointment cannot be dispositive.

[15] In The Interdependence of Legitimacy: An Introduction to the Meaning of Separation of Powers, 5 Seton Hall L. Rev. 435 (1974), Judge Gibbons develops the thesis that the three branches were not intended to work in isolation and that a more accurate portayal of the system is one of dispersed but shared decisional responsibility in which at least two branches must always concur, thus providing reasonable protection against the tyrannical exercise of power by a single branch. On this theory it is not necessary to invent a fourth branch to remedy overlap in the scheme. Judge Gibbons also gives several examples, both early and recent, of how the system of separated powers protects individual liberties.

[16] At least the executive need not fear for its ability to extract itself from an exigent circumstance, e.g., a contract dispute that would threaten a vital defense contract in time of national emergency, or an environmental hazard or natural disaster.

[17] For example, it is conceivable, albeit unlikely at this late date, that someone might launch a separation of powers challenge to the adjudicatory procedures of the NLRB. Under my analysis, a court would consider the legislative history of the NLRB to determine to which branch it was intended to belong. Presumably, the answer would be that it belongs to the executive branch. Next, the court would consider whether its adjudicatory procedures were executive in nature, and would presumably conclude that they were not, but are, rather, judicial. Finally, the court would ask whether this exercise by the executive branch of judicial functions gave the executive so much power, or so intruded upon the vital functions of the judiciary, that individual liberties were threatened. In making this inquiry, the court would consider (i) how much power the President has over the NLRB's adjudicatory functions, and (ii) whether the functions are a significant intrusion upon the judiciary, or whether, on account of judicial review of NLRB decisions, the intrusion is not severe. The analysis suggests, I believe, that my approach would not eclipse the contemporary regulatory scheme.

Mr. CHILES. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOMENICI. I am pleased to yield.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida is going to have to absent himself from the floor for a few minutes. My understanding is that the distinguished chairman of the committee and myself will be offering an amendment in a few minutes. I think what we are talking about doing is worthwhile. There has been some conversation that there is way too much in taxes in the resolution we have before us and way too many entities left untouched something ought to be done.

A letter was circulated widely around here yesterday from the Office of Management and Budget, Mr. Jim Miller. I think the proposition that the chairman is talking about offering, with me as a cosponsor, is that we allow the Members of this body a chance to express themselves on that and see if they want to save those taxes. I shall have a lot more to say about that in a few minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank my friend, the ranking member.

ORDER FOR RECESS AT 4 P.M. TODAY UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. DOMENICI. I am pleased to yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, we have agreed previously that there would be no votes after 4 o'clock today and any votes on S. 120 would be put off until tomorrow. It may be that there will be a necessity for the Senate Finance Committee to meet later today while we are not in session. I have asked the distinguished minority leader if he would have any objection to a unanimous-consent agreement that we recess at 4 o'clock today, to convene tomorrow morning at 10 a.m.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, there is no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, might I ask the distinguished minority leader for a clarification of his statement. I have no objection to it.

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. DOMENICI. If a vote is right on the budget resolution, we can vote before 4 o'clock if one is ready to be voted on. The majority leader indicated they would be put off. If we offer an amendment and the debate is over and we are ready to vote at 2 o'clock, could we do that?

Mr. DOLE. Fine; that is all right. I have no problem with that.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KASTEN). The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BYRD. Will the Senator from New Mexico yield?

Mr. DOMENICI. I am pleased to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, could we have an understanding or an order to the effect that there would be no roll-call votes after 3:30 today? I think that is what we agreed to on yesterday.

Mr. DOLE. That was the order, 3:30; the Senator is correct. I indicated 4. We changed that last night to 3:30.

Mr. BYRD. Does the Senator want to recess at 3:30 or does he still want 4 o'clock.

Mr. DOLE. I may need that 30 minutes to do the wrapup.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I would like to discuss a letter that I am going to put in the RECORD signed by the distinguished ranking minority member, the senior Senator from Florida, Senator CHILES, and myself regarding a letter which was delivered yesterday by the Director of OMB, Mr. Miller. I think Mr. Miller knows that the Senator from New Mexico has the highest esteem and respect for him, and has the highest esteem and respect for the position he holds. Clearly, I have great respect for the fact that he speaks for the President, and that the President, with the aid and assistance of many but in particular Mr. Miller, sent us a budget some few months ago.

And I send this letter, joined in by Senator CHILES, to my colleagues because they received Mr. Miller's analysis of the budget that is pending here before the Senate. Clearly, there are at least two ways to look at things. I thought it would be good to look at things from the standpoint of that bipartisan majority that voted out a budget resolution, and perhaps the Senators who read his letter of yesterday would be as interested in what we have to say about the budget resolution as they are interested in what he has to say about it.

So I refer in this letter to the fact that yesterday Mr. Miller outlined objections to Senate Concurrent Resolution 120, the pending matter before the Senate.

While there are many issues in it, the letter addresses three of them. Let me paraphrase and then I will put the letter into the RECORD in its entirety, with leave of the Senate.

First, the director contends that the President's fiscal year 1987 budget met the challenges of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act.

Quite to the contrary, the budget that he refers to did not meet the deficit targets specified in that legislation.

The Congressional Budget Office estimated that the President's budget, after all the cuts recommended, with the small amount of revenue increases recommended, and the increases in defense recommended, if we did all those things, the deficit would be $160 billion, not $144 billion, $16 billion in outlays off the mark.

Obviously, the OMB Director, Mr. Miller, has been discussing economic changes and put forward suggestions about changing the economic assumptions in discussions yesterday. I am not referring to those and he did not refer to those in his letter. It was purely an analysis, static in nature, of the budget he sent us and the budget we reported.

I repeat, even if the President's budget was adopted in its entirety, with 44 programs terminated, with reform in 6 or 7 other entitlement programs, with that small amount of revenue and that very large increase in defense—even if it was adopted—there would still have to be a sequester when we finished all of that.

There is one thing the budget director did discuss yesterday. It had to do with $4 billion in the farm program. Although he did not make reference to it in his letter, there is a suggestion that that $4 billion should not be in the budget because, as he puts it, they do not intend to spend it. But that is not the issue here.

The President's budget is $16 billion in excess of that required under the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law. After you did all that work, Gramm-Rudman would require a cut in domestic programs of $8 billion in outlays on top of the $28 billion proposed in the budget.

Under such a sequester, defense, would have to be cut about $20 billion in budget authority off that number, $8 billion in outlays, more or less right after we had given the President his full defense request to get within the mandated targets that we were seeking to achieve.

The second point: The new taxes proposed in this budget take $52 billion out of the economy over the next 3 years. That is what the Director says.

The $59 billion by which the President's budget exceeds the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit targets over the same years, $59 billion that it exceeds it, comes out of the private economy also in the form of Federal borrowing.

The difference is we reduce the burden of the debt and do so permanently, and we reduce interest payments by $7 billion, where they would be $7 billion a year higher under the President budget which Director Miller espouses in the letter that he sent.

In addition, Mr. Miller states that Senate Concurrent Resolution 120 cuts defense about $97 billion over the 3 years. I regret to say that, as I indicated when I started, there are at least two ways to express most things, and maybe more. But the Director clearly states that this resolution cuts defense and I interpret a "cut" to mean a cut. There is no cut in the defense budget. It is just not so.

Yes, we increase defense less than the President. That is a fair way to say it. But we would provide $8 billion more in defense budget authority than was appropriated for this current year, an $8 billion increase but not as much of an increase as requested.

Finally, the letter to my colleagues objects to our only terminating three domestic programs by way of our assumptions.

Well, let me enlighten the Senate a bit on that.

That is true. But it is not mentioned that these three programs account for $5 billion outlay savings, and even if we terminated the 10 additional programs assumed in last year's budget resolution, all 10 would have a grand total savings of $1.3 billion if they were all done and completed. We did five. If you did all of those in last year's resolution, it would be $1.3 billion.

I am of the opinion, and soon we will let the Senate vote on a couple of these issues, that both Houses of Congress, by rather compelling majorities, will make it clear, and have made it clear, that they do not want all of the 44 programs in that budget that the Director referred to yesterday terminated. I have indicated on numerous occasions I would vote for many of them. I will repeat again that I have voted more than once, to terminate many of these programs more than once.

While I personally do not think many of these programs are of national importance—and certainly from the economic standpoint it is hard to justify that many of them have significant economic benefits—nonetheless building a budget based on terminations that will not occur does not offer a realistic contribution to the deficit reductions.

To assume them all again in a budget that is sent up here to us is nothing more than repeating what has been tried before, and, in this Senator's opinion, will not happen. But, as I said, we will give this option a chance in the Senate shortly by providng Members an opportunity to vote on whether they would like to terminate all of those programs as we did last year before the oak tree event and that are in the President's budget this year. We will let the Senate vote on whether they would like to take all of those out of this budget and save a few billion dollars in the revenues we have suggested we need.

Finally, domestic spending is stated by the director to suffer hardly any restraint in this budget process and resolution.

I would remind the Senate that domestic spending will be substantially restrained under the committee's budget, declining from about 13.1 percent of GNP in the current year to about 11.7 percent by 1989.

So, once again, I believe the Director mischaracterizes the issue as raising taxes versus cutting spending. Our budget resolution has total outlays that are $4 billion less than the President's budget for fiscal year 1987, and $12 billion less over 3 years.

I would like to repeat that. The mix is different. But in terms of contributing to resolving the deficit problem, the resolution before the Senate has total outlays that are $4 billion less than the President's. Obviously, so that I am not guilty of mischaracterizing, we have less defense. That accounts for a substantial portion of the reduced expenditures of this Government.

Our higher tax revenues go not for higher spending but, rather, to reduce the deficit. There can be no doubt about that.

In conclusion, our greater reduction in total spending and deficit reduction constitutes the ultimate, as I see it, tax break for the American people.

I think one of the distinguished economists, Milton Friedman, pointed out that the true level of taxation is the level of spending. Your only choice is whether to pay now in taxes or pay later in inflation. A so-called hidden tax.

My own observation, interpreting Milton Friedman, is that there is still no free lunch to buy increased defense and domestic spending without paying for it. We believe that we have provided a balanced approach and we believe that the facts bear us out.

Mr. President, so that all my colleagues will have the letter in the RECORD that I sent to them under the signature of my distinguished friend from Florida, the ranking Democrat—Mr. CHILES—and myself, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD in toto.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET,
Washington, DC, April 23, 1986.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: Director Miller of the Office of Management and Budget sent a letter to you yesterday outlining the Administration's objections to S. Con. Res. 120, the fiscal year 1987 Budget Resolution. This letter responds to three specific issues raised in the Director's letter.

First, the Director contends that the President's fiscal year 1987 budget met the challenges of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act. Quite the contrary. The President's budget did not meet the deficit targets specified in that legislation. The Congressional Budget Office estimated that the President's budget would produce a deficit of $160 billion.

That $16 billion excess would produce a sequester that would cut domestic outlays $8 billion on top of the $28 billion cut proposed by the President. To reduce defense outlays by a comparable $8 billion would mean sequestering BA by $20 billion. This belies the Director's second contention, that we could follow the President and achieve the target without cutting defense, without raising taxes, and with only "careful pruning" of domestic programs.

Next, the Director objects that the new taxes we propose would "take $52 billion out of the economy over the next three years." The $59 billion by which the President's budget exceeds the G-R-H deficits targets over those same years also comes out of the private economy, in the form of federal borrowing. The difference is we reduce the burden of debt; interest payments in the President's budget are $7 billion higher.

The Director complains we "cut defense budget authority by $97 billion over the years." That is not so; we increase less than the President wanted by that amount. We would provide $8 billion more defense BA than was appropriated last year, protecting the real value of the investment base which has doubled over the last five years.

Finally, the Director objects to our only terminating three domestic programs. He does not mention the fact that these three programs account for over $5.0 billion in savings, and even if we terminated the 10 additional programs assumed in last year's budget resolution a grand sum of $1.3 billion additional savings would be achieved.

The votes from both parties in both Houses of Congress have made it clear that the American people do not want all the 44 programs in the President's budget terminated. Building a budget based on terminations that will not occur does not offer a realistic contribution to deficit reduction. Domestic spending will be substantially restrained under our Committee's Budget Resolution, declining from 13.1 percent of GNP in the current year to 11.7 percent of GNP by 1989.

The Director mis-characterizes the issue as raising taxes versus cutting spending. Our Budget Resolution has total outlays that are $4 billion less than the President's budget in fiscal year 1987 and $12 billion less over 3 years. Our higher tax revenues go not for higher spending but to reduce the deficit.

Our greater reduction in total spending commitment and deficit reduction constitutes the ultimate tax break for the American people. As Milton Friedman has pointed out, the true level of taxation is the level of spending; your only choice is whether to pay now in taxes or later in inflation, "the hidden tax." There is still no free lunch to buy increased defense and domestic spending without increased taxes. We believe that we have provided a balanced approach to reduce the deficit and we believe the facts bear us out.

Sincerely,

PETE DOMENICI,
LAWTON CHILES.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from New Mexico is recognized.

AMENDMENT NO. 1797

(Purpose: To provide for the termination or substantial reduction of 43 domestic programs)

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I send to the desk in behalf of myself and Senator CHILES an amendment to the pending matter and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. DOMENICI], for himself and Mr. CHILES, proposes an amendment numbered 1797.

Mr. DOMENICI. I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of the resolution, insert the following new section:

SEC. 4. Termination and reduction of programs.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, it has been very difficult to get any firm proposals to modify significantly the budget reported out by the Budget Committee to this point. Obviously, as I have indicated on two or three previous occasions, there are a number of Senators who do not like this resolution. Clearly, yesterday, the Director of OMB, Mr. Miller, indicated the administration's objection to it. A number of Senators have suggested that they do not like the revenue side, that we have to raise taxes. A number have indicated that defense is not high enough. And, yes, I have heard from many that we ought to cut more on the domestic side. Yet I see no one coming to the floor with budgets to change substantially the pending resolution. More specifically, I have heard from a number of Members that we ought to cut more so we do not have to increase revenues in this first year, the $18.7 billion prescribed by this resolution.

Now, I cannot accommodate by way of a vote those who have found a variety of concerns and objections with this budget. But today with this amendment I seek to accommodate those who say we should cut more on the domestic side, and let me even be more specific. There are a number of Senators who have said we ought to terminate the domestic programs that the President has asked us to terminate, and indeed some have even said let us terminate those and any programs that we voted to terminate last year at 3 a.m. in the morning.

Now, some who speak of that clearly understand the budgetary impact. Yet others are not as certain just how much the budgetary impact of such a suggestion is.

I have tried my best to respond on two levels. One, there is no disposition by a majority of U.S. Senators, Republican or Republican and Democrat, to terminate those programs. Second, we already proposed terminating three of those programs which would save more money in the first year than will be saved by terminating all of the 43 that we are going to now talk about.

That is correct. The three that were terminated by the assumptions in the budget will save $5 billion in outlays, the WIN program, general revenue sharing, and Conrail. Incidentally, I mention Conrail because it is also mentioned by the OMB Director. It was assumed last year and did not occur. It is in the President's budget and it is in the list that the OMB Director alluded to yesterday in his analysis of the budget before us—saying that those programs have not been terminated and should be. So we have included them.

Now, let me start from the bottom end up so that everyone will know the significance of this amendment. It has 43 programs of our national Government, some very, very small indeed, some medium size, and very few that are major programs in terms of dollar expenditures. But this amendment does contain 43 programs in number running from function 150, which is foreign assistance, all the way through this budget. And let me make sure that everyone knows what this amendment will accomplish if it is voted for by a majority of the United States Senate a couple hours from now.

In outlays, in the first year, if all of these programs in this amendment are terminated, $4.063 billion will be cut off the Federal deficit. I repeat, $4.063 billion. This amendment says if you want to do that, take $4.063 billion off the revenue increase so it is consistent with Gramm-Rudman-Hollings in terms of its budget neutrality.

For those who support the notion that 43 programs should be eliminated in this budget, they can reduce the taxes proposed in this resolution by $4.063 billion.

I remind Senators that clearly this has a differing effect over the 3 years, and I want to put all of that on the table. Over the 3 years, if you did all of this, you would save less than $20 billion.

Now, let me just read off some of the programs so everyone will know just what we are doing here. Let me start first with the Export-Import Bank direct loan program, function 150: $729 million in budget authority, $138 million in outlays.

But these are not savings. They are increases. The numbers that I just gave are right, $729 million in budget authority and $138 million in outlays. If you terminate that program the way the President proposed to do in February, you do not save any money. So the numbers are right, but that is what it costs you to terminate the Export-Import direct loan program. It costs you $729 million in budget authority and $138 million in outlays in fiscal year 1987. If it really is the desire of the Congress to terminate that $1.1 billion program, the Eximbank direct loan program, and replace it with a more expensive $1.8 billion loan program, those are the costs. I am not arguing that because it costs $624 million in the first 3 years you should not do it. It just happens that in this example those are the numbers according to the Congressional Budget Office.

Now let me move on. There is another item, the OPIC Insurance Program. Termination is recommended. If we do what the President requested for the Overseas Private Investment Corporation, that will cost $2 million—not $200 million, $2 million. And now we move over to function 250. There we have another termination, Advanced Communications Technology Satellite, $80 million, if you terminate it. Rural Electrification Administration subsidies, we save $284 million in fiscal year 1987 outlays, if you terminate it. Here is another program. Weatherization assistance saves $16 million in fiscal year 1987 outlays. Now, it is true I am not giving the 3 years numbers. I am not trying in any way to be deceptive. Over the 3 years, terminating weatherization would save $170 billion over 3 years. I am merely listing fiscal year 1987 outlay, saving to illustrate those programs which makeup the $4,063,000,000 outlays savings.

Let's look at another—the EPA sewage treatment grants. That is an interesting one. We would save $4 million in outlays in fiscal year 1987. Now, those savings grow overtime because the program takes a while to liquidate. But for those who think eliminating this program is the way to fix the 1987 budget, I am giving you the relevant amounts, $4 million in total fiscal year 1987 savings.

Here is another one, the Soil Conservation Program, with savings of $100 million in outlays. I hope Senators who favor termination understand the total savings involved in terminating the Soil Conservation Service, is about $100 million in outlays.

Landsat is another of the 43 terminations. Obviously, the President did not propose this for budget purposes because the budget savings are zero.

There is a program for coastal zone management and grants regarding the surrounding areas. Eliminating saves $36 million next year.

Then we have the Extension Service. That is 4-H, for those who are wondering. I think we have visited with the 4-H'ers. They have been here to visit us. I am sure all Senators greeted them cordially and listened to various activities that the 4-H sponsors. They have the nice green jackets with shamrocks. I even took one of those jackets to the President, from the 4-H'ers. The President proposed to nearly eliminate this program. That will save $188 million in fiscal year 1988.

Then we have Temporary Emergency Food Assistance Program. This

Senate is familiar with this program. We all know that we have not come to grips in our country with the strange phenomenon of the homeless. We understand the problem is very complicated. And I say that with the deepest concern. I do not have an answer, so I am not in any way suggesting that there is an easy way to deal with this problem. But we have provided some temporary food and shelter through existing programs. One of these programs, TEFAP, is proposed to be terminated, and that will save a total of $33 million in outlays in fiscal year 1987.

The interesting thing about all these numbers I have spoken of up to this point is that almost always we speak of billions in this body. I have not had one yet that I have mentioned that even totals a half billion. Oh, yes, the budget authority for export-import was $729 million; but, interestingly, that was not a saving but an added cost for getting rid of it.

Let's go on. Federal crop insurance that has been around, with everybody talking about trying to get rid of it. That saves $140 million in outlays next year.

I will go through more of these, because I think it is useful to get out into full view just what we are talking about.

Trade adjustment assistance to firms: That is also a program that we are always told we should get rid of. I voted for that termination a number of times; but we should know that it saves only $8 million.

U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration: I think that has been in several budgets. It would save $6 million.

The next one is a significant proposal: Postal subsidies. That would save $676 million. That is an interesting one because we cannot just charge our appropriations with doing that, without also requiring these preferred-rate mailers to pay more. Those institutions, predominantly charitable—the Salvation Army, Red Cross, and the like—get a postal subsidy in order to solicit and do their charitable work. Unless we modify the law, the Postal Service has no alternative but to charge these mailers more.

We have tried in the past to reform this subsidy and have made some headway. My recollection is that Congress has cut 40 percent from its previous level of expenditures. The fiscal year 1987 number for postal subsidies termination is the largest one so far on this list. So now we have $676 million, which begins to contribute to the $4 billion total for 44 program terminations.

Rural housing loans is another interesting one. If it is terminated as described, it will save $1 billion. This is the second year in a row that rural housing loans have been recommended for termination. In this current year, Farmers Home Administration is authorized to make $2 billion in loans, which will finance housing for about 50,000 rural families.

The proposals before us would give HUD the sole responsibility for new rural housing assistance and yet would cut the HUD program nearly in half.

Earlier this year 26 Senators wrote to me, as chairman of the Budget Committee about this program. It was a bipartisan group, headed by the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations that handles this area, Senator COCHRAN. The 26 Senators said: "We cut rural housing last year 40 percent, and that is it." They ought to know that that is not it, as for as the administration's budget is concerned. On this list, there is a total elimination and substitution of this program.

The Small Business Administration—the President's budget would save another $105 million in its business loan programs.

Now I will list some others without editorializing. I think Senators know how many times we voted on these. I will only state the program and the number, because I think some may be shocked at how little will be saved. Let us just go through them quickly.

Section 202 housing: $53 million; Amtrak, $562 million; Interstate Commerce Commission, $35 million; Washington Metro construction grants, $11 million; Maritime cargo preference, $100 million; Economic Development Administration, $5 million; Appalachia Regional Commission, $8 million.

UDAG: That is an interesting one. I said I would not speak about them, but we hear from a lot of people that we should get rid of that program. I voted to get rid of it a couple of times, but I think everyone should know that is only $20 million in total fiscal year 1987 savings.

Let's go on. Rental housing development, HODAG, $39 million; the housing program commonly known as 312 rehab loan fund, $29 million; eliminating the 108 loan program that will not save anything; Rural Development Program, $49 million; SBA disaster loan, $200 million; community services block grant, $214 million; impact aid part B, $86 million; library programs, $30 million; a number of very small higher education programs, $17 million; student incentive grants, $36 million; college housing loans, $13 million; Public Health Service professionals, $180 million; FEMA, supplemental food and shelter, $90 million; section 8 moderate rehabilitation, zero in outlays, $670 million in budget authority; rural housing grants, $13 million; Legal Services Corporation, $255 million; Justice grants, $97 million; and public debt reimbursement to the FRB, $20 million. The offset in subfunction 908 adds $163 million—but this is a technical matter.

Now, if I have read the list right, that amounts to the grand total of $4.063 billion in outlays.

This amendment is very simple. It says we will not have any of those programs anymore and we will save that amount on the budget, and then we will take a similar amount off the revenue increase prescribed and included in the pending budget for the Senate.

I obviously do not support this amendment. I hope that some of those who have said they would like to terminate programs and further cut domestic programs might come to the floor in the next 40 or 50 minutes and make the case. I am not going to deny that I could make the case as an individual Senator for a number of them. I do not believe under any circumstances I could make the case for all of them, nor would I vote for all of them. Those who think it is the domestic discretionary component of this budget that has run wild, I urge that they come down and support this very complete, and I believe, accurate amendment to the budget that is pending.

I would say there are a number of Senators who are truly seeking some compromises. There are a number who want more in defense. There are many who are genuinely concerned about ways to save money. This is in no way an indication of the Senator from New Mexico that I am not willing to sit down and work with them and look at it.

But, frankly, there are some who clearly say if they do not have it their way, whatever that way is, they want to defeat the budget resolution that is pending. There may even be some who are out mustering up the lobbying strength of the country to make sure the Domenici-Chiles Budget Committee resolution does not pass.

There are those who are saying that we ought to eliminate the programs that we tried to eliminate last year and that the President asked this year.

So I hope they support this amendment. Some Members have even been told the deficit is not that bad; the economy is improving so fast that the deficit might just disappear on its own accord. They are saying that we could make some new assumptions and scrub some new numbers and scrub some new economics and everything will work out in 2 or 3 months. For my part, I do not agree.

I want to wrap up my first half-hour this morning by saying first that I have entered into the record already what I believe to be a fair response to the Budget Director's letter. I think it fairly assesses the budget pending before the Senate. I think it also fairly characterizes the President's budget proposal.

Second, for those who would like to avoid the pressure of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings trigger August 15, or thereabouts, either by wishing the deficit away or by hoping that the Supreme Court finds the GAO involvement unconstitutional, I hope they will read the RECORD. I think they can read a very enlightened Third Circuit Court opinion exactly opposite from the Scalia three-member court that ruled it unconstitutional. And perhaps there are some who, looking at that, would say it really is not worth gambling that we will not have to meet the commitment we made to the American people at the end of last year. In fact, there is a better than 50-50 chance that the GAO will be found constitutional next June or July, and we will have another sequester.

With those two premises we now have an amendment before us that will indeed reduce the taxes by $4 billion and will reduce what for the most part is discretionary spending by this amendment.

I yield the floor.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I want to briefly comment on the "Dear Colleague" letter Chairman DOMENICI and I sent out today in response to Director Miller's letter of yesterday outlining the administration objections to the resolution reported by the Senate Budget Committee.

The President's budget exceeds this year's deficit target by $16 billion. It would produce a sequester cutting domestic outlays $8 billion on top of the $28 billion already cut by the President. It would reduce defense outlays, sequestering VA by $20 billion. So that certainly differs from the contention made by the Director.

The Director objects to the new deficit-reduction revenues proposed to be taken out of the economy totaling $52 billion over the next 3 years. Yet, the President's $59 billion excess over the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings target also has to come out of the economy. But, in that instance, it comes out by borrowing. That, of course, will add to the pressure on the national debt. That burden of debt in the President's budget is some $7 billion higher than the payments would be under the proposal contained in the budget reduction before us.

The Director has said he is not cooking his figures; he says he is simply correcting the estimates. I do not know what the difference is between cooking and correcting. But I think some corrections are always made by an OMB Director in every administration I have seen over the years. It seems to me that Mr. Miller likes to correct just as much as any of them do.

I trust we will compare those figures to the Congressional Budget Office figures. At least they do not have an ax to grind or a cooked cake to eat as some of the Directors do.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to speak just for a few moments on the amendment that we have before us.

I think, it can be characterized as a good-will amendment. Although the Senate has had some trouble getting the White House to listen to us, we want to make it clear that the Senate is listening to the White House. The White House has said they want 44 programs terminated, wiped out right now, given the ax. They believe that is the only way to get the deficit down to this year's goal. So that is exactly what this amendment does.

For the purpose of identification, I think we could call it the "Son of Stockman, James E. Miller Memorial Amendment." We certainly offer it in the spirit of goodwill. It is set forth in a spirit of quick response to the Director's letter of yesterday which said if we simply terminated some of these programs we would get the budget much more into balance.

So, we sponsor this good will amendment to cut these 44 programs targeted by the administration. It is like the Colt 44. It was a great harbinger of law and order in the early days. This 44 would be the harbinger of returned good times—so the administration says—and so we sponsor it in that spirit.

The $4 billion it will reduce this year in taxes, as the chairman has pointed out, is somewhat less than the $5.4 billion we are proposing to be reduced by simply cutting three programs. And yet, it is a figure no one can say lacks significance. It will not keep us from having a sequester. We would still have that. It does not keep us from returning next year and the next year and the next looking for additional programs to cut. We would certainly have to do that. But it does give those Members who have been saying the budget resolution has too much in the way of taxes; too little in the way of spending cuts, and no room for increases in defense—it certainly gives them the ability to put their votes where their comments have been.

It does not mean we will not be back here next year if we do not have some revenues in. I think we will. It does not mean that we will not be looking for other things to terminate. But let us see what is on this year's card.

We have looked at some programs like the Eximbank. The chairman has discussed rural electrification, and EPA sewer treatment grants. Those are certainly programs with constituencies. They are not programs the Senator from Florida feels are meaningless—and, of course, I intend to vote against the amendment. But in programs like soil conservation, I guess the administration believes their time has come and they should be done away with.

The distinguished Senator from Mississippi is standing. He does such a good job as the chairman of the Agriculture Subcommittee of Appropriations. He is always under pressure to determine where we get the dollars for those programs. I am not sure he would want those dollars to come from soil conservation or REA. But we do not to find out what the body wants us to do in this regard. And I think the amendment would give us that choice.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHILES. I am happy to yield to the Senator.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I was reading a legislative notice that is on our desks on this side of the aisle describing amendments that will be offered or may be offered to the resolution. One is Chiles-Hart amendment to increase funding for science and technology resource development and education and training.

The increases in these areas are $4 and $3 billion. I wonder whether or not it is consistent to offer an amendment, such as the one at the desk, which would target for elimination 44 programs, as the Senator says, and at the same time be sponsoring another amendment to add funds for these same programs. I wonder whether or not the Senate should be on notice that this is an amendment at the desk that is not expected to pass and the Senator is not going to even vote for it. Should we really waste the time of the Senate to discuss the merits of it if it really has no merits, even in the view of the proponent of the amendment?

Mr. CHILES. Well, I would just say to my good friend from Mississippi, I exercise my prerogative as a Senator to not be troubled too much by consistency. I think the Senator from Mississippi perhaps exercises that sometimes as well.

But I also say to him we feel we should allow the Senate to have some choices. We have been told that the administration feels this is a simple way to solve the deficit dilemma we are in. One of those ways is get rid of a number of these agencies. The Senate ought to pass judgment on that.

We are also told there are not the votes around here for any plan. If there are not, maybe we need to find out: Is it a plan like this that will give us the votes? If it is, maybe we will end up saving some time.

The Senator from Florida happens to think, in agricultural terms, seed corn is very important. That is one reason I sponsored the amendment with Senator HART. I think some of the programs like research and development, trade assistance, and some of the job training and education, are seed corn. Planning ahead is something we have always considered important. Even in an austere budget time, we better be thinking about our next crop and whether we can lay it in.

But I think the Senator from Mississippi is one of those who has signed a letter saying he thinks there is too much revenue in this resolution. There are not enough domestic cuts in this resolution and too little for defense. If that is the way the Senate feels, we need to find out.

Maybe we have been too arbitrary in our budget. Maybe we have shut some people off. So this is an opportunity for some Members of the Senate who have made those statements—and I do not know what the Senator's particular concern is on all of these programs or whether he is ready to get rid of all of them—to have their say. It is time to find out. Is there a majority here that wants to get rid of 44 programs? If so, we will pick up $4 billion off the taxes. We can take it off this resolution. If there is not, we will know that also, and we will be able to go on to something else. We have other amendments, as the Senator knows, on that list that add money. We will have to determine whether those are amendments we can afford or not.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CHILES. I am happy to yield.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I am one of those who worries about our bargaining position with the House of Representatives. I might say to the Senator that that is one reason why I did join with Senator QUAYLE and others in signing a letter to the majority leader expressing concern about this budget resolution.

If we were coming out at the conclusion of the process with an end product like the one that is on the floor now, the resolution as reported by the Senate committee, I do not think Senators would fuss too much about it. I think we would see a consensus develop around a budget of that kind. That is my personal opinion.

But beginning the process with this resolution, knowing that the House is going to probably add money on the domestic spending side—and I do not know what it will do to the revenue side—I just do not think it puts us in a good bargaining position.

I do not quarrel with the quality of the work of the Budget Committee. But I wonder whether or not we are going to really serve any useful purpose with an amendment of the kind that is before us now for a vote.

I do not know how I am going to vote on it. I have not really looked at all the programs the Senator has identified. Maybe it is a good test vote to let us see where the Senators are on the thing.

But let me ask the Senator this: Is the Senator not worried that the House is really not participating in this process? It seems to me that they have just decided to abrogate, really, the responsibilities that I thought they were to share with the Senate—to work out a congressional budget resolution. They are just sitting on their hands doing nothing, saying nothing, hearing nothing, and seeing nothing. I worry about that.

I wonder if the Senator shares my concern about that and what the outlook is if we go through this exercise and vote on all of the amendments, and vote on the resolution. Are they going to continue to sit there and do nothing?

Mr. CHILES. Let me say to my good friend from Mississippi first, I appreciate the remarks that he thinks the budget we crafted is not a bad budget if it is the final product. I tend to believe that way myself, even though it is not everything I want. It is not the one the Senator from New Mexico, the chairman, would put in. But it represents a meeting of the minds of the majority of Republicans and Democrats on our committee.

The Senator is pondering whether our bargaining position is correct. That is a very legitimate question. The Senator may be right on that. I would tell him that there have been times before when the Senator from New Mexico and the Senator from Florida have agreed, and there has been a meeting of the minds. We have stood on our bargaining position with, for example, the defense number going to budget conference with the House, and we have locked it.

We have said we have already gone through the process of high-low and put it together here. We are not going to move off that.

That is the way I view this budget. It is not one I think is the starting position. But as the Senator from Mississippi knows, there is another bargain that must take place. That is with the White House. It is a bargain that skews things in another way. He has asked whether the House has shirked the process or whether there is a dereliction of duty.

There is an old saying that you never know until you put on the other Indian's moccasins. Then you know exactly what he is thinking about. But I can say to my friend from Mississippi, the House is very leery if any plan has revenue in it.

The President has said, "Make my day. I am going to unlimber the veto." The House feels they have been hammered with that before. They take the position that there is no way you can get down to 144 without there being some revenue. They are not going to be the initiator. But they have said, again in a meeting we had recently, if the Senate initiated revenues with the preponderence of votes of the Republican-controlled Senate, if there was some bipartisan spirit over here, they would back off the Speaker's earlier position that the President had to ask for revenues or they would not go with it. Now the House has stepped back from that.

I am glad. I think it is the responsibility of the Congress. If the Senator is asking if I am worried about their position, yes, I am worried. I am worried that I do not think the administration is as involved as it should be. I heard the Senator's statement earlier today that they proposed their budget. They have. This is part of the thing that is in their budget. We are responding to it. Still I am worried about their involvement. I am worried there are not enough people in here who are concerned. So yes, I worry about all of those things. But I am still an optimist.

Mr. DOMENICI. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHILES. Yes.

Mr. DOMENICI. Might I say to my friend from Mississippi first I do want him to know that I did mention the distinguished Senator from Mississippi in my remarks only in one respect. Then I would like to answer some of the concerns he has expressed. But I did say that the Senator had helped us last year to reduce one of the things that he is very concerned about—rural housing. That program would have been reduced 40 percent in last year's budget. The Senator from Mississippi went to the trouble, which I thank him for, of soliciting bipartisan signatures on the letters to me as I marked up saying that the Senator thought we should not terminate the program but we could achieve significant savings. Nonetheless, the administration now proposed to terminate this program.

So I have listed it and talked about what would happen to the program if it is terminated as prescribed.

I did that because on almost all of these programs there is someone who has a very good feeling for why it should not be terminated, and why it still is needed.

But, I say to the Senator, in terms of why I offered this amendment, I do not think it necessary to offer it to make the point that the Senator from Mississippi already knows. The Senator worked on these matters as an appropriator. I do not believe the Senator from Mississippi assumes that three programs including the elimination of rural housing is going to amount to a huge amount of dollars in our trillion-dollar budget.

I think the Senator knows that EDA annually does not cost very much money. But, Senator, I am having a very difficult time making the point when people say to me as chairman, "You have eliminated only three programs, and, those programs amount to $5 billion in outlays out of a total of $9 billion that would be the result of terminatory 43 in total.

I am having a very difficult time in making people understand that all of these equal programs only $4 billion the first year in total savings in a deficit reduction package that is many times that in size. And if we want to increase defense, we have to even add some more to the reduction side.

I offer this amendment so that we will now once and for all, for all concerned, see what they are, how much we save, and for those who continue to say this is the way to solve the fiscal dilemma of this Nation they can see what it does but equally what it does not do.

I acknowledge that there are many who think this kind of program elimination in addition to the budgetary and fiscal impact has some other kind of overtones to it.

I respect that. There are some who claim it is philosophical, and that many of these are not the Government's role. The Senator from Mississippi knows me well enough. I voted to eliminate a lot of these programs. I do not even vote to eliminate some of them on color of philosophical notion. I vote to eliminate some of them because I do not think they do enough in comparison to the damage that the deficit is doing.

I adopt a philosophy which asks if we can afford these programs in today's environment as compared to 20 years ago when Congress enacted the—like EDA, and others.

I go to this great length because I have great respect for the Senator from Mississippi and for what he thinks about this amendment in terms of what I have just described. He is the chairman of the subcommittee, and has a very responsible role.

It just seems to me that in the next 1½ hours or so I have that Members will come to the floor as the Senator from Mississippi did, to discuss their views. Do Members really all understand that we terminate these programs and we get $4 billion in savings? Or maybe some will say, we do not support this amendment, but we would like to negotiate a little. But we do have to realize that this is not the way and increase defense and achieve all of our other objectives.

So I think it illustrates a point to my friend, the distinguished Senator from Mississippi, that I have been unable to make to many of my friends in the Senate. We must look beyond this kind of approach if we are to increase defense, hold down revenues and meet our budget goals. I hope nobody assumes it is improper for me to call this to their attention in this way. But I have been searching for a way to get some action and movement on some proposals.

I do not want the record to have any doubt about it, I am not going to vote for this. As I indicated, I voted for maybe 50 percent of them once or twice. So did my good friend from Mississippi, who incidentally, asked the questions on the proper interpretation of a vote for this amendment.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. CHILES. The Senator from Mississippi has said that he believes this would enhance our bargaining position with the House. If this amendment carried, I would say to my friend from Mississippi, we would have an enhanced bargaining position. I do not think there is any doubt about that. I think when you include things like the Export-Import Bank, Rural Electrification Administration subsidies, the EPA sewer treatment grants, soil conservation programs, the Ag extension service, the Federal Crop Insurance Program, postal subsidies, rural housing, the SBA Budget Authority, section 202 housing for the elderly and handicapped, with Amtrak, all of those programs certainly have a constituency on the House side. If we look at UDAG, EDA, the Rural Development Programs, SBA disaster loans, community service block grants, the Library Program, FEMA Supplemental Food and Housing Program, all of those trigger some determined constituencies over there.

I guess, as the chairman has said, these are some decisions that have to be made. If our budget proposal is not good enough, at some stage we need to find out what we can do.

I think the chairman and I feel that maybe if everybody had to go through this process and spend as much time on it as we have, they would end up somewhere near where we are. That is exactly what happened to us. It was not my personal choice to come out with the proposition we have. I do not want to have to vote for any new taxes myself. I would like to have a higher number for defense. I would like to not even cut some of the programs and not have to resist some of the amendments we will have to resist. But, to get the deficit down to $144 billion, to fashion something we thought would have some chance of passing, is how we arrived at this number.

The process we are in now is to find out where there are 51 votes in this body for a budget. That is what we are up against.

So, Mr. President, we think this is a proposition that will allow the Senate to express itself. It will have the chance to express itself on these cuts. For that reason, I think it is a "good will" amendment that gives the Senate the opportunity to make that choice.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On whose time?

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time be charged equally to both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I have just come to the floor, and I understand that an amendment is now pending, which has been offered by the distinguished chairman and the distinguished ranking minority member of the committee, the effect of which will terminate a number of programs. I have not had a chance to discuss the substance of the amendment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will withhold, who yields time?

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. How much time does the Senator need?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. An hour. I might not use it all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I move that the resolution be recommitted to the committee. I do so simply to gain the opportunity to speak on this matter. It is my understanding that by doing so I gain the opportunity to speak for 1 hour. It is my intention, in fact, to speak for about 2 minutes; and at the proper time I will move to vacate my own motion.

Mr. President, I understand that the business pending before the Senate is the Domenici-Chiles motion, the effect of which is to terminate a number of programs. I have not had the opportunity to discuss this with the two managers, but I am led to believe, by staff and others who have consulted them, that they do not offer this with the serious intent that it be adopted, but merely to embarrass a number of Senators and put them on record—a sort of tongue-in-cheek kind of amendment.

It has been the opinion of some Senators that it is impossible to make any cost savings, that it is impossible to come to grips with these program terminations. The President has sent us, I guess, all these 43 proposed changes, and what the managers are evidently seeking to accomplish here is to just prove how preposterous and ludicrous it is to think that these suggestions by the President could actually be acted upon by the Senate; and I suppose the expectation is that it is going to get a very small vote.

I came here today to say that while I would be perfectly comfortable to vote for these, separately or individually, and I may do so, I hope that most Senators, especially those who are running for office this year, will see through this, that it is an intention to embarrass them, without an intent to enact these changes.

I would be proud to come to the floor and try to make some savings. But this kind of tactic I find quite disagreeable. So I think that, under the circumstances, the Domenici-Chiles proposal deserves to be defeated; and in due course I think the budget resolution in its present form should be defeated.

It appears to me that this is a proposition which is better handled by defeating the budget resolution and then having the committee go back to work.

So, Mr. President, I just wanted to set the record straight. If, at some time, Senators want to come forward with a serious proposal to do something, I will be the first to support it. In fact, if this particular measure is put to a rollcall vote—and I hope it is not—I probably will vote for it.

In fact, I intend to because I think, while I have not looked at the list of 43, I am probably in favor of every one of those terminations, and if truth be known, I could come up and be comfortable with a list of 43 more that are not on there.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I better not, I say to the Senator, because he is such a skillful person in moments like this that I am not sure I want to entrust my fate to his tender mercies now. May I ask of the Senator before I decide to yield, does he seek me to yield for friendly purposes or otherwise?

Mr. JOHNSTON. A gentle and friendly question.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. In that case, I am pleased to yield to my friend from Louisiana.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, first I agree with my distinguished friend from Colorado, that this amendment is somewhere between a "make a point amendment" and a "tongue in cheek."

Just how would the Senator characterize OMB Director Jim Miller's letter to Robert Dole of April 21 in which he said, "The answer to the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings challenge is not to increase taxes or lessen our defense capability; it is to cut inefficiency and ineffective domestic programs?"

Does the Senator not also put that letter in the same category as this amendment, that is defying the laws of arithmetic, as Dave Stockman is wont to say?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I do know much, but I learned a long time ago not to hang around here defending OMB. If there is one thing that is absolutely guaranteed to lead to disaster it is trying to defend the OMB. I have not even had a chance to read David Stockman's book yet, though in due course I intend to do so.

I say to the Senator, I have not read the letter. I do not want to dispute his characterization of it.

The practical fact is this, let me say to my good friend from Louisiana, and I do not want to overemphasize it, but I do not think we ought to lose sight of it either: This budget resolution we have before us does not cut anything, only really a handful of small reductions, a handful of places; we restrained slightly the growth of Federal spending. We are in the sixth year of an administration, the most conservative President in our lifetime or probably should ever see. The Senate is under the control of a bipartisan conservative majority, generally conservative Members in both parties. In fact, there are darn few Members of the Senate in either party who would willingly be identified in public as big spending liberals. And yet the fact of the matter is we have runaway Federal spending—rising every year. We have taken no serious sustained effort to make any cuts. The best we have done in a few cases is to slow and only by a little, the rate of increase in these programs.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Yes. But let me list some programs we have not done anything about. UDAG, one of the most costly, outmoded, overblown programs we have ever had, the termination of which is endorsed not only by those of us opposed in the first place, but those who were initial sponsors and backers; Amtrak, which has cost so far $12 or $14 billion, generally agreed I think by most thoughtful people privately that it is going to go out of existence—the only real question is how much longer it is going to be on the Federal dole before it does go out of existence—and I guess 40 or 42 more.

We really have not done anything about those. It just seems to me that we ought to treat it more seriously than to offer an amendment of this kind.

So, that is my only point.

I am pleased to yield.

Before I do, Mr. President, I withdraw the motion which I offered, which, as I explained at the outset, was only for the purpose of gaining recognition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is considered withdrawn.

The Senator from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, if my friend from Colorado would stay, I often find myself to be in agreement with him and yet I must respectfully disagree.

The effort that is being made here by the chairman of the Budget Committee and the ranking minority member of the Budget Committee is to join in the debate. The effort is not being made to embarrass any Senators.

It is my understanding that Chairman DOMENICI and Senator CHILES have been waiting here very patiently. They have called upon Senator JOHNSTON and me to replace them because they have been here so long and had to attend to other business. They have been waiting very patiently for people to come and suggest alternatives and perhaps my friend——

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. I ask my friend from Colorado the same question: Is this a friendly question he is going to ask or is this——

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, in response I say it is a question friendly to him but not to the sponsors of the amendment or the amendment itself.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. I certainly yield to my friend from Colorado.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, the question is, Is it the understanding of the Senator from Minnesota that neither of the sponsors of the amendment intend to vote for it?

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. I have only spoken to the staff about this and let me speak only for my chairman. It is my understanding that he will not, but that he is very desirous of joining the debate and having Senators come down here with amendments, having Senators who are critical of the budget as passed by the committee come down and offer substitutes for it, so that we can proceed.

In the alternative, we sit and watch the clock tick away and arrive at the conclusion by coming to the end.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, if I am told——

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Pardon me. I believe I have the floor. Does the Senator from Colorado want to ask a question?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. No, Mr. President. I just wanted to draw a final conclusion and then go have lunch.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. I want to respond to the Senator's statements about whether or not we have been able to slow the budget.

As I look at the outlays for 1985, they were $946 billion; they are estimated, in 1986, to be $979 billion; in 1987, under the budget that we have passed in committee, $994 billion. That is less than a 2-percent increase.

From 1985 to 1986, the increase is approximately 3 percent; from 1986 to 1987 it is 2 percent, less than 2 percent. Once again, it is a little less than 3 percent from 1987 to 1988.

I respectfully tell my friend from Colorado that political realities are such that that is a pretty good result. If we can keep Government spending rising at 2 or 3 percent for a few years, we certainly will conform with Gramm-Rudman, and that since Government revenues have risen in the last 30 years at the rate of about 9.5 percent, if we can keep spending down to 2 or 3 percent, we are going to be OK and we are going to conform to the goals of Gramm-Rudman.

With that I yield to my colleague from Colorado for a comment.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, first with respect to the amendment itself, if it is correct that neither of the two sponsors intend to vote for it, I rest my case on the merits of the amendment.

Second, with respect to whether or not we are doing a good job, I appreciate the reassurance of my friend from Minnesota. I do not share his conclusion. I think we are doing a miserable job. I think it is a disgrace for this body to treat so lightly the economic future of this country and, more than that, I must say that it has now reached a point where I think it is more than just an economic issue. I think it is a fundamental question of the integrity of the lawmaking process to let deficits of this size go on year after year.

Now, it is my observation that most people out in the country who have thought about it think that Congress is populated by a bunch of gutless wonders, and in general I think that perception is correct. There are certainly some honorable exceptions, in fact I guess I would have to say there are many honorable exceptions, but Congress is a body which is uniquely a reversed synergism. Somehow a group of thoughtful, well-informed, well-intentioned men and women come from all over the country and collectively they proceed to do something which they would not any one of them in their individual capacity dream of doing.

I regret it very much. I have not come to the floor to bellyache about that but really only to complain of this pending amendment which I think is not only—well, I just think it is a sham, and I just wanted to say so. I am not one to be lacking in candor.

I do not think it changes anything whether this amendment is up or down or whether or not there is ever a vote on it, and I presume probably there is not any intention to vote on it. But what it emphasizes is that there is not any serious intent on the part of the managers to try to achieve these savings, and I regret that very much.

(Mr. ABDNOR assumed the Chair.)

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I hope that my friend would come down and offer some alternatives. This is once again an effort by the Budget Committee leadership to draw the attention of the Senate to the fact that the debate is certainly proceeding slowly, that time is elapsing, that we are going to drive it to 50 hours and there will be a vote on final passage and those who wish to amend or otherwise change or substitute for the package should come down here and do so. We certainly would welcome that.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I am delighted that the amendment has been offered and I am delighted to say I will be voting against it. I do not think that brands me as one not interested in bringing our deficit under control because, as the record clearly shows, this Senator has been on this floor time and time again for the last 3 or 4 years trying to put a freeze into effect to get our spending under control.

So I believe that if we can have a vote up or down on these issues then that will settle once and for all any suggestion that seems to crop up from time to time that we should refer this matter back to the Budget Committee.

I wish to associate myself with the remarks made by my able and distinguished friend from Minnesota. He was one of that courageous band of seven Republicans, joined by five Democrats, to report a budget out to the floor that took an awful lot of hard work and an awful lot of courage and an awful lot of give and take. Certainly not everything in that budget is agreeable to this Senator. But the way you work things out here is to kind of come up with some kind of reasonable consensus by reasonable people who take a reasonable approach and not one that jumps off the cliff.

I simply would recite once again for the record the excellent letter that came from the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee and the ranking member today that simply says domestic spending will be substantially restricted under the committee's budget resolution, declining from 13.1 percent of GNP in the current year to 11.7 percent of GNP for 1989. That is progress. And those who say that we have not taken action to reduce spending in the Budget Committee simply are not looking at the facts.

I would like to quote the next paragraph from that letter dated April 23 to all the Members of the Senate from the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Budget Committee. The next paragraph says, Mr. President:

> The Director mischaracterizes the issue as raising taxes versus cutting spending. Our budget resolution has total outlays that are $4 billion less than the President's budget in fiscal year 1987 and $12 billion less over a 3-year period. Our high tax revenues go not for higher spending but to reduce the deficit.

And I thought that that was what Gramm-Rudman-Hollings was all about. I would simply say that almost every time I mention Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, I want the record very clear that this Senator did not support that, although it had some parts that I liked. But on balance, Gramm-Rudman-Hollings is the wrong way to go about solving the difficult problems that face us, in the opinion of this Senator from Nebraska.

I simply say, Mr. President, that an awful lot of hard work has gone into the Budget Committee. Unless you serve on the Budget Committee and recognize the trauma that we went through over there, then I simply say that you do not fully understand and appreciate how good a budget we came out with; but, granted, it is a long way from perfect.

Since it is a long way from perfect, and since there are determined attempts by those who say it is easy to do this if you have the courage, I am delighted that we are going to have a chance to vote on this for a clear expression of the Members of the U.S. Senate.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I would point out to my friend from Nebraska that while I do not want to give too much credit to my colleagues on the other side, the Democrats, it was not five Democrats but six who voted for the budget resolution.

Mr. EXON. I am delighted to stand corrected.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. And seven Republicans among that group behind my name.

I do disagree with my friend from Nebraska about Gramm-Rudman. I suggest to him that if we did not have the drive and the constraints that were imposed upon us by Gramm-Rudman that we would be back to the business as usual and you would see spending climbing even at the normal rate. And I pointed out before the Senator came here, spending in the next 2 or 3 years is going to climb at somewhere between 2 and 3 percent each year. That is a fairly good restraint.

If you in your home or I in my home or we in our businesses—and both of us are among the few businessmen who are here in the Senate—if we could keep the overhead, the expenses, rising at 2 or 3 percent a year, we would be in pretty good shape in our businesses. And that is what Gramm-Rudman is forcing us to do. Because, in the event we do not do it, then, that scythe will just come and mow down a whole bunch of programs rather indiscriminately. And as long as the club exists, I think the Senate will act. And in the event it is not there and you rely upon the goodwill of the Senators from Nebraska and Minnesota and all the others who occupy this body, I am afraid we would not get it done.

So I think that Gramm-Rudman-Hollings was among really the premiere prices of legislation that I have had an opportunity to participate in since I arrived here, arriving on the same day that my friend and colleague from Nebraska did.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I appreciate the fine remarks made by my good colleagues from Minnesota. I still do not agree with him on Gramm-Rudman, but, as I said, it has helped somewhat in bringing the attention, perhaps, of the Senate to problem at hand.

The question is: What happens if all of our best efforts fail? We are already in violation of Gramm-Rudman, as the Senator from Minnesota knows full well, because Gramm-Rudman mandated that we have the budget reported out on April 15, 1986, not April 15, 1987.

So I am not certain that Gramm-Rudman is everything that it is hailed to be, but I do agree that it has brought at least attention of the matter to the U.S. Senate.

I would simply say that I think it has some serious constitutional flaws that are now being tested and I believe that we should have been here doing the work that we are doing right now, Gramm-Rudman-Hollings notwithstanding.

So I say that it may be that we are here late getting the budget out. That may be the fault of Gramm-Rudman. I think it is not. I think that if there is anything good about Gramm-Rudman, it at least forces some feet to the fire.

I would certainly agree with my friend from Minnesota that because of Gramm-Rudman, or in spite of it, the attention of the people of the United States have come to grips with the situation that confronts us and we have got to do something about this skyrocketing deficit and national debt.

I thought it was interesting the other night when I heard the former director of the Office of Management and Budget, Mr. David Stockman, say that he was astonished that the total national debt of the United States had doubled from $1 to $2 trillion in the 5 short years that we have had the Reagan administration.

And he conceded in this television interview that we are in terrible shape today, and we had been working on an economic malaise for the last 5 or 6 years that got us into the situation we have now.

So I suspect that Gramm-Rudman-Hollings and/or the continuing high deficits and the skyrocketing national debt are what brought us to the realization that we are going to have to do something.

So I think it was the actions of the current administration over the last 5 years and the faulted policies with regard to deficits and budgets that brought us to this and not necessarily Gramm-Rudman-Hollings in and of itself.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. I say to my good friend from Nebraska that the fact the Senate missed the April 15 date is not really debilitating. We miss those kinds of dates right along. But they are not compulsory. We begin to pick up the real tough dates only on August 15, and there will be a great penalty if we do nothing. But that penalty is not yet coming into play, and it will not for a while.

So the fact that we missed the April 15 date and are not in precise compliance with Gramm-Rudman in my judgment really does not make too much difference.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum and, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time on the quorum call be equally divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection. it is so ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I understand the distinguished Senator from Florida has a modification that he desires to offer to the pending amendment.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I send the modification to the desk.

The amendment was modified.

SENSE OF THE CONGRESS

SEC. 4. It is the sense of the Congress that $4,343,000,000 of the spending (outlay) reductions in fiscal year 1987 assumed in this concurrent resolution should be achieved through program terminations and significant program reductions, as proposed by the President's budget request for fiscal year 1987, affecting the following programs: Export-Import Bank direct loans; OPIC insurance programs; advanced communications technology satellite; Rural Electrification Administration subsidies; weatherization assistance programs; EPA sewage treatment grants; soil conservation programs; LANDSAT; sea grant and coastal zone management; Department of Agriculture extension service; temporary emergency food and shelter; Federal crop insurance program; trade adjustment assistance to firms; U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration; postal subsidy; rural housing loans; Small Business Administration; Section 202 housing; Amtrak; Interstate Commerce Commission; Washington Metro; Maritime Cargo Preferece Expansion; Appalachian Regional Commission; Economic Development Administration; Urban Development Action Grants; rental housing development grant (HODAG-RRG); Section 312 rehabilitation loan fund; Section 108 loan guarantee program; Rural development program; SBA disaster loans; Community service block grant; Impact aid (Part B); Library programs; Small higher education programs; State student incentive grants; College housing loans; Public health service (health profession subsidies); FEMA supplemental food and shelter; Section 8 moderate rehabilitation; Rural housing grants; Legal Services Corporation; Justice grants; Public debt reimbursement to Federal Reserve Banks.

SENSE OF THE CONGRESS

SEC. 4. TERMINATION AND REDUCTION OF PROGRAM.—It is sense of the Congress that $4,343,000,000 of the spending (outlay) reductions in fiscal year 1987 assumed in this concurrent resolution should be achieved through program terminations and significant program reductions in 43 areas, as proposed by the President's budget request for fiscal year 1987, affecting the following programs: Export-Import Bank direct loans; OPIC insurance programs; advanced communications technology satellite; Rural Electrification Administration subsidies; weatherization assistance programs; EPA sewage treatment grants; soil conservation programs; LANDSAT; sea grant and coastal zone management; Department of Agriculture extension service; temporary emergency food and shelter; Federal crop insurance program; trade adjustment assistance to firms; U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration; postal subsidy; rural housing loans; Small Business Administration; Section 202 housing; Amtrak; Interstate Commerce Commission; Washington Metro; Maritime Cargo Preference Expansion; Appalachian Regional Commission; Economic Development Administration; Urban Development Action Grants; rental housing development grants (HODAG-RRG); Section 312 rehabilitation loan fund; Section 108 loan guarantee program; Rural development program; SBA disaster loans; Community service block grant; Impact aid (Part B); Library programs; Small higher education programs; State student incentive grants; College housing loans; Public health service (health profession subsidies); FEMA supplemental food and shelter; Section 8 moderate rehabilitation; Rural housing grants; Legal Services Corporation; Justice grants; Public debt reimbursement to Federal Reserve Banks.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I have discussed the pending amendment with the leader's office. I am going to give the Senate a rough estimate that we shall not start the vote on this amendment for something like 25 or 30 minutes. As soon as I have word from the leader, then I shall inform the Senate that there are a few minutes left and we shall proceed to move the amendment toward a Senate vote.

If Senators are wondering what might happen after that, there are a number of Members who have indicated their intention to other amendments. We are trying to find a Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I yield myself whatever time is necessary off the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has that right.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the Chair. Let me continue that discussion.

Senators are wondering what will happen after the vote on the pending amendment. It is my hope that we can get an amendment, where the Members involved will agree to reduce the time limit to less than the 2 hours allowed. We would not take a full hour in opposition—so that we might have one additional vote before the 3:30 time the leader has set. This proposal might clearly change the leader's plans for the remainder of the day.

I will conclude by saying as I have for well over an hour, today that the propose of this amendment is to help us understand what the terminations the President has proposed mean in terms of fiscal policy, and the extent to which they will move us toward the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings mandatory target of $144 billion for 1987 and the outyears. This amendment does, in my opinion, serve a useful purpose. I repeat that I have been trying to get those who have amendments and have concrete ideas, either because they are partially or totally in opposition to the pending budget resolution, to offer them, to come to the floor and suggest them and seriously debate them.

ELIMINATE 44 FEDERAL PROGRAMS

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I rise today to oppose an amendment to the Senate budget resolution which would eliminate the 44 programs the President recommended for termination in his budget proposal.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a list of these programs appear at this point in the RECORD.

Let me mention just a few of the programs slated for elimination by this amendment. The General Revenue Sharing Program would be eliminated, despite the fact that this important means of Federal-local cooperation helps towns and cities in my State of Vermont provide essential services without raising already high property taxes.

The Work Incentive Program [WIN] would be canceled. Yet, WIN is the only Federal program with the specific charge of removing Americans from welfare rolls and placing them in jobs. WIN has been especially important in helping single parents on welfare find employment and a means of support for their children. Not only is WIN well-intentioned, but it works and it works in Vermont, where our WIN Program was rated first in the Nation.

Federal support for libraries would also end as a result of this amendment. I cannot think of a greater threat to an enlightened America or an informed electorate than ending support for libraries—very often the center of knowledge and information in rural communities.

Passage of this amendment would also mean the end of passenger rail service in Vermont. Since 1979, I have fought to maintain and strengthen Amtrak's Montrealer service to Vermont. This amendment would not only put an end to the Montrealer; it would eliminate Federal support for Amtrak.

These are just a few examples of the ill effects of the proposed amendment eliminating 44 Federal programs.

But, what is worse—what is more compelling—is the fact that canceling these programs would only save $4 billion. There is no doubt that $4 billion is a great deal of money, but there are far more sensible and less painless ways of raising those funds than cutting important programs wholesale.

Earlier this year, the General Accounting Office reported to me that more than $7.5 billion could be saved in the Pentagon budget simply by correcting incorrect inflation assumptions in major defense contracts. That is, GAO found $7.5 billion in padding and waste in defense contracts.

It is beyond me, how the administration could ask us to gut programs that help people—that help people in Vermont—to reduce the deficit by $4 billion, when almost twice that much can be saved by teaching Pentagon accountants to add.

For this reason, Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to defeat this amendment soundly.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROGRAMS TO BE TERMINATED

Work incentive program (WIN).
General revenue sharing.
Conrail.
Trade adjustment assistance to firms.
Appalachian Regional Commission.
Economic Development Administration.
Urban development action grants.
U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration.

Sea grant and coastal zone management grant programs.
Juvenile justice grants.
Justice State-local assistance grants.
Public debt reimbursements to Federal Reserve Banks.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, unless the distinguished Senator from Florida has something to say, I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask unanimous consent that it be charged equally to both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the clerk dispense with further reading of the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DOMENICI. Has all time expired on the amendment, as modified?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All the time has expired on the amendment, as modified.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico and the Senator from Florida. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], and the Senator from Florida [Mrs. HAWKINS], are necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARKIN] is necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARKIN] would vote "nay".

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PRESSLER). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 83, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 76 Leg.]

NOT VOTING—3

Goldwater	Harkin	Hawkins

So the amendment (No. 1797), as modified, was rejected.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHILES. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I understand that Senator ANDREWS has an amendment.

Mr. ANDREWS. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

AMENDMENT NO. 1798

(Purpose: To add additional funds for education programs and to offset the increased outlays with increased revenues)

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I have an amendment at the desk and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ANDREWS], for himself, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. WEICKER, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. DODD, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. PELL, Mr. MATHIAS, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. KERRY, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. SIMON, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Mr. FORD, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. BOREN, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. PRYOR, and Mr. BYRD proposes an amendment numbered 1798.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment reads as follows:

On page 2, increase the amount on line 3 by $300,000,000.

On page 2, increase the amount on line 4 by $1,100,000,000.

On page 44, increase the second amount on line 7 by $1,500,000,000.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from North Dakota yield?

Mr. ANDREWS. I am more than happy to yield to the distinguished Democratic leader.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator.

If I may direct my inquiry to the distinguished majority leader, I use this time to indicate to the distinguished majority leader that I would like to have given him a little notice but I did not know, in this instance, because I thought we ought to have the inquiry while we have pretty good attendance on the floor.

Could the distinguished majority leader indicate what the outlook is for the rest of the day with respect to rollcalls—and many of us already know that, as the majority leader has already told us—but, more importantly, what is the outlook for tomorrow as to rollcalls and with respect to Friday, and may I say especially with regard to Friday?

The distinguished majority leader has indicated, I believe, maybe for the RECORD, certainly with me, that we might be out Friday if we could charge some time off the budget resolution to compensate for the time we could be out. Would the majority leader be in a position now to elaborate?

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, in yielding to the distinguished Democratic leader, let me, before the majority leader responds, point out that it was my intention momentarily to ask unanimous consent—and I have the consent of Senator HOLLINGS, the principal sponsor on the Democratic side—that the vote on this amendment occur at 3:30, which is, as I understand it, by agreement, the moment that a vote should occur.

So I will propound that unanimous-consent request or I would ask the Democratic and Republican leaders to entertain that kind of unanimous-consent request.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the Senator.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, we will have this vote yet today on this bill, and we are going to recess at 4 o'clock by a previous unanimous-consent agreement. Tomorrow, we will come in at 10 o'clock and hope to be on the bill by 10:30 and hope to dispose of some other amendments. We have not reached any agreement on when we might complete voting on tomorrow.

But, if we can work out a substantial agreement on time on Friday, I think I have the consent of the managers to charge that off and not be in session on Friday.

Mr. BYRD. Will the distinguished majority leader and others, especially the managers of the resolution, perhaps put the request at this time or at least make a clear position known that on Friday the Senate will not be in session and that, say, 8 hours would be counted against the measure, which is probably more than would actually be consumed if the Senate were to be in session? Then all Senators would know there would be no session on Friday.

Mr. DOMENICI. Will the majority leader permit me to make an observation?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I think 10 hours might be more appropriate. I might say to the distinguished minority leader that actually we cannot get anymore to bring amendments down here. Senator ANDREWS has brought his up, but we have asked five other Senators who have amendments that we have known about if they could come in this afternoon, perhaps using less time than the distinguished Senator from North Dakota—Senator ANDREWS has what he considers to be a very important amendment—and we could not get anybody to do that. If we could get credit for 10 hours, people might begin to look at the fact that there are 8 or 10 or 12 amendments left and that maybe they should start offering them. So I would urge we take 10 hours off.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that once the Senate completes its business on Thursday, April 24, it stand in adjournment until 12 noon on Monday, April 28, and that 10 additional hours be considered as having been used on the budget resolution.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I have an inquiry. How much time will be remaining if this consent agreement is agreed to?

Mr. DOLE. Thirty-some hours. But let me get it from the Parliamentarian.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At present, there are 39 hours and 36 minutes remaining.

Mr. BUMPERS. Could the Parliamentarian give us some idea—or I guess the majority leader would have to do it—counting the time we anticipate staying in today and tomorrow, and adding the 10 hours on Friday, approximately how much time would be left on the bill?

Mr. DOLE. Twenty hours or more. It would be 1½ today, and that gets us down to 38, and tomorrow we might consume 6 or 8 hours. That is 30, and 10 is 20.

Mr. BUMPERS. I will defer to the minority leader on this, but I hope that in the request, instead of asking that 10 hours be charged against the bill on Friday, that we simply agree that starting at noon on Monday, if that is when we are going to come in, according to this request, that there be 20 hours remaining at that point.

Mr. METZENBAUM. At least.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Reserving the right to object, I am as anxious about Monday as some others are about Friday. Does this change the Monday schedule? I am not trying to ham up the agreement for Friday, but I do not want all of a sudden to find myself in the briar patch on Monday.

Mr. DOLE. On Monday, the agreement is there are no votes after 6. There will not be any votes after 6.

Mr. HOLLINGS. There could be votes before 6?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I thought we westerners had to come back before 6. Then, for the moment, Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator for yielding.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I am glad to yield to the Democratic leader.

Mr. President, I now propound my unanimous-consent request that the vote on this amendment occur at 3:30 p.m.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I believe it would be more appropriate or more acceptable to the Senator from New Mexico if you were to add to that, "and the time be equally divided."

Mr. ANDREWS. I would add to that, "and the time to be equally divided between Senators on the majority and minority side, to be controlled by myself and the Senator from South Carolina, Senator HOLLINGS."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, that is controlled by those in favor and those opposed, not the majority and minority.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, my apologies. I would suggest that the time be controlled by the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from New Mexico.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DOMENICI. Reserving the right to object. The Senator would not object to adding that "all provisions of the Budget Act regarding floor consideration of amendments shall remain in full force and effect"?

Mr. ANDREWS. That is right.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the distinguished Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I am pleased to offer an amendment for myself and Senators HOLLINGS, STAFFORD, LAUTENBERG, WEICKER, BRADLEY, D'AMATO, DODD, SPECTER, MOYNIHAN, PRESSLER, PELL, MATHIAS, MELCHER, DANFORTH, KERRY, MITCHELL, SIMON, MATSUNAGA, BURDICK, LEVIN, KENNEDY, LEAHY, SARBANES, ROCKEFELLER, FORD, METZENBAUM, INOUYE, BOREN, BINGAMAN, DURENBERGER, and Mr. ABDNOR and we seem to have additions coming in.

Let me point out that our amendment represents a concerted bipartisan effort to restore Federal funding for education programs under function 500. During my career in Congress, Mr. President, I repeatedly expressed my conviction——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. Will Senators suspend? Will all conversations in the rear of the room move into the cloakroom? The Senate will be in order.

The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. ANDREWS. I have repeatedly expressed my conviction, Mr. President, that some Federal programs are investments—investments for both individuals and nations as a whole, investments in our todays and all of our Nation's tomorrows.

Mr. President, the diminishing importance of education as an issue of national priority now threatens the ability of our public schools to continue to do the job that must be done to thoroughly and effectively educate our Nation's young people. The fact is the States simply cannot do this critically important job on their own. In my own State, times are tough. The Midwest must contend with an ailing farm economy, and in North Dakota there are problems with our oil industry as well. Add that to a high rate of unemployment, and it is a small wonder, Mr. President, that States' coffers are depleted. Despite the claims of economic health and stability, financial resources on which to draw the Federal dollar remains a necessary and a critical component for many States and public school systems.

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator from North Dakota yield for an announcement?

Mr. ANDREWS. I am happy to yield to the majority leader.

Mr. DOLE. I want to remind my colleagues. At 2:30 p.m. in S-207 Secretary Shultz will be there to talk about a wide range of topics including Libya, the economic summit, Saudi arms sales, and other things. He will be there at 2:30.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. ANDREWS. I appreciate the majority leader's pointing that out, and I yield to my colleague, my good friend and cosponsor of this legislation, the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I thank my distinguished colleague from North Dakota.

I ask unanimous consent to add as cosponsors Senators RIEGLE, BUMPERS, and PRYOR.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, in 1983, the National Commission on Excellence in Education, which was chartered by then Secretary of Education Bell in 1981, released a report titled "A Nation at Risk: The Imperative for Educational Reform." The report stated:

> If an unfriendly foreign power had attempted to impose on America the mediocre educational performance that exists today, we might well have viewed it as an act of war.

Since that time, claiming to support a strong education system has become the latest fad. Unfortunately, as with most fads, such support appears to be all flash, and little substance. The current administration has done nothing to combat this threat, and, in fact, has exacerbated the problem by refusing to commit to excellence in education.

Since the release of "A Nation at Risk," 10 other reports which censure our Nation's educational system have been released. While all these reports set forth different ways in which to reform the educational system, they all agree that the system is in dire need of such reform.

Incredibly enough, the response of the current administration to this plethora of demands to reform and strengthen the educational system has been to decrease the amount of available funding. Federal funding for education has increased in dollar amount, Mr. President, but, when adjusted for inflation, it has declined by about 16 percent since fiscal year 1980. Federal funds have also decreased as a percentage of the total national expenditure for education. Federal expenditures now represent 7 percent, or less, of the total spent on education. More to the point, education has dropped from 2.3 percent of the Federal budget in fiscal year 1980 to only 1.6 percent in fiscal year 1986.

What are the consequences of this declining commitment to education? Well, when a significant portion of the funds for specific programs comes from the Federal Government and that Federal assistance is substantially reduced, the results are devastating. For example, after the 1981 budget cuts, 700,000 students were dropped from the Chapter 1—compensatory education for the disadvantaged—Program—which now only serves 40 percent of those eligible, and nearly 3 million children were dropped from the School-Lunch Program. The results are particularly tragic in light of a national high school drop-out rate that has recently increased to 27 percent, and a child poverty rate that has escalated from 16 percent in 1979 to a current rate of 22 percent.

It is good common sense to utilize our Nation's most valuable asset—her people. Investment in the human infrastructure is the most cost-effective method for ensuring increased domestic prosperity, social welfare, and international leadership. Education is the fundamental source of our economic prosperity, our national security, and our sense of national community. The knowledge created and transmitted by educational institutions is the key to our economic and military strength in an increasingly competitive world.

Education is essential for maintaining our tradition of democracy and individual freedom. Thomas Jefferson eloquently stated the importance of education in a democracy when he said:

> I know no safe depository of the ultimate powers of the society but the people themselves; and if we think them not enlightened enough to exercise their control with a wholesome discretion, the remedy is not to take it from them but to inform their discretion.

We simply cannot afford to allow education to become the preserve of a privileged few. The United Negro College Fund has a slogan that states "A mind is a terrible thing to waste." We in the Senate have a responsibility to assure that no minds go to waste in this country. A real and tangible commitment to the expansion of the human mind is, perhaps, the single most important legacy we can bequeath our children.

In an effort to discharge this responsibility, Senator ANDREWS and I have put together an amendment which would add $1.2 billion in budget authority to the education portion of Senate Concurrent Resolution 120—the Domenici-Chiles budget resolution. As I have said many times before, we cannot increase the economic level of any until we increase the educational level of all. Specifically, our amendment provides for current services for all education programs. Current services equal the fiscal year 1986 appropriation—the presequestration amount—plus inflation, figured at 5.7 percent.

Because the budget resolution contains $400 million in increases for priority programs such as title 1, handicapped education, and Pell grants, the percentage increase for these programs in the Andrews-Hollings amendment is less than for other education programs. Similarly, because the budget resolution assumes a $100 million cut in the Chapter 2 Block Grant Program, the percentage increase for this program is more than for other education programs.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this amendment. The education challenge has not even begun to be met. Inadequate funding at this point would only serve to undermine the very foundations of our educational system in this country. I do not think that anyone wants to pay that price. So please give us your earnest here. This is a very serious amendment. It should not be opposed by the leaders of the bill. It frankly ought to be accepted in the context that we have shown the discipline—we have complied with Gramm-Rudman-Hollings—we provided for the revenues, and it is only a modest amount to try to help keep pace in the programs.

Our amendment adds funding to the first concurrent budget resolution for several important programs including title 1, handicapped education vocational and adult education, chapter 2 block grants, impact aid, Bilingual Education, and the Math and Science Program.

TITLE 1, AID TO DISADVANTAGED CHILDREN

Enacted in 1965 to provide financial assistance to school districts with concentrations of children from low-income families, its focus has been to provide compensatory educational programs that address the special needs of educationally deprived children—primarily for instructional services in reading, math and language arts. The national assessment of education progress data show that the reading scores of disadvantaged students rose dramatically between 1970 and 1984, and these gains are largely attributable to title 1. The shortcoming of the program is, while it serves about 4.8 million children, it is available to less than half of the students who are eligible for its valuable service. And, adjusting for inflation, the estimated constant dollar funding level for title 1 has fallen by 24 percent between fiscal year 1980 and fiscal year 1986.

The Andrews-Hollings amendment will provide an additional $219 million for title 1 and restore 328,000 students to the program over the amount in Domenici-Chiles.

HANDICAPPED EDUCATION

The Education of the Handicapped Act was established for the purpose of awarding grants to States to assist them in providing a free and appropriate education to all handicapped children. This program represents the basic vehicle through which the Federal Government maintains a partnership with the States and localities to end the educational neglect of handicapped children. Although Federal appropriations for this program have increased steadily since 1975, the Federal share of the excess costs peaked at 12.5 percent in 1979 and currently represents 9 percent, well below the authorized level of 40 percent.

State and local districts simply cannot afford the extra financial burden of carrying out the congressional mandate of providing free public education in as normal a setting as possible for every handicapped child. We must live up to our obligation and provide the funding necessary to assist the state in this important endeavor. Our amendment would provide an additional $83 million for handicapped education over the level provided in the budget resolution. An increase in funding for the Education of the Handicapped Program would result in an increase in the overall Federal contribution for the excess costs of educating a handicapped child.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

Vocational education programs provide education, training, and basic instruction needed by persons to successfully compete and advance in the labor market. Vocational education bridges schools and the workplace and provides alternative learning for thousands of youths, who without such an option, would become dropouts from school.

Since 1980 enrollments in vocational education have risen from 16.8 million to 19.5 million secondary, post-secondary and adult students. Despite this significant increase in enrollments, Federal dollars for vocational education have declined by 28 percent since 1980 when adjusted for inflation.

The Andrews-Hollings amendment would add $85.4 million to the budget resolution for vocational education. Without this increase, vocational education improvements will be reduced and training and retraining for adults will be cut back. In addition, services for disadvantaged and handicapped students will be reduced.

CHAPTER 2 STATE BLOCK GRANTS

Chapter 2 block grants provide funding to State and local education agencies for a wide variety of educational improvement purposes from special programs for the gifted to career education and teacher education. Enacted in 1981, this program replaced 28 categorical programs previously funded at $743 million. In addition, enactment of this consolidation under the severely reduced funding level has meant competition among diverse previously funded programs for shrinking funds.

For example, local education agencies now find themselves choosing between funds for library materials or desegregation assistance. Our recommendation of $171 million would reverse the funding decline these activities have experienced since fiscal year 1980. It would provide States and localities with additional financial flexibility to adjust elementary and secondary education programs to the changing educational needs of our society, and to develop and expand programs ensuring that students have the basic minimal skills needed to be educated citizens in our society. Funds may also be used to purchase and utilize modern instructional equipment, including microcomputers, or to encourage and enhance the process of school desegregation. This amount would also provide more funds to the Secretary of Education to invest in education programs of national priority—programs which would identify areas in education where deficiencies exist and where national leadership could avert future crises in our educational system.

IMPACT AID—PUBLIC LAW 81-874—PUBLIC LAW 81-815

Public Law 81-874, impact aid is a current year funded reimbursement law which makes payments directly to local public school districts which educate military, Indian and poverty children. These children have parents who are exempt from one or more of the revenue generating taxes due to their Federal involvement.

The concept was first passed in 1950 as an in-lieu-of taxes law and only makes payment where there is an actual presence of federally connected youngsters.

In 1980, the law was funded at $702 million or almost 75 percent of the actual amount needed to fully fund the concept. In 1980 it served 4,300 school districts or about 2.5 million children.

In 1986, the law was funded at $663 million or about 53 percent of its actual need. In 1986 the number of districts had been reduced to 3,000 serving a little under 2 million youngsters.

Insufficient funding has forced payments to some categories for some districts as low as 10 percent of their entitlement. A regular A payment may be as little as $450 per child with regular B payments as low as $25 each.

If the Andrews-Hollings amendment is passed, the law would be funded at 60 percent of its actual need and the additional revenue would make a significant increase in the per-pupil payments in both regular categories.

Additionally, there would be enough to restore the devastating cuts to the 815 companion law for school construction to serve federally connected children.

HIGHER EDUCATION

PELL GRANT PROGRAM

The largest need-based Federal postsecondary student aid program administered by the Department of Education is the Pell Grant Program. The program's purpose is to assist students from low-income families to gain access to postsecondary education. Eligibility for a Pell grant is determined by a federally established need analysis system implemented through the family contribution schedule, and once the student's eligibility is determined, grants are provided directly to undergraduate students based on their financial need.

The buying power of the Pell grant for needy students has declined drastically since fiscal year 1980. In fiscal year 1980, the $1,750 maximum award represented 40 percent of the average cost of attendance at all institutions—although only 25 percent of the cost of students attending independent institutions. In fiscal year 1986 the maximum award grew to $2,100 and unless that level is maintained for fiscal year 1987 it will meet only 34 percent of the average cost of attendance at public institutions—and only 17 percent of the average cost for students at independent institutions. Students from needy backgrounds will find it increasingly difficult to attend college.

Our amendment will continue to ensure that Pell eligible students receive financial support to continue their undergraduate studies. Our amendment will serve an additional 442,800 students over the current March 1, 1986, level of 2,881,000 students.

TRIO PROGRAMS

The special programs for students from disadvantaged backgrounds are comprised of five programs—Talent Search, Upward Bound, Special Services for Disadvantaged Students, Educational Opportunity Centers, and Staff Development Activities. These programs provide important outreach, counseling, and tutorial services as supportive services to low income, first generation, and physically handicapped students. These supportive services are utilized as a mechanism to encourage attendance and retention and to improve academic performance of low income, first generation college students, whose parents were not afforded the opportunity to pursue a postsecondary education. Through the Trio programs, low-income students are provided with a realistic opportunity to escape the cycles of poverty and dependence and to achieve the upward mobility afforded by access to higher education. Studies have shown that participants in the TRIO programs are more than twice as likely to stay in school as other disadvantaged college students who did not have the benefit of these services. And, Upward Bound students are four times as likely to graduate from college as similar students not in Upward Bound.

The TRIO programs have lost over 100,000 students since fiscal year 1980. The Andrews-Hollings amendment will provide $17 million in additional funds to ensure that these low-income students continue to receive the essential services they so desperately need to enter postsecondary education. An additional 43,500 students will be added to the current level of 486,866 students who are currently being served through the TRIO programs.

SUPPLEMENTAL EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITY GRANT

The Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grant [SEOG] Program provides education grant assistance for undergraduate students who demonstrate substantial financial need. Grant awards are made to students through the postsecondary institution that the student plans to attend. Awards for SEOG students may range from $200 to $2,000. The amount of the award is determined by the school that the student attends. Better than 72.4 percent of the SEOG funds are awarded to students with family incomes of less than $30,000 per year. This program's effectiveness also has been substantially eroded in the past 6 years.

By the addition of $40 million, our amendment will increase the number of SEOG recipients by an additional 71,818 to the current level of 718,000 participants.

STATE STUDENT INCENTIVE GRANTS

The State Student Incentive Grant Program is a Federal-State cost sharing partnership to encourage the development and expansion of need-based grant programs, and State scholarship aid programs for postsecondary students with substantial financial need. To participate in the program, States are required to match each Federal SSIG dollar with another dollar from non-Federal sources.

The Andrews-Hollings amendment would provide access for an additional 21,600 students over the current level of 292,000 students who are eligible to receive State Student Incentive Grants.

COLLEGE WORK STUDY [CWS]

The College Work Study Program finances part-time employment for undergraduate, graduate, and professional students who are attending eligible institutions of postsecondary education and who need those earnings from employment to attend college. Federal grants pay up to 80 percent of the student's wages; the remaining 20 percent is paid by the institution, which may pay its share directly to the student in tuition, room and board, and books. Not only does the program help students meet their college expenses, but participants also receive training and experience in their selected course of study through their part-time jobs. Still other students are employed under the program to support various campus services and activities that the institutions might not otherwise be able to provide.

Our amendment will increase the 772,727 participants—current level—by an additional 77,318 participants as a means of ensuring that the students with the greatest financial need will be able to meet their college expenses through a program of training and experience through part time employment opportunities.

NATIONAL DIRECT STUDENT LOAN [NDSL]

The National Direct Students Loan Program provides educational loans to undergraduate, graduate, and professional students on the basis of need. By providing long-term, low interest loans to needy students, the NDSL Program has offered a system of credit to those persons who have difficulty securing loans from commercial lenders. Revolving funds have developed at colleges through prior and current year loan repayments. The federal capital contribution permits institutions that have not yet achieved revolving fund status to make new awards.

Our recommendation of $18 million to this amendment will add an additional 22,750 participants to the current level of 227,273 participants in the NDSL Program.

I ask unanimous consent that the following tables indicating what has happened to education funding since fiscal year 1980 be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. HOLLINGS. I thank my distinguished colleague from North Dakota.

Mr. ANDREWS. I appreciate my colleague from South Carolina, who cosponsors this.

Let me, Mr. President, finish my statement, and I will yield to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from California.

Let me point out, Mr. President, that while the Domenici-Chiles budget package represents a significant improvement over the administration's fiscal year 1987 budget request for education, a modest increase is still needed to ensure that existing education programs continue to operate effectively.

For these reasons, my colleagues and I are offering this amendment to increase funding for function 500 by $300 million in budget outlays for fiscal 1987. This amendment will restore elementary, secondary, and higher education programs to their current level of services for 1987 by adding an amount for inflation, and the 1986 Gramm-Rudman sequestration.

Lowering the Federal deficit is without question our greatest challenge. However, logic, common sense, and fairness must govern our approach to deficit reduction. To shortchange education in the name of national security, fiscal restraint, or for any other reason is wrongheaded, shortsighted, and damaging to the future of our Nation.

The decision the Senate will make on this amendment reminds me, Mr. President, of a story I told about President Lincoln. The President frequently attended the Wednesday evening services at the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church. On the way home after one such service an aide asked Mr. Lincoln what he thought about the sermon just preached. The President replied, "The content was excellent. He delivered it with eloquence. And he put work into the message."

"Then you thought it was a great sermon?" questioned the aide.

"No," replied Mr. Lincoln.

"But you said that the content was excellent, it was delivered with eloquence, and it showed much work."

"That is true," Mr. Lincoln said, "but Dr. Gurley forgot the most important ingredient. He forgot to ask us to do something great."

Mr. President, we stand before this body, and we say to our colleagues let us show the American people that we as Members of the Senate are not only willing but capable of doing something great. I ask that you join together with us in reaffirming our commitment to a public education system for our children that is second to none.

Quite candidly, Mr. President, if we do not like young people, if for some reason or another they trouble us, they bother us and we are not friendly toward them, Mr. President, if we only worship the almighty dollar, then let me point out we ought to support this amendment because, Mr. President, this amendment will restore $10 for every dollar we invest in this program because these are indeed and in fact the investment programs.

Mr. President, our most critical strategic defense initiative is a well-educated population. The young people of this Nation must not have the doors to their future slammed shut even before they have been fully opened to them. By denying adequate funding for education, we are condemning our children to an intellectual wasteland and short-circuiting the training of our best and brightest young people to take their places as leaders in the councils of government, the technological arena as poets, philosophers, teachers, and physicians, but most of all, as literate and knowledgeable citizens of our great democracy.

In closing, I would like to recall the words of yet another great American, and this is a bipartisan effort. I am going to recall the words of Thomas Jefferson who said, "If a nation expects to be ignorant and free in a state of civilization, it expects what never was and never will be."

Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PELL].

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am proud to be a cosponsor of the Andrews-Hollings amendment, which would add $1.2 billion to the budget resolution for education purposes.

If approved, this amendment would provide education with funding at the fiscal 1986 final appropriation plus an inflation adjustment. The result would be very similar to the recommendation which the distinguished chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Education, Arts, and Humanities [Mr. STAFFORD] and I recommended to the Budget Committee earlier this year.

On many occasions I have contended that the real strength and health of our Nation lies not in our weapons of destruction, nor in our machinery of construction, nor even in the amount of gold in Fort Knox. In reality, it is determined by the sum total of the education and character of all of our people.

The Federal contribution to education is not a large one. Overall it amounts to about 10 percent of all moneys spent on education. That 10 percent, however, is extremely important because of the highly targeted manner in which it is allocated.

In elementary and secondary education, for example, the $3.5 billion we spend in chapter I constitutes 70 percent of all the money that is spent on compensatory education in the entire United States.

In vocational education, the $700 million we spend at the Federal level generates an amount that is more than 10 times that figure in expenditures at the State and local level.

And, in higher education, where we spend close to $18 billion annually, over 90 percent of that goes directly to students in the form of grants, loans, and college work study. It is money that enables millions of deserving young Americans to pursue a postsecondary education that otherwise would be beyond their economic reach.

Mr. President, few would question that what we do in education today will have benefits for our society for years and years to come. What we accomplish in a classroom this afternoon may well unleash the talents of a new artist, begin the discovery of a cure to a mysterious disease, or perhaps even lead to the achievements of a lasting peace rather than the hostility and violence on the globe today.

It is in the classrooms of America that we sustain this Nation, and it is through education that we insure that our future will be strong and vibrant.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this important amendment.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, other Senators will be speaking on this amendment. At this point, however, I yield to Senator LAUTENBERG of New Jersey.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, as an original cosponsor of this amendment to add $1.2 billion to the education budget, I am pleased to rise in support of the amendment of the Senators from North Dakota and South Carolina. The education of America's children is critical to our future. Our children are the foundation for our national security and strength as a democratic nation in the years ahead. Without an educated young people with a stake in our society, America will ultimately lose out in the fierce international competition for jobs and economic growth. America's unique place among nations with its commitment to protect the freedom will erode.

A strong military defense capability is essential for our country. However, a strong defense establishment is not sufficient. We need a cohesive society tooling up for the future by educating our youth. We need young people who believe in our country and who have the skills to provide the leadership required in the years ahead.

Federal programs have been critical to improving equity in education and assuring access for all students. These programs focus on the disadvantaged and the handicapped. They provide financial assistance for higher education. The programs assist cultural and educational institutions. Overall, Federal aid is a small proportion of education spending in this country. But, in the areas where assistance is provided, it is a major factor in the development of quality education.

The resolution reported by the Budget Committee does not provide for adequate funding for education for fiscal year 1987. The cuts required earlier this year by the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings budget law would be left in place. Most programs would be frozen at fiscal year 1986 levels, with some programs sharing in a small increase.

Mr. President, the Budget Committee's resolution is an improvement over the budget proposed by the administration. But it does not do enough to support education. During the Budget Committee's consideration of the resolution, I offered a substitute budget plan which included funding for education at about the level proposed in this amendment. The committee did not adopt my budget plan. But, it only narrowly defeated an amendment to add funds for education, which I supported. I believe there is strong support in the Senate for a fair and adequate level of education funding, a level which would be above that provided in Senate Concurrent Resolution 120.

The amendment that we are offering today would add $1.2 billion to the resolution. This increase will allow education funding to make up for inflation and to make up for the 1986 Gramm-Rudman cuts. Keeping in mind that Federal spending for education has declined since 1981, this amendment is reasonable. It will keep education spending at the current level of services. It does not attempt to make up for the cuts of the last few years.

This amendment will help to maintain programs of demonstrated effectiveness, such as the chapter I program for disadvantaged children. The current funding level provides services for only about 40 percent of the eligible children, although the number of disadvantaged children has greatly increased since 1980. Similarly, Pell grants, to assist low-income students with the costs of higher education, cover an ever smaller proportion of the need. This amendment will help to stop the erosion in these and other education programs that has occurred in the last 5 years.

Mr. President, the budget problem is real. The need to cut the deficit is real. I recognize only too well the damage that has been done to the economy by the deficits of the last few years. But, the proper way to deal with deficit reduction is to set priorities. I believe that education must be given a high priority. This amendment will help to place education funding at a level that better reflects its importance than the committee resolution. I urge the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, does the Senator need some time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, if the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRADLEY] wishes to speak at this time, I yield to him 3 minutes.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I rise today, as a cosponsor of this amendment, to support my distinguished colleagues, the Senators from North Dakota and South Carolina. This amendment will increase funding for basic education programs by $1.2 billion for fiscal year 1987. This $1.2 billion brings education programs to their fiscal year 1986 level plus inflation.

But that really does not adequately tell the story. This amendment comes after a 6-year period, beginning in fiscal year 1981, in which funds for education have been subject to persistent cuts. Over this period, the aggregate Department of Education appropriations have been reduced by approximately 16 percent, after adjusting for inflation.

The cuts in elementary and secondary education have been staggering. In fiscal year 1980, for every $100 spent by the Federal Government, $1.10 went for elementary and secondary education. This is not a particularly generous figure to begin with. In the President's fiscal year 1987 budget, however, only 66 cents of every $100 would be spent on elementary and secondary education—a 40-percent reduction since 1980.

Higher education has also suffered. Beginning with the President's first budget in 1981, $100 million was cut from Pell grant funding, and $100 million from national direct student loans. The President's fiscal year 1987 budget continues these persistent cuts in Federal support for higher education. It would result in 1.4 million fewer students receiving any form of student aid or loans. In my home State of New Jersey, 12,600 fewer needy students would receive Pell grants.

Mr. President, it is easy to talk about the failure of our schools and the need for improvement in our educational standards, but it is shortsighted to talk about the importance of education and the problems of our schools while persistently cutting back on the Federal commitment to education.

We cannot continue to pare away at our investment in our most vital natural resource, our children. We cannot look at education as an isolated program that we can cut with impunity. Education has a critical impact on the serious social problems confronting our Nation. The experience of every immigrant group has shown that education offered them the path out of poverty. Moreover, the studies which have demonstrated the critical importance of education for individual and collective progress can and do fill countless libraries.

An enormous amount of publicity and attention has been devoted to the social ills of our youth. Indeed, one in four of our students in America drops out and fails to complete high school. Unfortunately, the figures are much higher in our inner cities. Approximately one in five of our adult population do not have the basic reading and computational skills that will allow them to participate as full functioning members of our society. What does that mean? It means that the tasks of following printed directions in their places of employment, reading directions on medications for themselves or their children, following a recipe, reading a bedtime story to a child, or filling out a tax form, become humiliating experiences of failure. Mr. President, we as a Nation cannot permit this dismal level of competence among our citizens.

Following these past 6 years of cuts in education funding, our educational programs took a further cut under the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law. My home State of New Jersey, as an example, lost $9.67 million in elementary and secondary education funds, and $4.67 million in higher education funds.

Undeniably, we are in a time of serious budgetary constraints. Choices must be made as to how to best spend our funds. I submit that education is not only a good place to spend money, but a critical one.

Mr. President, it seems like a small victory to hold the line on education spending. This is a time for innovation in education. We badly need to address the problems in our educational system, support efforts at improvement, and reward success. We cannot afford to neglect the education of our next generation. I urge passage of this amendment.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, we reserve the remainder of our time.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry: How much time remains for the proponents and how much for the opponents?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proponents have 5 minutes 21 seconds; opponents have 30 minutes 45 seconds.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the Chair. I yield myself as much time as I need at this time.

First, I want to make one very important point, since some have implied that this amendment is going to save education in the United States. Upon hearing that statement, some Americans might assume that the Federal Government provides a major portion of the money spent on education in this country. This year, the people of this country are going to spend $260 billion on education. Of that $260 billion, the cities, the counties, and the States will provide all but $17.7 billion. In total $17.7 billion is how much our budget resolution provides for education. If this amendment passes, State and local governments will spend all but $18.4 billion of the $260 billion. I hope everyone understands that it is not Federal education programs that are educating our young people; it is the taxpayers' out there in our cities, counties, and States. Again, if Congress implemented our budget resolution as reported, out of $260 billion spent on education, our national Government would provide only $17.7 billion of the $260 billion.

As my colleagues listen to all of the wonderful arguments about how we are going to save this Nation by educating our children properly if we pass this amendment, I want them to keep in mind that this amendment will increase spending on education one-half of 1 percent; not 5 percent, not 10 percent, but one-half of 1 percent.

I do not need to say any more on that point. It is an incredible, preposterous statement. Nobody believes that we will destroy the education system in this country if we don't adopt this amendment.

I have heard that we should be innovative; we should be more creative. I believe that if there's one thing wrong with our Federal programs is that they are not very innovative or creative. Despite that, we hold on to them as though they were the only game in town.

Maybe we should put a little money in for special programs: We are increasing funds for the FAA because we do not have enough people watching out for plane crashes. We are increasing the Internal Revenue Service because there are not enough agents to collect taxes.

We already provided $400 million above a freeze for education in this budget. And that is not enough. Many claim that education is not getting its fair share. They want $1.4 billion more this year and $4.2 billion over the next 3 years. And how do they pay for it? With more taxes.

I believe this is a serious amendment. I believe there will be plenty of supporters and I would not be surprised if it passes. I do not believe we could have reported out a budget resolution that would have enough funding for education to avoid any further increases on the floor.

Now, let me address those Senators who are worried about the budget and the size of the defici,t and the tax increases already assumed in our resolution. If this amendment passes, we will have to raise $4.3 billion more over the next 3 years.

I have heard a lot of talk that Congress has cut education over the past 5 years. Well, let me tell you what has happened to education since 1980. Vocational rehabilitation has been cut, right? Wrong, vocational rehabilitation has increased by 37 percent in the last 5 years. Compensatory education has grown by 13 percent. Education for the handicapped have increased by 32 percent.

Student financial aid—some people wonder if the Senator from New Mexico knows anything about that. Well, I do not receive very much student aid but I have a lot of kids in college. As a matter of fact, there has never been a U.S. Senator in history with more children in college at one time than I have. I have seven: two in law school and five in undergraduate schools around this country, from New Mexico to Loyola College in Baltimore. Believe me, I know what it costs. In the budget resolution before us, there is not one reduction in student financial assistance programs not one. Over the past 5 years, these programs increased by 32 percent. The Pell Grant Program alone grew by 46.4 percent.

Mr. NICKLES. Will the chairman yield?

Mr. DOMENICI. I will be happy to yield.

Mr. NICKLES. I missed the Senator's opening statement. I am sure the Senator covered this. Could he tell me what the outlays were last year and then what the outlays are projected for 1987, or for 1986, 1987, 1988, 1989. Are they level or are they the same, increased or decreased?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Decreased.

Mr. DOMENICI. Although the budget authority is increasing, outlays are about constant.

Mr. NICKLES. Constant with 1986 levels?

Mr. DOMENICI. Yes. About $17.4 billion. They decline slightly due to the savings in the Guaranteed Student Loan (GSL) Program. These GSL reforms affect primarily the banks and the State guarantee agencies, not the students.

Mr. NICKLES. They are the same program plus a little bit more. The savings come from interest savings from the banks and other management changes.

Mr. DOMENICI. Yes. Under the Guaranteed Student Loan (GSL) Program, banks receive a subsidy from the Federal Government, as an incentive to make these loans. We are recommending that the banks receive slightly less of a subsidy for making GSL's to young people.

Mr. NICKLES. For the banks.

Mr. DOMENICI. Yes.

Mr. NICKLES. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DOMENICI. I will reserve the remainder of my time. I will conclude by saying again, I do not believe we could have produced a budget resolution that would have enough for education to satisfy everyone.

My colleagues should know that we already voted on this amendment in committee. It failed. The same person who offers it now, my good friend, Senator ANDREWS, offered it in committee.

The committee instead settled for a $400 million increase over a freeze for education. I hope that Senator would seriously consider that sooner or later, even with the best of our programs, unless we can find other ones to cut, we ought to settle for something as reasonable as the Budget Committee has offered. I need not repeat what we have done in these programs. We have funded these programs well considering the constraints. And I do not say "we" as though I have been personally responsible. There are many Senators who have been tremendously instrumental in increasing education spending in this country.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, will my colleague yield for a moment?

Mr. DOMENICI. I just want to compliment several of my colleagues. For example, we have the distinguished education subcommittee chairman. Thanks to him funding for these programs have gone up.

Our job will not be any easier if this amendment passes.

Mr. ANDREWS. Will my chairman yield briefly?

Mr. DOMENICI. I will be pleased to yield.

Mr. ANDREWS. Let me point out, Mr. President, that our chairman is a friend of education. He did move very far toward our figures in the Budget Committee. I think it is also important to point out that while he came about two-thirds of the way, we had an amendment within the Budget Committee. We lost by a two-vote margin and we said we would take that amendment to the floor, which is what we are doing. Let me also point out that while the distinguished Senator from New Mexico and the Senator from Florida, the chairman and ranking member of the Budget Committee, did accommodate about two-thirds of our request, the amendment that now is before us is, as the chairman, I am sure, in his fairness and equity will point out, still below the CBO budget baseline in each one of these outyears. It is that simple. We are merely revisiting on the floor what we had a sharp debate about in the Budget Committee, and those of us who support education assure our colleagues that the Senator from New Mexico does support education, too. He just does not come quite as close to the CBO baseline as we would like to come.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. President, how much time does the Senator from New Mexico have?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SYMMS). Fourteen minutes and 50 seconds.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield myself 1 minute, and then I will yield to the distinguished Senator from Florida. The Senator from Nebraska (Mr. EXON) also wants 3 minutes.

Mr. President, I want to address the point raised by Senator ANDREWS. I hope no one believes that the baseline has anything to do with the question of how much funding a particular program should receive.

Since the Budget Act passed, some 12 years ago, our committee has used the baseline, or current policy, as a starting point. Current policy assumes that every program increases by the rate of inflation, even if Congress has not voted for increases.

CBO has no expertise in education. CBO is not telling us, and never has, what a proper funding level should be for education.

Mr. ANDREWS. Does CBO have that expertise in defense? That CBO baseline is held firmly when you talk about defense numbers.

Mr. DOMENICI. CBO does not make recommendations about increases in spending. They do not claim to know what level of Government spending we should support.

Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. EXON. I thank the chairman of the Budget Committee.

Mr. President, I think I have a record of supporting education at all levels very strongly, and that record speaks for itself. Nevertheless, I know that when I cast the vote I am going to cast because of my conviction on this, I will be on some lists as antieducation.

We are going to make the first really sincere attempt to break the limits set in the Budget Committee. There is nothing wrong with this, and I applaud the members of the Budget Committee and the members of the Senate. They have every right to offer the amendment that has been offered; and in normal circumstances, this Senator would be supporting it.

Mr. President, I cast my vote in support of education in the Budget Committee when we essentially froze—by freezing, I mean we did not allow an increase nor did we allow the permanent cuts suggested in the President's budget. This Senator stands for his support of education in the Budget Committee. But, as is the case in almost every program we can think of, the question is, What have you done for me lately? What have you done for me lately in education is likely to be the measure of the education associations—not what we did in committee or what we did in basically freezing the education budget, which I thought was good and proper under the circumstances to meet the constraints we were working under. But, no; now we come along with another $1.2 billion.

I wish I could support it, because I am a strong supporter of education. I did everything I could for education, in good conscience and in bringing some constraint into line as dictated by good commonsense and as mandated by not so good commonsense embodied in the so-called Gramm-Rudman-Hollings proposal, in the view of this Senator.

It seems to me that what we are really doing here is saying that education is another of those items that will not be cut. If we approve this $1.2 billion increase, we are basically going to be returning to education the amount that was sequestered under the first Gramm-Rudman-Hollings cut. If we are going to do that with education, "Katy, bar the door" with respect to what we are going to do on down the line.

I am simply saying that, as worthwhile as this amendment is, and as much as I would like to vote for it, I cannot do so in good conscience; because I am fearful that if we break the dam on this issue, "Katy, bar the door" as we take up other amendments.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOMENICI. How much time does the Senator desire?

Mr. CHILES. Five or six minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield 6 minutes to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I have listened to the arguments for this amendment, and I find that they have great merit. They are arguments, in the main, that I have made before—many on the floor, many in committee. I cannot take issue with the arguments.

In fact, I would like to see us at this time be adding more to education. I do not think $1.2 billion is enough for what we should be doing in education—nowhere near enough. But if you think about it, that is part of what we are about in this whole thing of trying to get a handle on the deficit.

What do we do when we pay $148 billion this year in interest payments, when it is the fastest growing item in the Federal budget, the most uncontrollable item in the Federal budget? What does it do? It squeezes us to the point that, over the last few years, we have not been able to set priorities that we know need to be set. We cannot do the kinds of things for the handicapped that we know we should be doing. We cannot do the things for the disadvantaged that we know we should be doing.

We are not doing the things in many other areas of what Government's principal role is—training, education. It is so important for this country that there is no doubt that we should be putting more money into it.

However, we have another thing to remember: We are living in a different environment this year. The Senator from Florida was a cosponsor of an amendment last year that added $1 billion to education and has been a cosponsor in most of the years it has come up. There is a difference. There is something called Gramm-Rudman-Hollings and the sequester that comes from that if we fail to meet these targets.

I have not seen any great surplus of votes for the committee document as we have it on the floor. In fact, it is 4 weeks out of the committee, and we have just taken it up. Why? Because the majority leader said there is not sufficient support on that side. We certainly have not seen it being given great marks by the White House. We have seen what has happened from that standpoint.

I am tremendously concerned. If we cannot reach that level, as we should, under the Budget Act, what happens? We fall under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. We fall under the sequester. Then what happens to education? What happens to all our other programs? That is what we are up against.

So in the Budget Committee when we were trying to craft this document, a number of us said that before we would lend our support, we had to add $400 million to education—we had to add above that so-called baseline or that freeze we were talking about. What we were trying to do was put it in the programs for the disadvantaged, for the handicapped, for the areas where we felt we had to give some additional money.

Give more? Absolutely—I would like to see us be able to give more. But we have to look at it in the context of this question: "How do you like your mother-in-law?" Compared to whom? How do you like this deficit? How do you like this budget? Compared to a sequester. Compared to what happens if the ax falls and we start cutting. That is the thing we have to look at now.

If you can show me this amendment as it is adopted; if we are going to get the same preponderance of votes; if we are going to get sufficient votes on both sides of the aisle; if we are going to have a bipartisan budget; and if we are going to have a kind of budget so that the House will say, "Wait a minute, we can put in some revenue and go forward with this budget because we have a majority of the Democrats and Republicans sponsoring that in the Senate, so we will not worry about the actions the White House tends to take," then I would say this is a good amendment.

I do not feel that confident. I do not feel that there are enough votes now, especially on the other side of this Chamber, so that we will be able to produce any kind of vote.

For those reasons, I have to say that when you look at the mark we have, compared to what happens if we have a sequester, I think that mark looks very good.

I think we have tried. If you look at what we had to do with all of the other programs the disadvantaged programs, feeding programs, housing programs, the elderly programs, all of those areas, we have tried to treat education as well. I think we did that as we did all of those programs, and again one thing: What is the overall scheme about? The overall scheme is to get control of our destiny so that we can come back and do what we should be doing as a Congress, setting those priorities so that we can be determining what our role should be in education.

But I will guarantee you we will never have an opportunity to do that until we can get this budget under control, until we can cause that interest rate not to be fastest growing program of the Federal Government.

For that reason, I think we should stick with the mark we have in the Budget Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Who yields time?

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Texas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee for yielding to me.

I wish to identify myself with his remarks and with the remarks of the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. President, the fundamental weakness in this budget, as I see it now, is that we do not have a commitment from the partner in this process. That clearly has to be present if the budget is going to be put into place. The reason we do not have that commitment is a dispute about a tax increase of $53 billion over a 3-year period.

Now, I do not doubt the sincerity of Senators who propose this amendment. I do not doubt for a moment that they are willing to raise taxes, to add another $2.9 billion to education programs.

I am doubtful, however, Mr. President, that such a tax increase is going to be adopted or that it is going to be signed by the President.

I think with the adoption of this amendment, if in fact it is adopted, that we are adding more to the clear confrontation that exists over this issue. We are making this budget further and further out of reach in terms of its adoption and implementation through a reconciliation bill and a tax increase.

I am concerned, therefore, that while the budget might conform to the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings requirement of being deficit neutral, and I think it is interesting to note that in any other year this would simply have been an add on to the deficit, we are at least debating it here as a tax increase and an add on because of a requirement of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings bill, and I think that is a step in the right direction.

But I oppose it. I do not feel constrained to explain that I am proeducation. I spent 12 years of my life teaching. I think that represents a commitment in and of itself. But I oppose raising taxes by $2.9 billion for this add on. I believe that tax increase will be vetoed and if, in fact, we spend the money it will end up being added to the deficit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Who yields time?

Mr. ANDREWS. I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Connecticut.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment of the distinguished Senator from North Dakota.

Let me say this in relationship to remarks just made: The fact is you are going to have a confrontation on the matter of budget priorities. We have lived now for several years in a rather bizarre arrangement where most of the money goes for defense and little enough in terms of education, health, and science.

No, this is not a finger-pointing exercise as far as the Budget Committee is concerned. They are doing their job, which is to produce a budget. But the matter of choices as to what that budget is to consist of, that is really what is at issue here on the floor of the Senate, and it should be.

Do not let anyone take any solace in saying this is the Budget Committee's fault, that they are the ones who are responsible. The real clear-cut question before us is what we are going to allocate to education in this Nation.

As the chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee that handles education funding, I can assure you that over the past several years, education has been shortchanged and continues to be shortchanged.

I appreciate the fact that the budget reported by the Budget Committee is better than that offered by the President. But it still leaves us far behind in terms of what needs to be done in primary, secondary, higher education, and special education. I will address special education separately in a later amendment.

What this vote is about is that once again we want to establish education as a priority in the overall scheme of things, and that is something that can only be done by the Senate and not by the Budget Committee. Please understand that just within my subcommittee alone there were approximately 30 days of hearings just on the subjects of education, health, and labor. The Budget Committee does not have time to do that. I do not know how many days Senator STAFFORD, who is chairman of the education authorizing committee, has also put in on this matter.

But I go down the checklist of what needs to be done, and believe me it is considerable and, yes, over these years we barely kept our head above water.

Now what the Budget Committee has to consider is what are the outyear costs of standing still or falling behind.

Let me give you an example: According to the American Library Association, some 27 million adults are functionally illiterate with an estimated 2 million added to that number annually. It is estimated that functional illiteracy costs the Nation over $224 billion each year in welfare payments, crime, incompetent job performance, lost tax revenue, and remedial education.

Unless you tend to these outyear costs, there is no way you will ever be able to balance the budget in the future just by virtue of the cost of not doing what should be done in terms of education.

I wonder if my colleagues have any idea what it will cost this Nation if we fail to provide educational services for the handicapped and vocational rehabilitation services for disabled adults. The cost of caring for those who would not be mainstreamed in our schools and the cost of providing food, clothing, and shelter assistance to those who could otherwise be working is enormous.

Recent estimates show that since 1980, Federal education efforts have been reduced by 16 percent in real dollars. The constant erosion of these education dollars will continue to have serious consequences for our society.

Mr. President, this amendment to restore current services for education programs based on the presequestration level is not some wild, big spending assault on efforts to reduce the deficit. Rather, it is an honest attempt to strengthen the capacity of our educational system to provide the quality of education we so desperately need.

I commend my good friend from North Dakota for his leadership in restoring essential Federal funding for educational programs and I urge adoption of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Who yields time?

Mr. ANDREWS. I yield a minute to the Senator from South Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina is recognized for a minute.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Florida writes us on April 10 which I received a few days later, less than 10 days ago, which I ask unanimous consent the entire document be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the document was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET,
Washington, DC, April 10, 1986.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: We invite your cosponsorship of the growth and investment initiative discussed at the Democratic Conference.

The resolution passed by the Senate Budget Committee is a balanced and effective deficit reduction package. It complies with the Gramm-Rudman target for fiscal year 1987 responsibly, by ensuring that defense moderation, domestic cuts, and revenues all play a role.

But our Party has long recognized that the national budget is more than a statement of accounts—it is a blueprint for our future. And to secure that future, we must support investments—in science, education, technological development, training, and trade promotion—that will make the country strong, competitive, and capable of offering meaningful opportunities for our people.

To fulfill these objectives, our amendment proposes several billion dollars in investments over three years, funded with new revenues. We do not propose further cuts in national defense. And the amendment includes language rejecting proposals to increase the average American's income taxes.

Attached, you'll find a comprehensive statement which details the investments we are proposing. Please review this material. If you are interested in cosponsoring this Democratic initiative, contact Mark Steitz in Senator Hart's office (4-5852) or John Hilley with Senator Chiles' staff (4-0553).

Sincerely,

GARY HART.
LAWTON CHILES.

APRIL 10, 1986.

THE DEMOCRATIC—HART/CHILES—GROWTH AND INVESTMENT INITIATIVE

The government must develop and invest in a comprehensive program for economic growth that recognizes the challenges and opportunities of the future. Consequently, Democrats must unite behind an alternative package to:

Nurture minds and creativity;

Foster additional scientific research;

Promote technological development;

Sustain a skilled and flexible workforce;

Use our natural resources productively;

Expand international market opportunities;

Rather than reacting with piecemeal solutions, America must develop strategic and activist approaches to an evolving world economy:

To maintain our lead in scientific and commercial endeavors, we must provide opportunities for all to learn and then apply their education;

To translate research into marketable products, we must reward technological and product development. But we must also sustain a skilled and flexible workforce to produce these products competitively;

To reap the benefits of our competitive prowess, we must be able to compete fairly and openly in the world's markets;

To enable our prosperity to endure we must manage our resources wisely and adopt innovative approaches which minimize energy usage and maximize environmental protection.

Concerted action can create a whole that is greater than the parts. The growth and investment initiative funds programs in science, education, technological development, training, natural resources, and trade promotion—drawing together the elements of a comprehensive and connected policy.

Therefore, we propose a "pay as you invest" budget amendment.

The Democratic Growth and Investment initiative would invest $3.0 billion more in fiscal year 1987 and $17.1 billion more over the next three years, compared to the bipartisan compromise. These investments would be financed through increased taxes—the amendment includes, however, language expressing the sense that these revenues not come from increasing income taxes on low and middle income Americans.

As the attached table shows, the amendment contemplates three major initiatives: investments in science and technology, in resource development, and in education and training. The science and technology initiatives include:

New investment in technology development focused on biomedical and biotechnical research, supercomputers, robotics, fiber optics and other advanced processes;

Increased basic research through the NSF and other research organizations.

The resource development initiative is designed to develop our nation's energy, agricultural, metalurgical and other natural resources.

The education and training initiatives, accounting for roughly two-thirds of the funds in the amendment, aim to restore the nation's historic commitments to our children's future and a skilled and flexible labor force. The amendment would:

Invest in skills critical to our growing and changing economy including math, science, and foreign language programs;

Ensure a quality education for the children most at risk—those 14 million growing up in poverty; more will be invested in successful programs with proven track records, such as Head Start, compensatory education and Pell grants, as well as new public/private partnership, demonstration, and educational excellence initiatives;

Combat adult illiteracy and growing high school dropout rates;

Reaffirm our commitment to training dislocated and disadvantaged workers by increasing participation in current, successful programs and establishing pilot programs to develop new approaches.

WE ARE AT RISK

America does not have a guarantee to prosperity. Our economic well-being is in large part a legacy of the work and investments of earlier generations. That is a birthright that we must not squander.

Yet in the decade of the 1980's we have chosen to borrow from, rather than build for, our future. As things now stand, the federal government will increase its debt by $1.36 trillion in the years from 1981 to 1990.

Having recognized that the budget deficit is an impediment to economic growth, we are committed to a process that will lead to a balanced budget by 1991. But already having borrowed so much from our future, it would be shortsighted to balance the budget in a way that steals even more from tomorrow. We simply cannot afford to freeze or starve programs essential for future economic growth.

The warning signs are clear. The U.S. is losing the race against our international competitors—the result will be a lower standard of living. Consider:

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

In the last five years, the U.S. trade balance in high-technology goods has declined by more than $20 billion;

By 1985, the number of robots installed in Japanese facilities was twice as great as the United States;

As a proportion of GNP, the U.S. spends less than any of its major trading partners on industrial research and development;

The military proportion of federal R&D was 50 percent in 1980. This would grow to 73 percent under the President's budget;

Japan graduates twice as many engineering students per capita as the United States;

U.S. productivity growth in this decade has been the lowest among our major trading partners;

EDUCATION

U.S. students scored at or below the average of nineteen other countries on a series of math achievement tests administered to 8th and 12th graders. The high school seniors fell into the lowest fourth of countries on the algebra, geometry, and the number systems tests.

Only 15 percent of American high school students study a foreigh language—down from about 24 percent in 1965.

Over 27 million adult Americans are functionally illiterate, with less than 10 percent receiving remedial education each year.

WORKFORCE

Over 11 million workers permanently lost jobs due to plant closings and layoffs between 1979 and 1984. Nearly half were employed in manufacturing industries hardest hit by foreign competition;

Yet, at most, 5 percent of those eligible to participate in training programs are being served at existing funding levels;

At least 20 percent of displaced workers lack reading and basic math skills. When they lose job-specific skills and seniority benefits, long-term earnings losses result. Among displaced workers who find reemployment, 45 percent report pay cuts.

By the year 2000, half of the workforce will be middle-aged (35-55), compared with about 35 percent today. Retraining the adult workforce will be paramount.

RESOURCES

Each year, 264 million tons of hazardous wastes are generated with only 0.3 percent covered by Superfund;

The life expectancies of the world reserves of essential materials such as silver, lead, and zinc range from 10 to 20 years, implying rapid depletion at current demand levels;

Soil conservation losses of 5 to 15 tons per acre per year are occurring under current erosion conditions.

MARKET OPPORTUNITIES

Market barriers to U.S. exports deprive our producers of billions in sales annually;

Seeing the success of our competitors, many developing nations are adopting a neo-mercantilist approach to trade;

Only 5 percent of world trade is subject to international trade rules.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Senator CHILES wrote us a few days ago that what he wants to do is give some $11.9 billion more to education in budget authority. Then he adds $1 billion for energy, $1 billion for agriculture, $2 billion for health, $0.6 billion for industry and for commerce, $1.3 billion for science, and $0.7 billion for natural resources, and $7.6 billion for training—for a grand total of $26.1 billion.

This proposal adds $17 billion more in taxes. I call the Hart-Chiles amendment the tax and tax and spend and spend amendment.

Now, this afternoon, he says we have to stop and think about the Andrews-Hollings amendment. That we have to get discipline over the budget. That have to get the budget under control. Unlike the Hart-Chiles amendment, the Andrews-Hollings amendment before you now conforms to the discipline of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Who yields time?

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Will the Senator yield me 1½ minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota has 1 minute remaining; the Senator from New Mexico has 2 minutes remaining.

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Illinois who requested it even though he is not in favor of my side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I thank my colleague from New Mexico.

I candidly have mixed feelings on this. My concern is that we are going to improve this budget resolution to death. At the same time, clearly we ought to make a greater priority of education in this country.

So, I am going to vote for the resolution. It does not suggest that our friends on the Budget Committee have not done a superb job. I think they have. But I am going to vote for it simply as an indication that this Nation has to do more to prepare for tomorrow than we are now doing, but I confess again some mixed feelings because I fear as we "improve" this resolution we may be lessening its changes for passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Who yields time?

Mr. ANDREWS. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Hawaii.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Hawaii.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I rise as a cosponsor to speak in favor of the amendment offered by my colleagues from North Dakota and South Carolina which would increase funding for function 500 by $1.2 billion for fiscal year 1987.

Starting in 1983 with the issuance of the National Commission on Excellence in Education's report entitled "A Nation at Risk: The Imperative for Education Reform," there has been extensive debate in both Houses of Congress about the state of education in our country. The debate has centered on various proposals for achieving quality education but especially on the level of funding necessary for attaining and maintaining that quality.

The business before this body today requires another of our recurring visits to past discussions. Once again this body is determining the merits of a proposal to provide funding for education. Once again this body is weighing the arguments for taking such action against a background of budget deficits. Once again this body must focus foremost on that which is for the overall good of this Nation's schools and students.

Mr. President, in thinking through all of these necessary considerations, I could come to only one conclusion—this amendment deserves support. If education is truly an endeavor in which a partnership exists not only between a school and its community, but also between the community and the State and between the State and the Federal Government, then it is incumbent upon this body to demonstrate its commitment to this partnership—not merely by rhetoric, but through tangible actions. It is not acceptable for the Federal Government to pass on to the States its share of responsibility for education. It must demonstrate leadership and wisdom and accept its share of responsibility in an area so full of promise—the promise of young minds with the hope of new endeavors.

In determining whether or not adoption of this amendment adequately reflects fiscal restraint, I can only emphasize that the amendment merely restores funding to the current services level with an adjustment for inflation. Surely this, in and of itself, is neither excessive nor irresponsible. I believe it is only fair that the Federal Government at the very least maintain its current level of involvement and responsibility in the educational programs throughout our country. To do otherwise would be to pull away support from State and local efforts at a time when such support is most urgently needed in order to act upon projections of educational reform. We Members of Congress have repeatedly heard the administration describe the many different initiatives taken by the States to meet the challenge of providing educational quality and equity head on. Given the fact that these initiatives have barely taken root, is it really prudent for the Federal Government to cut off its current support and thereby jeopardize whatever gains may have been achieved by these new State initiatives? I hardly think so. After all, is it not extremely plausible, if not highly probable, that cuts in Federal funding may result in moneys previously targeted for State initiatives being instead diverted to offset Federal cutbacks? Then where would we be? Is such a consequence wise and efficient use of the human resources in our schools? As a one-time classroom teacher, I do not believe that cost effectiveness in education can only be evaluated by counting dollars saved. It is high time that deliberate consideration also be given to man-hours wasted.

Finally, in considering the proposed amendment as it relates to the broader good of our Nation's schools and students, there is no question in my mind as to the gains to be made. I am, instead, gravely concerned about what impact the failure to pass this amendment would have. If failure to maintain current services results in an inability on the part of schools to serve certain groups of students or the same number of students, and it may, or if failure to pass this amendment results in a decrease in the kinds or amount of services provided to students, and again it may, then the need to pass the amendment offered by the Senators from North Dakota and South Carolina is even further underscored. How can the Members of the U.S. Senate, in good conscience, deny to these students their access to a quality education? Once again, I return to my comment on the irretrievable losses of time spent and effort made by teachers and others in trying to meet the needs of the child in the classroom. As a former public school teacher and father of five I know that maintenance of effort is crucial to every child's rate and level of achievement. Therefore, if quality education is indeed the goal that is sought by Congress—and it should be—I believe that the only reasonable and responsible action that this body can take is to support the pending amendment.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I yield 30 seconds to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, what this finally boils down to is that the advocacy of education does not rest with the Secretary of Education, except, perhaps for his advocacy of bilingual education. Advocacy of education is not up to the Budget Committee. It is this body that has to speak to the advocacy of education as a matter of national priority.

That is what is at issue here, not the Budget Committee, not the Secretary of Education, but each individual Senator saying, yes, in the course of the overall budget, education now deserves an emphasis which has been lacking over the past several years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired on the side of the proponents.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I have 30 seconds left. We had 1 minute and 15 seconds. I made a unanimous-consent request. I yielded 30 seconds. So we should have 45 seconds remaining.

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with Senators ANDREWS and HOLLINGS in sponsoring this very necessary amendment to the budget resolution (S. Con. Res. 120).

Mr. President, I am, no doubt, viewed as one of the more fiscally conservative members of this distinguished body. I do not apologize for being concerned about the Federal deficit. We must work together to ensure that our children and our grandchildren are not burdened with our debts.

We must also provide our children with a quality education. As a former schoolteacher, I can assure my colleagues that a dollar spent wisely on the education of our youth is an invaluable investment in our Nation's future.

Mr. President, in my State the vast majority of those who puruse a post-secondary education rely upon Federal financial aid. Without adequate funds for these important programs, many students in South Dakota and across the Nation will be denied access to a college education or vocational training. Additionally, programs which serve to assist disadvantaged students [TRIO] and developing institutions will suffer if we fail to adopt this amendment. Surely we cannot deny our young people the opportunity to realize their hopes and dreams for a bright and promising future.

As my colleagues know, I have long been an outspoken proponent of the impact aid program. Our Nation's federally impacted schools, particularly those which are heavily impacted with military dependents or Native American children, whose parents do not contribute to the local tax base, can ill afford any reductions in funds. Certainly the Federal Government has an obligation to reimburse local school districts that are unable to generate sufficient revenues due to Federal activity.

Mr. President, there are a number of other vital education programs which are provided for through this amendment, including Chapter 1 compensatory education, chapter 2 ECIA [Education Consolidation and Improvement Act], vocational education, and handicapped education. I commend the distinguished Senators from North Dakota and South Carolina for developing this sensible and well-balanced amendment. I urge our colleagues to join in supporting the amendment.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I am pleased to be an original cosponsor of the Andrews amendment to increase education funding by $1.2 billion in fiscal year 1987. Our amendment restores funding for the basic education programs to current services—a freeze on the fiscal year 1986 appropriation plus inflation. This amendment would insure that services and aid to students would not be reduced from current levels, recognizing that Federal education programs are essential to the collective educational needs of our nation's students and should, therefore, be protected from further cuts.

Mr. President, in my view, Federal education programs have absorbed their fair share of budget cuts in recent years. Between fiscal year 1980 and the fiscal year 1986 actual appropriation, all Federal spending grew by 65.9 percent. During this same period, Federal funding for all elementary and secondary education programs except vocational education, chapter I, and education for the handicapped declined in actual dollars.

Because funding has not kept up with the inflation, approximately 600,000 fewer students are being served by chapter I in the 1985-86 school year than were being served in 1980-81. Between 1980-86, the Federal share of education of the handicapped fell from 12 to 7 percent, even though the original Federal commitment was to provide 40 percent of the funding by 1980. Clearly, education has not added to the Federal deficit and should be allowed to keep pace with inflation.

The Senate Budget Committee Budget Resolution sets the function 500 funding level at $30.8 billion, which is essentially an across-the-board freeze on the fiscal year 1986 actual appropriation. The budget resolution also contains a $100 million cut in chapter II funding. Our amendment would restore the funding for Federal education programs at the fiscal year 1986 current services appropriated level. With current services funding maintained, States will be able to continue to serve those children who are already participating in a Federal education program. Current services funding for chapter I is particularly important. Although the number of disadvantaged children has increased by 2.2 million since 1980, only 40 percent of the eligible chapter I children are currently being served.

In increasing function 500 by $1.2 billion for education programs, we are placing education in a high priority position. Our amendment can make the difference between whether millions of Americans continue to have access to federally supported education programs or whether they lose access to educational opportunity.

The strength of our Nation rests in its people, and we cannot strengthen the Nation without investing in the human infrastructure. As we consider this amendment, let us keep in mind that if the United States wants to maintain its position as the greatest nation in the world, if we are to keep pace with modern industrial nations like Japan, and West Germany, if we are to keep pace with the Soviets, we must make realistic expenditures on our greatest capital asset, our most important domestic defense weapon—an educated citizenry.

I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of the Andrews-Hollings-Specter amendment.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with Senator ANDREWS and HOLLINGS and my other colleagues in supporting an amendment to begin to restore vital funding to our educational system.

It is frightening to imagine that over the last 5 years, while we have seen 163 percent funding increase in the amount of foreign aid, we have withstood a drastic 23 percent cut in the education function. How can a Nation so dependent on the vital need for human resource development, be so negligent of its obligation to the investment necessary to insure that development?

I proudly join in this effort to redesignate this funding priority to education as a first step in redefining that priority and putting a renewed emphasis on this Nation's economic and technological leadership. As we see ourselves lose markets to foreign competitors, we should realize the need to protect our future and work to insure a continued growth in the standard of living for ourselves and our children.

I applaud the leadership of the two principal sponsors of this amendment and have cosponsored and support it wholeheartedly.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, I rise to urge my colleagues to support this amendment. A fundamental decision is now before us—will we invest more in the education of our young people to equip them with the skills, knowledge, and motivation they will need as America's next generation of leaders and workers? Or will we risk undermining that future through inadequate funding and neglect?

This amendment would add $1.2 billion to education programs in the Domenici-Chiles budget plan—just enough money needed to freeze education funding and provide an adjustment for inflation. In other words, the amendment sustains last year's level of support for a range of critical education programs—including assistance to our local schools, an effort to upgrade math and science classes, vocational education, student loans and grants, and teacher training in key fields.

As pointed out by the authors of this amendment, Senators HOLLINGS and ANDREWS, funding for education in real dollars has significantly decreased in the past 5 years. This has happened against a backdrop of increasing problems in our educational system and the state of our economy, all suggesting that we should have been doing the reverse with education funding.

One of the most compelling warnings was sounded 3 years ago by the President's National Commission on Excellence in Education: "Our Nation is at risk. Our once unchallenged preeminance in commerce, industry, science, and technological innovation is being overtaken by competitors throughout the world." The commission placed much of the blame on our country's educational system. Indicators of the Nation's risk which are now well known include a steady decline in our students' testing scores, particularly in math and science, an increasing rate of illiteracy among adults and teenagers, and a drop in the ranking of American students in comparisons of student achievement among industrialized nations. As a study led by major U.S. corporations recently pointed out, Japanese students spend more time in class than their American counterparts; by the time they graduate from high school, they have completed the equivalent of a second year at a good American college.

We cannot afford anything but a first-rate educational system. Today's young people must be trained and educated to make the adjustments to the new world economy. Their task will be enormous, as we can see by looking at the country's present economic situation. Fully 70 percent of the goods we produce compete with merchandise from abroad. We have lost half the jobs in the U.S. steel industry, given up a significant share in the market in all high technology or sunrise industries, and allowed a trade deficit to form between our electronic sales and Japan's that is close to the magnitude of our deficit in autos. These trends are especially disturbing when one recalls the Bureau of Labor Statistics projection, released in 1984, of a shortage of workers in occupational fields requiring higher entry-level skills by the 1990's.

Another Presidential commission, focusing on industrial competitiveness, drew the conclusion that must be acted upon. It said: "Our ability to compete internationally faces unprecedented challenge from abroad. Our world leadership is at stake, and so is our ability to provide for our people the standard of living and opportunities to which they aspire."

Fortunately, the American people are responding by pushing for reform of our educational system. Across the country, States have made the commitment to upgrade curricula, teacher certification standards, school buildings and equipment, and many other aspects of their schools. But they need and desire leadership and resources from the Federal Government. As a Nation, we are not going to make the leaps fast enough which are necessary to prepare our young people for the demands of the future unless we increase support for more in education programs.

We all remember the Federal Government drive to emphasize education in response to Sputnik in the late 1950's—a drive that propelled the innovation and the prosperity of the 1960's. Isn't now the time to mobilize again? In my view, Congress must focus on education as one of its highest priorities—the financial resources must be committed to vastly improve and modernize the teaching and training of America's young people.

This amendment would provide a modest amount of funding to move in this direction—not enough, I would argue, to make the improvements needed to meet the challenges ahead. But it is a step in the right direction, and will help to build momentum for a national effort to bring excellence into our schools. The key to America's economic resurgence is education. Either we invest now or we will pay the price all too soon.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, in recent years funding for basic education in real dollars has declined. This amendment, which I am proud to cosponsor, will restore funding for basic education to last year's current services level—a freeze at last year's appropriation plus inflation.

Programs strengthened by this amendment include education for the handicapped, vocational and adult education, and compensatory education for the disadvantaged and much more.

With more families falling into poverty and an increasing number of young people without the basic skills to get and hold down jobs, it is clear to me education is one place we cannot afford to cut back.

Whether we talk about productivity in manufacturing and business, national security or international relations, new challenges in technology or the need for new leadership skills in social and domestic policy matters, education is the key to finding the answers to problems we face now and in the future.

I can think of no investment of our resources which carries the promise of so rich a return as the investment in education.

Mr. President, the amendment to restore $1.2 billion in educational programs represents an investment in our future. Like any investment, there is some cost involved. But that cost of $1.2 billion is a small price to pay for an educated and enlightened America.

The amendment directs the Finance Committee to find $1.2 billion in revenues to offset this important investment in education, so that it will not add to the $200 billion budget deficit.

The chairman of the Senate Finance Committee and virtually all of its members have stated that any revenues raised to reduce the deficit would not be derived by increasing individual taxes. I also oppose outright any increase in individual taxes to raise the necessary funds to finance this amendment and I encourage the Finance Committee to raise the needed revenues either through a minimum corporate tax or effects to increase tax compliance.

Mr. President, more than 200 of our largest, most profitable corporations paid less in taxes last year than the average Vermont family. In fact, the Boeing Corp. and Dow Chemical received $13.6 and $18.5 million refunds, respectively.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a list of corporations that pay no Federal income taxes be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMPANIES THAT PAID NO INCOME TAX

[The following chart lists 50 American companies that paid no Federal income tax or received refunds from 1981 through 1984, according to a recent survey of 275 companies by Citizens for Tax Justice. Total profits and tax refunds for that period are in millions of dollars]

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, this cannot go on. The Senate Finance Committee ought to report a minimum tax to ensure that these corporations pay their fair share of taxes. As part of the Hollings budget freeze, I was pleased to cosponsor a minimum tax that would raise $15 billion from corporations that previously avoided paying taxes. It can be done. Out of a sense of fairness, it must be done.

Finally, Mr. President, last year the Internal Revenue Service reported that up to $92 billion in revenues could be raised simply by collecting taxes owed to the Federal Government. It makes far more sense to increase efforts to collect back taxes from those who have skirted their responsibilities than raising individual taxes. I urge the Finance Committee to follow the lead that Senator KERRY and I took in offering a successful amendment to Gramm-Rudman-Hollings calling for an annual report on the progress of the Internal Revenue Service's efforts to increase tax compliance.

No American should be asked to pay a single cent more in Federal income taxes, when so much revenues remains uncollected and so many profitable corporations avoid paying their fair share of taxes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I rise today in support of the amendment being offered by Senators ANDREWS, HOLLINGS, myself and many others, to increase funding for function 500 by $1.2 billion.

Under this amendment we will restore current services for all education programs. Current services represents the fiscal year 1986 appropriations level plus 5.7 percent for inflation.

I am committed to reduce the enormous budget deficit. However, I strongly disagree with those who would do so primarily by reducing funding for basic education programs which provide the foundation for an educated citizenry.

Since 1980, funding for education in real dollars has declined by approximately 16 percent. During the same period defense spending has increased by 38 percent. The defense of our Nation depends not only on weapons, but upon an informed and trained people. Young men and women in the Armed Forces without the mathematical and technical skills to understand and operate complicated equipment will not contribute to the Nation's defense.

This amendment will restore funding to a number of vital education programs including title I, which serves students from low-income families, the TRIO programs, such as Upward Bound, which provide important outreach, counseling and tutoring services to encourage low income disadvantaged students to enter and complete college.

The amendment will also restore funding for vocational education. In the President's fiscal year 1987 budget, vocational education was cut by nearly 50 percent. This program has been an important one in my home State of Maine. Many students, who might not otherwise continue a post-secondary education, have benefited greatly by the availability of vocational educational programs in Maine.

Finally, the Andrews-Hollings amendment will increase funding for the Pell grants. The $221 million provided in this amendment for Pell grants will allow an additional 442,800 students to receive educational awards in fiscal year 1987. We must not abandon college students from low- and middle-income families at a time of rapidly escalating tuition costs.

Mr. President, the Federal Government must continue its historic support of public education. Access to education for all students regardless of economic circumstances is one of the greatest legacies of this Nation. Children of immigrants with no education have had an opportunity to study and learn and achieve whatever goals they have set for themselves. We must continue to provide that opportunity for future generations of American children.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I am pleased today to support the Andrews-Hollings amendment, restoring $1.2 billion to the education budget for fiscal year 1987. I support this amendment because I believe that adequate funding for education programs must remain a high priority of the Federal Government.

Since 1980, total Federal spending has grown by 65 percent. Yet, during the same period spending for education programs, including programs serving the most needy, has declined in real dollars. This record indicates to me that we in Congress may be forgetting what is truly important in terms of Federal investment. It is troubling to see that year after year the Federal budget includes wasteful, inefficient programs which do little more than sap the taxpayers' dollars, while we reduce our assistance to the Nation's schools.

What could be more important than maintaining a strong education system? The future of the United States is in the hands of the Nation's educators, and I want to ensure that they continue to have the resources necessary to train and shape the minds of our children. That is what this amendment seeks to do. Under this amendment, a principal will not be forced to cut back on salaries, reduce his teaching staff, or decide that he simply cannot afford new textbooks because of a shrinking budget.

As we have tried in recent months to address the budget crisis, we have heard a great deal of talk about priorities. The Gramm-Rudman-Hollings legislation was passed with the conviction that it would force us, at long last, to sit down and decide what really matters to us in the Federal budget and what we can do without. I believe, Mr. President, that there is still a lot of fat in the budget which we should eliminate.

It is clear to me that the choice Gramm-Rudman-Hollings is forcing us to make should include an affirmation of education's importance. The Federal budget plays a vital role in supplementing the efforts of local communities, and fine institutions of higher learning, all over the country. I know that in my State, for example, the Education for the Handicapped Program is helping people with special needs gain the same quality education as any other child. Those who administer this program, and the teachers who work with these students, make effective use of every penny they receive.

Another fine example of where this money will go is the TRIO Program, for bright high school students from disadvantaged backgrounds. TRIO programs, such as Upward Bound, have been outstandingly successful in equipping thousands of young Rhode Islanders with the skills they need to get into college, and to do well once they are there. As a final example, I would point out that this amendment will assist Federal library programs, which are included in the education budget. In addition to the important traditional services they provide to readers, our libraries are making a strong effort to fight illiteracy, which prevents millions of Americans from leading full, self-sufficient lives. I believe that as we make our difficult budget choices, these are the kinds of programs we must view as critical, and worth fighting for.

Education is about helping people make it in life. The programs which would benefit from the Andrews-Hollings amendment represent investments in people—people who will one day determine the course of this Nation, and whom we must not neglect. I am happy to vote for this amendment, and urge my colleagues to join me in supporting it.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I rise as a cosponsor of the Andrews-Hollings amendment, which restores funding for basic education programs to levels which keep pace with inflation.

Over the course of the last 5 years, we have witnessed the steady erosion of Federal funding for crucial education programs. This reduction in the Federal Government's role comes at a time when State and local governments have been tightening their belts as well. I believe that it is not overdramatization to suggest that these reductions imperil our ability to provide a viable future for our children and our grandchildren. If this trend continues, future generations may look back at the 1980's as a decade in which America began to abandon its commitment to education.

I know that all of my colleagues in this Chamber agree that we must invest in our children today if we are to see America live up to its productive potential tomorrow. This is particularly true at a time when we are facing tougher competition from abroad. In order to remain competitive as a nation, we must have a well-educated population, and the Federal Government should continue to play an integral role in support of this education.

Let me give you some examples from my own State of Massachusetts, which owes much of its prosperity to the high quality of its many and varied educational institutions. We have benefited in the past from a strong national commitment to education on all levels. On the elementary, secondary, and vocational education level, thousands of children have benefited from Federal assistance. Chapter 1, Compensatory Education for the Disadvantaged, for example, has served numerous migrant children, handicapped, and neglected and delinquent children. Chapter 1 is one of the most effective Government programs on the books and it cannot afford to suffer any further cuts.

There are many other programs for primary and secondary education that we need to support and which have been recognized by Senators ANDREWS and HOLLINGS in this amendment. Inpact aid, which provides compensation to school systems in which there is a large Federal presence, is very important to many communities in Massachusetts as well as in many other States. In addition, programs in adult and vocational education provide vital opportunities to many citizens throughout the country. These programs have just "gotten by" for the last several years and they are in need of additional funds if they are to accomplish their congressional mandate.

In higher eduation, there are more than 100,000 recipients of Federal financial assistance in Massachusetts. The Federal student financial aid programs have given these students, many of whom could not otherwise afford to attend college, access to higher education and consequently the opportunity to achieve their full academic potential. Moreover, it is clear that these Federal education programs, established during the 1960's and 1970's, are the single most important factor in Massachusetts' present prosperity.

The Domenici-Chiles budget resolution is the result of a strong bipartisan effort within the Budget Committee, and it provides a responsible base which many of us feel puts us in the right direction. The resolution, however, does not go the distance needed to ensure that we do not fall further behind in our commitment to education. The Andrews-Hollings amendment simply returns education funding for fiscal year 1987 to current services—a freeze on last year's level plus inflation. This amendment, therefore, represents a small, yet necessary improvement to the committee's budget, and a critical step toward ensuring the long-term stability of our Nation's educational system.

When I voted for the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings amendment last year, I did so in the hopes that it would force the Congress to make tough choices in order to get the massive Federal budget deficits under control. These choices must reflect the will of the American people. I know that the American people desire a strong commitment to education—to the future of our country. By adopting the Andrews-Hollings amendment, we will be displaying that commitment to the American people and reaffirming the Federal Government's role in improving our children's education. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I join today with Senator ANDREWS and Senator HOLLINGS and 29 of my other colleagues in the Senate in offering this critical amendment to provide a vital increase in funding for Federal education programs. This amendment will add $1.2 billion to restore the funding for basic education programs to current services and meets the deficit neutral requirement with a revenue offset. The budget resolution as reported out of committee freezes education funding at the 1986 level of appropriations. The resolution does assume a $300 million increase for function 500 for unspecified priorities. But this does not mean that the basic education programs will receive increases.

I wish to remind my colleagues in the Senate that this amendment represents an inflation-only increase for education programs—enough to maintain those children who are currently in these programs. The $1.2 billion will not allow for any program expansion. This increase will not enable the millions of educationally disadvantaged first graders or the many limited English proficient fifth graders to obtain the education services they need under chapter I or bilingual education because again this year there will be no Federal funding available for these programs to expand.

Year after year, President Reagan has proposed drastic reductions in Federal education programs. And year after year Congress has rejected the administration's proposals. However, Congress has not always provided the necessary funding to maintain or expand Federal education programs over the past 5 years. In real dollars, basic education programs have been cut by 15.8 percent since 1981.

We are well into the second administration of Ronald Reagan and it should be clear to every Member of this distinguished body that we cannot rely on the President to defend education. And it is more than clear that we cannot depend on Secretary Bennett to fight for the critical resources needed to teach our Nation's young students. The time has come for the Senate to accept its responsibility for educating the next generation. By adopting this amendment today, we are reaffirming our commitment to the millions of young people across the United States who are participating in education programs supported by the Federal Government.

I would like to take a moment to remind my colleagues of the role of the Federal Government in education. We are responsible for ensuring that first graders, young adults entering junior high school, high school students, and students entering higher education have ready access to quality education and are provided an equal education. That is the charge of the Federal Government and we have not been diligent in this responsibility.

There are consequences to our inactions. Thousands of young students are dropping out of our schools. According to the National Center for Educational Statistics, 25 percent of all students who enter the fifth grade do not graduate from high school in the eighth year afterwards. The Current Population Survey shows that 16 percent of 18 and 19 years olds do not have a high school diploma nor are they currently enrolled in school. The High School Survey and Beyond tells us that 14 percent of high school sophomores drop out before the end of their senior year. Estimates of the number of adults in the United States who are functionally illiterate range from 23 to 72 million. An estimated 2.3 million persons join these ranks each year.

As a nation it is our duty to provide the best education for all our children. Well educated children grow up to be knowledgeable and skillfull adults who we must depend on to strengthen our economy, to compete and prosper in an increasingly complex world, and to promote a kind and humane society.

Our goal is the maximum development of every child. It is not only morally right, but far less expensive for government to assist children in growing up whole and strong and able than to pay the bill later for children and adults who grow up with social and educational problems. Aeschylus wrote:

> In the rearing of our children, we are handing on life like a torch from one generation to another.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to demonstrate their commitment to our young children, our next generation, by adopting this amendment.

Mr THURMOND. Mr. President, it is being argued that a vote against the Andrews-Hollings amendment to restore $1.2 billion in budget authority to education programs in the Senate budget resolution is a vote against education. Yet, I have had a long history of support for education programs, and do not believe that this amendment is warranted. Similarly, the argument is that a vote against the amendment sponsored by Senator WEICKER, which would add another $600 million in budget authority for education programs for the handicapped, is a vote against handicapped individuals. However, I have always been a supporter of these programs, and do not intend to support this amendment.

The budget resolution under consideration provides for $32.1 billion in budget authority for programs under function 500—education, training, employment, and social services—during the 1987 fiscal year. This represents an increase of $1.8 billion in budget authority for this function over the 1986 fiscal year. These amendments, if passed, would double the projected increase in budget authority for this function over that provided in the pending resolution. Since current law requires amendments to be deficit-neutral, it is asserted that the additional funding sought by these amendments can be provided through "unspecified revenue enhancement."

Mr. President, I firmly believe that the average American taxpayer is tired of paying such a large percentage of his or her hard-earned income in Federal taxes. The term "unspecified revenue enhancement" is merely a fancy codeword for a tax increase.

These amendments would increase the already substantial tax burden on our citizens. Since I believe that these are worthwhile programs, it is difficult to oppose additional funding for them. However, as our Nation suffers through this deficit crisis, we must make difficult decisions. We have abdicated this responsibility for too long. Consequently, the national debt today exceeds $2 trillion.

These amendments would add funding authority beyond the increase already provided in the budget resolution before us. Furthermore, the passage of these amendments would result in a tax increase. Accordingly, I intend to vote in opposition to them.

In conclusion, the purposes of both these amendments are worthy ones, and I support the principle that more funds should be committed to these programs. However, under the current financial circumstances, I believe that it is more appropriate for the States to provide these additional funds. There is no State which is not in better fiscal condition in proportion to resources, than the Federal Government. Thus, it seems only fair, particularly during this budget crisis that States should provide a larger share of contributions to such programs. This, is especially true for education, which has traditionally been a State and local government responsibility.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I am pleased to be a cosponsor of the amendment offered by my colleague, Senator ANDREWS and Senator HOLLINGS, to increase funding for education. Quality education has never been more important to us than it is today, and it requires the continuing attention of the Senate. I compliment the two Senators for their leadership in generating bipartisan support for this critical need area.

The entire budget debate is a question of priorities, and many of my colleagues may disagree on the ordering of these priorities. As I have said, I support the efforts of the distinguished chairman and ranking minority member of the Budget Committee for their efforts to bring a fair and effective budget to the floor, and I will vote for the bill with modifications.

Mr. President, this is one modification I feel is absolutely essential. It is essential to a strong America. It is essential to the future of our children.

The Andrews-Hollings amendment brings education funding in line with the fiscal year 1986 appropriated amount—before sequestration—plus 5.7 percent for inflation. Function 500 of Senate Concurrent Resolution 120 will be increased by $1.2 billion in budget authority. The amendment meets the deficit-neutral requirement with an unspecified revenue offset to be decided by the Finance Committee.

This restoration of educational funding to current services, adjusted for inflation, reflects a sensible approach to maintain our education programs at adequate funding levels and to still meet deficit reduction goals. Adequate education funding must remain a high priority. Since 1980, Federal spending in actual dollars for elementary and secondary education programs has declined by almost 40 percent. This compares with a 66-percent increase in overall Federal spending. According to some education analysts, current Federal spending on education now constitutes only 65 cents of every $100. With the Andrews-Hollings amendment, we would increase the Federal effort by 2 cents, to a level of 67 cents for every $100. This hardly represents a budget-busting approach. In fact, it demonstrates fiscal restraint.

Mr. President, I strongly support a Federal role in public education, especially given the continuing decline in oil and gas revenues, which, in my State of New Mexico and in other States, have traditionally funded education. Also, on a national scale, our efforts to improve U.S. competitiveness in a very competitive world economy must address the need to improve our human capital resources, particularly our educational resources.

The evidence clearly demonstrates the need to continue to upgrade our educational system. An area of particular concern to me is the growing lack of teachers in certain areas of the country and in certain high need subjects. I am also concerned with the evidence of a decline in scholarships among those going into the teaching profession. A survey conducted by the National Center for Education Information in the spring and summer 1984 showed that the number of new teacher graduates dropped 53 percent from 1973 to 1983, that enrollment in teacher education programs decreased by a third, and that persons newly admitted into teacher education decreased 44 percent. Yet, the U.S. Department of Education projects that by 1993 we will need more than 1 million new elementary school teachers and more than half a million secondary school teachers. Furthermore, based on the most recent reports from the National Center for Education Statistics and other sources, the likely subject areas of greatest teacher shortage are special education, mathematics, physical sciences, computer sciences, bilingual education, and certain foreign languages.

We must begin to recognize and deal with these statistics. Unfortunately, they just scratch the surface. We must continually enhance our educational excellence in an ever more competitive world. We can begin to make a contribution today by approving this amendment.

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, with education such an important issue and with the goal of maintaining an adequate educational system primary in my mind, this vote is extremely difficult. My vote is not a vote against education. I firmly believe that we need a strong educational system at all levels. The funding of this increase for education involves raising taxes. This is not the time for a tax increase. Had the source of funding been a transfer from some other program, I might well have been able to support it.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor this amendment.

Nothing is more critical to the future security and economic well-being of this Nation than the education of our citizens. Without a citizenry at least as well educated as citizens of other industrialized nations, we can have little hope that our future will be as prosperous as we have come to expect in America; nor can we expect that we will continue to have the ability to be the leader of the free world and the defender of democracy. It takes education—not just adequate education, but excellent education—to assure such a future for our children and this Nation.

This amendment brings funding up to a level necessary to continue to provide education services now being federally financed prior to the March Gramm-Rudman cuts.

Federal education programs certainly have absorbed their fair share of budget cuts under this administration. Between fiscal year 1980 and fiscal year 1986, actual appropriations for all Federal programs grew by roughly 65 percent. During this same time period, Federal funding for education programs, across-the-board, declined in actual dollars.

These cuts have taken their toll.

Between 1980 and 1986, the Federal share of education funding expended for handicapped students fell from 12 percent to 7 percent, even though the original Federal commitment was to provide 40 percent of the funding by 1980.

These trends hold for other Federal education programs, as well. Despite an overall increase in Federal spending in the past 5 years, education programs have not participated in this real growth. Congress has kept education from being decimated by the budget cuts proposed by the administration, but it has not been able to give education programs the funding priority which I believe they require.

The amendment now before the Senate, like the efforts in past years, continues to fund the major programs at current services levels. Further, it avoids the destructive effects that another Gramm-Rudman sequester would have on education.

The effects of the March Gramm-Rudman sequester are already being felt. I have been told by education officials from West Virginia that, as a result of those cuts, roughly 70 percent of the Pell grant students in West Virginia will see their grants affected. I have received numerous calls from officials at the elementary level telling me of the cuts in the chapter I programs in West Virginia. One county in particular, Pendleton County, faces a loss of half the teachers hired for the program in that county. We must not allow these cuts to be compounded.

This amendment totals $1.2 billion in budget authority for fiscal year 1987, with estimated outlays of about $250 million. Surely this a small investment that will pay enormous dividends in our future. I belive that we cannot afford to do less. I urge the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the time of the unanimous-consent request, the clock was running, the Chair will state. The time of the Senator from North Dakota has expired and there are 20 seconds left on the part of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. ANDREWS. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 30 seconds.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I have to object, because I have been told we were going to vote at 3:30 and I have 20 seconds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, if the proponents of this amendment would have found $300 million in outlays to cut somewhere else, $2.9 billion in outlays which is the new taxes somewhere else in this budget, they would have had my support. We have a $144 billion deficit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I move to table the amendment and ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the unanimous-consent agreement called for the vote on the amendment.

Mr. DOMENICI. Parliamentary inquiry. Did not the unanimous-consent—I do not want to make a big point out of it—but did not the unanimous-consent agreement say we would vote at 3:30?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the amendment.

Mr. DOMENICI. I withdraw my request.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment numbered 1798. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] and the Senator from Florida [Mrs. HAWKINS] are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 60, nays 38, as follows:

NOT VOTING—2

Goldwater Hawkins

So the amendment (No. 1798) was agreed to.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, this will be a parliamentary inquiry. There will be no further votes by previous order, is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN) wants to lay down an amendment on revenue sharing. Obviously, we do not have very much time. We will not debate it on our side tonight, but in due course tomorrow we will take it up under the rules. Perhaps we can waive some time on it tomorrow, if necessary. We will be ready tomorrow to discuss it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

AMENDMENT NO. 1800

(Purpose: To modify the treatment of the General Revenue Sharing Program)

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, on behalf of Senators SASSER, BYRD, HEINZ, SPECTER, RIEGLE, JOHNSTON, PRYOR, LAUTENBERG, MELCHER, METZENBAUM, FORD, LONG, HART, GORE, KERRY, ANDREWS, DIXON, ROCKEFELLER, SARBANES, HEFLIN, INOUYE, HAWKINS, BURDICK, DECONCINI, and myself, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN), for himself, Mr. SASSER, Mr. BYRD, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. FORD, Mr. LONG, Mr. HART, Mr. GORE, Mr. KERRY, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. DIXON, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. INOUYE, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. BURDICK, and Mr. DECONCINI, proposes an amendment numbered 1800.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 44, strike out line 9 through line 21 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

GENERAL REVENUE SHARING

SEC. 3. Upon the enactment of—

(1) legislation authorizing budget authority of up to $4,600,000,000 annually for the General Revenue Sharing program for any or all of the fiscal years 1987, 1988, and 1989, and

(2) legislation increasing revenues for any fiscal year for which outlays are to be made under such budget authority by an amount that is—

(A) not less than the amount of the outlays to be made for such fiscal year under such budget authority, and

(B) in addition to the amounts of increased revenues required to be reported pursuant to section 2 of this concurrent resolution for such fiscal year, the authorized amounts of budget authority and outlays for such program shall be allocated to the Senate Committees on Appropriations and Finance, as appropriate, for such fiscal year, and such amounts shall be added to the total amounts of budget authority and outlays provided for in the applicable concurrent resolution.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I yield the floor with the understanding that this amendment will be the first order of business when we return to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I would like to offer my strong support for the budget resolution that is before us today.

I also wish to compliment the work of all my colleagues on the Budget Committee whose product we are now considering. In particular, the efforts of the distinguished chairman, Senator DOMENICI, and the distinguished ranking minority member, Senator CHILES, deserve special recognition. This has truly been an historic and herculean effort to achieve a bipartisan budget compromise. It has my support, and I think it is worthy of the support of all my colleagues.

It is unfortunate and unwise that the President has thus far withheld his support for the resolution and has refused to bargain to reach a new compromise. Instead he has chosen to stand at a distance and criticize the budget resolution while letting the deficit continue to mount.

It is critical to the Nation and all American people that we act to rein in the deficit. According to existing Congressional Budget Office assumptions the deficit for fiscal year 1987 will be $182.7 billion. Without any action this deficit will surely grow to exceed the $200 billion-plus deficit we reached last year. The lesson we haven't seemed to learn is that not only are the existing budget procedures not self-enforcing but that as we fiddle, Rome burns and the deficit rises higher.

We now have before us a realistic and workable compromise which does call for effective action to reduce the deficit—by $38.8 billion, to $143.9 billion. This meets the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings target of $144 billion and eliminates the need for a $16-billion sequester required by the President's budget. It does this by holding the line on defense spending at $295 billion, keeping it at zero percent real growth. It does cut some $17 billion from domestic spending, but far less drastic than the President's budget, adding back approximately $4 billion in previously called for cuts. It provides full cost-of-living adjustments for Social Security, Federal civilian and military retirees as well as other index programs. Still, total spending under the plan is reduced by $4 billion below the President's plan. Revenues would be increased by $19 billion, but this is to be done without any increase in individual taxes. The revenues would be decided upon by the Finance Committee and could easily be accomplished with a minimum corporate tax or an oil import fee.

Mr. President, this plan is a fair and workable compromise. It is far more effective in reducing the deficit than the President's plan, and it most equitably distributes the burdens of defict reduction. It also avoids the sequestering mandated by Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. Most importantly, it adds back resources for a number of critically important spending areas, including research and development, education, energy, environment, Medicare, and more.

It is imperative that we act now on this resolution in a bipartisan way to show Senator leadership and concern in this issue. I believe that with some minor changes the resolution will effectively and fairly reduce the deficit. It recognizes the fiscal situation that confronts us and it proposed a realistic solution. It has my support and it deserves the support of the President, the American people, and each of my colleagues.

Thank you Mr. President.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business for the remaining 4 minutes until 4 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE CALENDAR

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I would like to inquire of the minority leader, in behalf of the majority leader, if he is in a position to confirm the following nominations on the Executive Calendar: No. 756, Kenneth L. Ryskamp, of Florida, to be U.S. district judge for the southern district of Florida, and Calendar No. 757, Joe D.

Whitley, of Georgia, to be U.S. attorney for the middle district of Georgia.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, those two nominations have been cleared on this side of the aisle. We are ready to proceed.

Mr. DOMENICI. And Foreign Service nominations placed on the Secretary's desk beginning with Marshall D. Brown, and ending Robert A. Riccio.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, those nominations likewise have been cleared on this side.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now go into executive session to consider the nominations just identified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the nominations be considered and confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The nominations considered and confirmed en bloc are as follows:

THE JUDICIARY

Kenneth L. Ryskamp, of Florida, to be U.S. district judge for the southern district of Florida.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Joe D. Whitley, of Georgia, to be U.S. attorney for the middle district of Georgia.

NOMINATIONS PLACED ON THE SECRETARY'S DESK IN THE FOREIGN SERVICE

Foreign Service nominations beginning Marshall D. Brown, and ending Robert A. Riccio, which nominations were received by the Senate and appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 12, 1986.

STATEMENT ON THE NOMINATION OF KENNETH L. RYSKAMP, OF FLORIDA, TO BE U.S. DISTRICT JUDGE FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF FLORIDA

(By request of Mr. DOLE, the following statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD at this point:)

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, I would like to ask my colleagues to join me in supporting Mr. Kenneth Ryskamp, who has been nominated by President Reagan to serve as U.S. district judge for the southern district of Florida. His nomination was unanimously approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee. Kenneth Ryskamp will bring to this judicial post an excellent combination of personal qualities, educational background, and legal expertise.

Kenneth Ryskamp approaches this judicial post prepared to address the vital issues confronting our country today. His extensive legal clients include liability insurance companies, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, an educational institution, and title insurance companies. Time and again, he has participated in litigation defending our constitutional rights. With his specialization in the areas of appellate practice, commerical litigation, railroad law, and real estate, he knows Florida's needs and problems as they relate to Federal law.

Kenneth will serve the southern district of Florida, a most unique district. This district has the heaviest judicial caseload in the country, and experience such as Kenneth's is vital to adequately serving the people of the area. Having practiced law for most of his career in Florida, he knows the complexities of those issues unique to Florida, such as our delicate environment and our extremely high growth as a State. Florida tends to attract perpetrators of fraud, such as the recent GIC Securities which declared bankruptcy and left thousands of senior citizens without a penny of their invested savings. Kenneth's past experience in these and other areas has prepared him for a judicial appointment.

Kenneth has built a reputation in the Miami area and beyond as an outstanding lawyer. He and his wife, Karyl Sonja Honsey, moved to Miami from Michigan in 1953, and they have contributed to the Miami community since that time. I am pleased to recommend Kenneth to you, Mr. President. He will be a tremendous asset to our Federal judiciary.●

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the nominations were confirmed.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified that the Senate has given its consent to these nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now return to legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE VICE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, on behalf of the Vice President, pursuant to 22 U.S.C. 276h-276k, as amended, appoints the following Senators as members of the Senate delegation to the Mexico-United States Interparliamentary Group Meeting, to be held in Colorado Springs, CO, on May 29-June 2, 1986: The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ZORINSKY], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. DECONCINI], the Senator from Utah [Mr. HATCH], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. MATTINGLY], and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BINGAMAN].

The Chair, on behalf of the Vice President, pursuant to 22 U.S.C. 1928a-1928d, as amended, appoints the following Senators as members of the Senate delegation to the North Atlantic Assembly Spring Meeting, to be held in Luxembourg City, Luxembourg, on May 22-June 1, 1986: The Senator from Missouri [Mr. EAGLETON], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. MATHIAS], the Senator from Texas [Mr. BENTSEN], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. MCCLURE], the Senator from Utah [Mr. HATCH], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

AUTHORIZATION FOR TESTIMONY AND REPRESENTATION BY SENATE LEGAL COUNSEL

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, in behalf of the majority leader, I send to the desk a Senate resolution regarding legal counsel.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A Senate resolution (S. Res. 387) to authorize testimony by Senate employee and representation by the Senate Legal Counsel in In Re Possible Violations of 18 U.S.C. 1001.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the U.S. Department of Justice has subpoenaed an employee of the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, Mr. David F. Zorensky, to assist it by testifying before a Federal grand jury in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia investigating possible false statements in violation of 18 U.S.C. section 1001. The information sought from Mr. Zorensky was acquired in the course of his work for the committee relative to other individuals and in no way involved his own conduct.

This resolution would authorize Mr. Zorensky to testify before the grand jury and in any subsequent proceedings in this matter, except concerning anything privileged. This is in keeping with our practice of facilitating justice consistent with the privileges and rights of the Senate. The resolution would also direct the Senate legal counsel to represent Mr. Zorensky in this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 387) was agreed to. The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, is as follows:

S. RES. 387

Whereas, a Federal grand jury in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia is currently investigating possible violations of 18 U.S.C. 1001;

Whereas, counsel for the United States has served a subpoena for the taking of testimony upon David F. Zorensky, a member of the staff of the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation;

Whereas, pursuant to sections 703(a) and 704(a) of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, 2 U.S.C. 288b(a) and 288c(a) (1982), the Senate may direct its counsel to represent employees of the Senate with respect to any subpoena or order relating to their official responsibilities;

Whereas, by the privileges of the Senate of the United States and Rule XI of the Standing Rules of the Senate, no evidence under the control or in the possession of the Senate can, by the judicial process, be taken from such control or possession but by permission of the Senate;

Whereas, when it appears that testimony of employees of the Senate concerning information acquired in the course of their official duties is needful for use in any court for the promotion of justice, the Senate will take such action thereon as will promote the ends of justice consistent with the privileges and rights of the Senate: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate Legal Counsel is directed to represent David F. Zorensky in connection with his testimony in In Re Possible Violations of 18 U.S.C. § 1001.

SEC. 2. That David F. Zorensky is authorized to testify before the grand jury and in any subsequent proceedings in In Re Possible Violations of 18 U.S.C. § 1001 (D.D.C.), except concerning matters for which a privilege from testifying should be asserted.

Mr. DOMENICI. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

RECOGNITION OF THE NATIONAL GUARD AND RESERVE

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, in order to avert a truly unintended disaster, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate turn to calendar item 611, House Joint Resolution 220, dealing with the National Guard Reserve. This item has been cleared on both sides of the aisle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, this item has been cleared on this side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H.J. Res. 220) to reaffirm Congress' recognition of the vital role played by members of the National Guard and Reserve in the national defense.

Without objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

AMENDMENT NO. 1799

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk on behalf of Senator GOLDWATER and myself and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from California [Mr. WILSON], for himself and Mr. GOLDWATER, proposes an amendment numbered 1799.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of the joint resolution add the following new section:

"SEC. 2. EXTENSION OF DEADLINE RELATING TO OBLIGATION OF FUNDS FROM MILITARY PERSONNEL ACCOUNTS OF THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE.

"Notwithstanding any other provision of law, until, but not after, June 1, 1986, obligations from the Department of Defense military personnel accounts may exceed a rate in excess of the rate required to limit total obligations to the obligation ceilings established by law for such accounts for fiscal year 1986.".

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, this amendment simply states that notwithstanding other provisions in the law, and most notably an amendment added to the appropriations bill last year, there now be permitted to the Department of Defense authority to expend from its current military personnel accounts at a rate in excess of the rate required to limit total obligations to the obligation ceilings established by law for such accounts for fiscal year 1986.

The reason for this is we are facing a deadline we cannot meet, Mr. President. The House is about to go out. The President is going to Japan. There has to be a signature on this piece of legislation before May 1 to avoid the necessity that will otherwise exist for the Pentagon to lay off half a million men from the armed services.

Mr. President, I move adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 1799) was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (H.J. Res. 220) as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed, as follows:

SEC. 2. EXTENSION OF DEADLINE RELATING TO OBLIGATION OF FUNDS FROM MILITARY PERSONNEL ACCOUNTS OF THE DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE.

Notwithstanding any other provision of law, until, but not after, June 1, 1986, obligations from the Department of Defense military personnel accounts may exceed a rate in excess of the rate required to limit total obligations to the obligation ceilings established by law for such accounts for fiscal year 1986.

The title was amended so as to read, "A joint resolution to reaffirm Congress' recognition of the vital role played by members of the National Guard and Reserve in the national defense, and for other purposes."

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

NATIONAL SECRETARIES' DAY

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, here in the Senate, the crunch of daily business sometimes makes us take the people around us for granted. Today is National Secretaries Day, and, as the secretaries in the Senate (and indeed everywhere) are certainly and often taken for granted, I should like to take this occasion to pay them some attention.

Of special importance to me are the secretaries on my own staff. The demands on them are great, and the thanks they receive usually few. We don't frequently say so, but it is the simple truth that we could not function without them. My gratitude goes out today, then, to my secretaries Vicki Bear-Dodson, Julie Smith, and Loretta Shepard. They are professionals in every sense of the word, and they have my deepest appreciation.

FARM CREDIT LEGISLATION

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I read with interest the remarks by the distinguished majority leader yesterday afternoon concerning the need to pass a concurrent resolution dealing with the Farm Credit System.

I am a cosponor of the resolution intended to be proposed by the majority leader. At least I was a cosponsor of the resolution when I received a copy of it on April 7. I understand, however, that it has changed many times since then and in fact, at one point I heard it was going to be introduced as a joint resolution instead of a concurrent resolution.

I had hoped that the majority leader would have introduced the resolution 2 weeks ago. So that the Senate Agricultural Committee could have considered the resolution and reported it out, perhaps with no amendments.

I agree with the majority leader that it is imperative that we send a clear signal to the Farm Credit System. However, I do not believe a nonbinding resolution will accomplish very much if anything. It will more than likely provide a sense of false hope to the borrowers of the Farm Credit System, because it will be more words without the power of law to back it up.

It's my understanding that Frank Naylor, the President's designated nominee to the Farm Credit Administration Board, has indicated a willingness to write regulations which would provide for maximum forebearance to Farm Credit System borrowers. That's all well and good, Mr. President, however, Mr. Naylor is not presently a member of the Farm Credit Administration Board. Further, unless the White House moves quickly and designates the Democratic nominee to the board, it could be months before the Farm Credit Administration Board is in place. I believe we all had hoped that the White House would have acted more promptly in making the appointments. We have all hoped that the board and the Capital Corporation could have been in place and operational long before now. The White House apparently has not recognized the urgent situation facing the borrowers of the Farm Credit System. Consequently, Mr. President, I don't believe we can wait for Mr. Naylor to become chairman of the Farm Credit Administration Board and implement regulations which would provide forbearance.

I believe, Mr. President, that we need statutory language requiring the Farm Credit System to provide forbearance to its borrowers and we need to consider legislation now. If we are really interested in helping the farmers in this country we will not wave a flag of false hope; rather, we will give them real hope by considering meaningful farm credit legislation.

Mr. President, I am not requesting that the majority leader agree to passing legislation I am sponsoring. I am asking the majority leader to decide whether or not farm credit assistance is important enough to be considered by the full Senate. I would be happy to offer my amendment to any vehicle he chooses.

It has been suggested that those of us interested in considering credit legislation have shown up at the last minute. The Senate has adopted two farm bills already this year, the so-called cross compliance bill and the Food Security Improvements Act. Before both bills were considered, I indicated my strong interest in offering a credit amendment to both bills. However, at the urging of the majority leader and others who were interested in seeing both of these bills passed quickly, I did not offer my amendment. I made it clear then that I wanted farm credit legislation considered. In addition, when the majority leader first circulated his concurrent resolution, I again indicated that I wanted the Senate to have an opportunity to consider farm credit legislation. We are simply asking that a reasonable date certain be given for the Senate to consider farm credit legislation. Only in that way will a concurrent resolution dealing with farm credit be meaningful. Without subsequent action on a meaningful farm credit package, the concurrent resolution will provide no real assistance to the farmers and ranchers in this Nation. In the past on farm legislation, the majority leader and I have worked together many times.

It is time for all of us to sit down together and set up a timetable for the consideration of a farm credit package that will really help farmers. Farmers cannot make mortgage payments or restructure their debts with an armload of election year platitudes contained in resolutions without the force of law.

RESPONSE TO LIBYA

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, United States military action against Libya on April 14 serves a stern notice to all of our Nation's enemies that military forces of the United States can and will be used—if necessary—in the defense of our citizens and our interests.

In an editorial on Wednesday, April 16, the Anchorage Times compliments President Reagan for his role in strengthening the military, so it can carry out its role as an instrument of national policy. This editorial also calls on our allies to support our Nation and our President in the defense of democracy and the struggle against oppression.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial in the April 16, Anchorage Times, to which I have referred, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Anchorage Times, Apr. 16, 1986]

RESPONSE TO LIBYA

A positive response to the attack on Libya would be expected from Alaskans. They live in a land of confrontations where they must defend their lives, liberty and property from natural and man-made enemies. They respond almost daily to oppressive situations.

Alaskans spring together when they face major issues that affect their land or their lives. During the last 100 years, they have stood together to overcome obstacles that appeared insurmountable on the land, on the sea or in the air in extreme conditions of temperature or location.

They stand their ground against intrusion or invasion by man, animals, winds, cold, rain, snow or anything else nature or mankind throws at them.

Alaskans should applaud the response to Libya's terrorism, an action that should, but probably won't, silence the administration's critics who argue that the military is useless as a response to terrorists.

President Reagan has now proven them wrong in that claim, just as they have been proven wrong in others. He has also shown by deed as well as word that the U.S. will defend its citizens. When he says he will table specific action, he will not fail to deliver.

Perhaps the nation is now seeing the payoff from the Reagan policies of the past six years during which he strengthened the national economy by eliminating inflation, reducing unemployment, increasing production. At the same time he strengthened the military establishment so it could carry out its role as an instrument of national policy.

Alaskans were strong for Ronald Reagan when he was running for president and he has not disappointed them. He has restored the pride of the people in their nation and has been eminently successful in handling national power.

In foreign relations his first concern was about military power. He rebuilt it in his first term and became the first president since Richard Nixon who improved America's geopolitical preeminence.

In that rebuilding effort, Alaska benefitted by a general strengthening and renovation of the military forces and their installations here. The Sixth Division for the U.S. Army marks the first time Alaska has had troops assigned to the defense of their state.

It is to be hoped that America's allies will recognize the effectiveness of the Reagan Doctrine and will support it.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED

At 1:59 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Ms. Goetz, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker has signed the following enrolled joint resolutions:

S.J. Res. 215. Joint resolution providing for reappointment of William G. Bowen as a citizen regent of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution;

S.J. Res. 286. Joint resolution to designate the week of April 20, 1986, through April 26, 1986, as "National Reading Is Fun Week"; and

S.J. Res. 296. Joint resolution to designate October 16, 1986, as "World Food Day".

The enrolled joint resolutions were subsequently signed by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED

At 3:02 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Berry, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker has signed the following enrolled joint resolutions:

S.J. Res. 214. Joint resolution providing for reappointment of Carlisle H. Humelsine as a citizen regent of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution; and

S.J. Res. 275. Joint resolution designating May 11 through May 17, 1986, as "Jewish Heritage Week".

The enrolled joint resolutions were subsequently signed by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

At 3:11 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Ms. Goetz, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House agrees to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 2 to the bill (H.R. 3551) to amend title 18, United States Code, with respect to certain bribery and related offenses; and that the House agrees to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3 to the bill, with an amendment, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House has passed the following bill, and joint resolutions, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 4022. An act to release restrictions on certain property located in Calcasieu Parish, Louisiana, and for other purposes;

H.J. Res. 544. Joint resolution to designate May 7, 1986, as "National Barrier Awareness Week"; and

H.J. Res. 604. Joint resolution providing for appointment to the service academies of children of members of the Armed Forces killed in the military action against Libya on April 15, 1986.

MEASURES REFERRED

The following joint resolutions were read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated:

H.J. Res. 544. Joint resolution to designate May 7, 1986, as "National Barrier Awareness Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H.J. Res. 604. Joint resolution providing for appointment to the service academies of children of members of the Armed Forces killed in the military action against Libya on April 15, 1986; to the Committee on Armed Services.

MEASURE PLACED ON THE CALENDAR

The following bill was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and placed on the calendar:

H.R. 4022. An act to release restrictions on certain property located in Calcasieu Parish, Louisiana, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND] announced that on today, April 23, 1986, he signed the following enrolled bill which had previously been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

S. 1684. An act to declare that the United States holds certain Chilocco Indian School lands in trust for the Kaw, Otoe-Missouria, Pawnee, Ponca, and Tonkawa Indian Tribes of Oklahoma; and

S. 2319. An act to provide for the continuation of the Martin Luther King, Jr., Federal Holiday Commission until 1989, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS PRESENTED

The Secretary of the Senate reported that on today, April 23, 1986, she had presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions:

S. 1684. An act to declare that the United States holds certain Chilocco Indian School lands in trust for the Kaw, Otoe-Missouria, Pawnee, Ponca, and Tonkawa Indian Tribes of Oklahoma;

S. 2319. An act to provide for the continuation of the Martin Luther King, Jr., Federal Holiday Commission until 1989, and for other purposes;

S.J. Res. 214. Joint resolution providing for reappointment of Carlisle H. Hummelsine as a citizen regent of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution;

S.J. Res. 215. Joint resolution providing for reappointment of William G. Bowen as a citizen regent of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution;

S.J. Res. 275. Joint resolution designating May 11 through May 17, 1986, as "Jewish Heritage Week";

S.J. Res. 286. Joint resolution to designate the week of April 20, 1986, through April 26, 1986, as "National Reading Is Fun Week"; and

S.J. Res. 296. Joint resolution to designate October 16, 1986, as "World Food Day."

EXECUTIVE AND OTHER COMMUNICATIONS

The following communications were laid before the Senate, together with accompanying papers, reports, and documents, which were referred as indicated:

EC-3026. A communication from the Director of the Office of Management and Budget transmitting, pursuant to law, the cumulative report on rescissions and deferrals as of April 1, 1986; jointly, pursuant to the order of January 30, 1975, to the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on the Budget.

EC-3027. A communication from the Director of the Accounting and Financial Management Division of GAO transmitting, pursuant to law, a report entitled "Fraud Hotline—DOD Fraud Hotline: Generally Effective but Some Changes Needed"; to the Committee on Armed Services.

EC-3028. A communication from the Secretary of the Federal Trade Commission transmitting, pursuant to law, the annual report under the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

EC-3029. A communication from the Administrator of the General Services Administration transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on requests for relief under extraordinary emergency authority in 1985; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

EC-3030. A communication from the Secretary of Commerce transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to repeal section 10 of the Fisherman's Protective Act; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

EC-3031. A communication from the Administrator of AID transmitting, pursuant to law, the Agency's annual report relative to actions to increase the representation of minority group members and women in the Foreign Service; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EC-3032. A communication from the Chief Judge of the U.S. Claims Court transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on its actions relative to the bill S. 413; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EC-3033. A communication from the Secretary of Education transmitting a letter of continuing support for enactment of proposed legislation transmitted to Congress on March 12, 1985; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. MATHIAS, from the Committee on Rules and Administration, with amendments and an amendment to the title:

S. Res. 374. Resolution limiting the amount that may be expended by Senators for mass mailings during the remainder of fiscal year 1986 (Rept. No. 99-285).

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following executive reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. LUGAR, from the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Treaty Doc. 99-9. Vienna Convention for the Protection of the Ozone Layer, done at Vienna on March 22, 1985 (with additional views) (Exec. Rept. No. 99-13).

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first and second time by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. SASSER:

S. 2358. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to provide for an optional part C program to furnish comprehensive, catastrophic, long-term, and preventive benefits through prepaid plans; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. PRESSLER:

S. 2359. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to establish a Veterans' Administration Readjustment Counseling Professional Fellowship Program; to the Committee on Veterans Affairs.

By Mr. CHAFEE:

S. 2360. A bill to temporarily suspend the duty on 4-chloro-2,5-dimethoxy aniline; to the Committee on Finance.

S. 2361. A bill to temporarily suspend the duty on 3-nitro phenyl-4-beta-hydroxy sulfone; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. GORE:

S. 2362. A bill to provide that Bell operating companies may provide information services and manufacture telecommunications equipment, subject to regulation by the Federal Communications Commission; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

SUBMISSION OF CONCURRENT AND SENATE RESOLUTIONS

The following concurrent resolutions and Senate resolutions were read, and referred (or acted upon), as indicated:

By Mr. DOMENICI (for Mr. DOLE (for himself and Mr. BYRD)):

S. Res. 387. Resolution to authorize testimony by Senate employee and representation by the Senate Legal Counsel in In Re Possible Violations of 18 U.S.C. section 1001; considered and agreed to.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. SASSER:

S. 2358. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to provide for an optional part C program to furnish comprehensive, catastrophic, long-term, and preventive benefits through pre-paid plans; to the Committee on Finance.

MEDICARE PART C: CATASTROPHIC HEALTH INSURANCE ACT

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I am today introducing legislation which will provide assistance to millions of older Americans desiring insurance to cover health care services for catastrophic illness and other medical services. My legislation is a companion measure to H.R. 4287, introduced in the House by Congressman CLAUDE PEPPER who is renowned for his expertise in matters affecting the elderly.

Catastrophic illness is a common occurrence among Americans. Over 6 million elderly Americans suffer from chronic heart conditions. Nearly 4 million have been stricken by Alzheimer's disease. Almost 2 million older persons experience the ravages of cancer. And 2.5 million suffer from some other form of chronic disease. Sadly, as many as 1 million Americans will be forced into poverty and onto the welfare rolls this year due to the catastrophic costs of the health care they need.

Catastrophic illness or the need for long-term care can be emotionally and financially devastating—both to the individual and to his or her family. Such unpredictable instances are the cause of needless human trauma which, at the very least, can be minimized by some form of financial security not available today at affordable rates. There is a real need for legislative action to provide security for individuals who are struck by a catastrophic illness. Indeed, there has been no less than a public outcry calling for new law.

Furthermore, Medicare beneficiaries are increasingly paying out more personal funds in order to obtain the health care services they need and which are not presently covered under Medicare. Older Americans are now paying an average of $1,500 annually in out-of-pocket expenses for their health care. Quite frankly, the gaps in Medicare benefits, along with rising deductibles, premiums, and copayments are an increasing cause for concern among most senior citizens.

My bill remedies this situation by providing for a new Medicare part C which would be available as an option to current and future Medicare beneficiaries who enroll in both Medicare part A and part B. The new part C would effectively plug many of the holes which exist in current Medicare coverage while eliminating the premium, deductibles, and copayments required under parts A and B. Moreover, the most important aspect of this measure is that it will, without cost to the Medicare system, provide for coverage for long-term care and catastrophic illness.

As most of my colleagues know, Medicare does not presently cover many medical services which are needed by its beneficiaries. For example, certain types of care such as hearing, vision, dental, and foot care are services which are necessary for older individuals, yet these are not covered. Further, our older citizens need to have physical examinations on a regular basis, but these, too, are not covered services. My legislation would provide Medicare coverage for these, and other, important services.

Second, by paying one premium for the Medicare part C coverage, beneficiaries would no longer be required to pay the Medicare part A deductible when they are hospitalized. Nor would they be required to pay any copayments which have invariably accompanied the delivery of health care services to Medicare beneficiaries. In essence, this legislation allows Medicare beneficiaries to pay a single monthly premium, thereby eliminating all other out-of-pocket expenses for covered services.

Most important, this new Medicare part C would cover long term care in nursing homes and at home, as well as provide extended care required for catastrophic illness. Currently, nursing home care and hospital care beyond the 60th day are presently not Medicare-reimbursable. Home care is partially reimbursed, but these payments are being reduced more and more due to administrative reimbursement changes.

Funding for the new part C of Medicare program would come from a new part C premium and beneficiary payments previously made to the part A and part B trust funds. Medicare would take competitive bids from health care providers to provide both the comprehensive benefits set forth in this bill as well as standard covered services under parts A and B. Providers would do this for a predetermined capitated rate per beneficiary. At the time of enrollment of a new part C beneficiary, a sum equal to the average annual per-beneficiary Medicare payment—regionally adjusted—would be transferred from those trust funds into the new part C fund. Medicare would then contract with the beneficiary's chosen providers which would then be paid the capitated rate: a sum equal to the average payment for covered services under parts A and B multiplied by 133 percent. Providers would provide all the health care services covered previously under parts A and B and all new services included in this bill. For 1986, the estimated capitated rate would be about $3,200.

The part C beneficiary is subject only to an annual premium, in monthly installments, equal to 25 percent of the national average of the capitated provider payment. This annual premium may not exceed 20 percent of the beneficiary's annual gross income from the previous year. To compensate for any lost premiums, all beneficiaries will pay premiums for a month before their coverage begins, thereby raising nearly $7 billion, to offset any revenue foregone. For 1986, the beneficiary premium would be about $800. Current Medicare out-or-pocket expenses plus the cost of a Medigap insurance policy—that is, currently available insurance which reimburses only for deductibles and copayments—are at this level already. Indeed, since older Americans presently pay an average of $1,500 per year in our-of-pocket expenses for health care services, this premium represents a reduction in out-of-pocket expenses per beneficiary of about 47 percent.

Part C will also provide the opportunity for Medicare beneficiaries who are also Medicaid eligible to participate in the comprehensive capitation plan. Because part C covers catastrophic illness and long term care—services presently provided for eligible poor under Medicaid—States will be allowed to "buy in" to part C coverage by paying 90 percent of what it would have cost them to provide Medicaid coverage to their Medicaid-eligible Medicare beneficiaries. These funds from the States's Medicaid program would go into the part C trust fund and Medicare beneficiaries who are Medicaid eligible would also be served by the contracted providers.

I am hopeful that my colleagues will join me by cosponsoring this important health care legislation to establish insurance for catastrophic illness and long term care. This is a matter of great concern to our seniors, and I believe that it is time for us to act to provide security for these persons who potentially face trauma and great financial loss.

By Mr. PRESSLER:

S. 2359. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to establish a Veterans' Administration Readjustment Counseling Professional Fellowship Program; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION READJUSTMENT COUNSELING PROFESSIONAL FELLOWSHIP PROGRAM

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I am introducting legislation today which addresses serious unmet readjustment needs of Vietnam veterans in the area of health care.

It has been more than 10 years since the fall of Saigon. Some of the millions of Americans who served in Indochina during the Vietnam war have problems, among them alcohol and drug abuse, depression, marital problems, aggressive behavior, and arrests and convictions for criminal behavior. Many of the servicemen from that era brought home with them a haunting sickness in the form of posttraumatic stress disorder [PTSD]. PTSD has lingered among the veterans of the Vietnam war, and I believe the time is overdue to confront the problem and help the individuals who suffer from it.

When we brought our troops home from Southeast Asia, debriefing was very minimal and medical screening was usually superficial. When disturbed young veterans tried to seek professional help after stress symptoms developed, they were denied treatment by physicians and other health care personnel who were not really familiar with combat-induced stress disorders. These include depression, panic attack, excessive use of drugs and alcohol, and behavioral disturbance. Many Vietnam veterans with posttraumatic stress disorder began to avoid medical facilities, particularly those of the Veterans' Administration. Some even withdrew or sought relief in isolation with drugs and alcohol.

Thus, the earliest opportunities to detect, examine, study, and treat PTSD were all but lost. Any knowledge about treatment of similar stress casualties from World Wars I and II and the Korean war seemed forgotten. Little attention was paid to stress disorders in our postgraduate educational programs and academic centers.

In 1979, the Vets Centers system was created and veterans were hired and trained very rapidly for these centers. During the past few years the Vietnam Veterans of America have worked to ensure that all these centers are properly staffed, including at least one clinician who has a formal clinical degree and specific training in the treatment of post-traumatic stress disorder. Two basic elements are needed if these Vets Centers are to achieve their goals: First, Vets Centers must be effectively administered by persons who have the clinical skills to help Vietnam veterans or any veterans recover from PTSD; and second, each center must foster an atmosphere of trust between the Readjustment Counseling Service [RCS] personnel at every level, and between the center and the local community.

Many Vietnam veterans returned home to hostility. They considered themselves as outcasts. The only place they could turn was to fellow veterans, and especially to those involved with the Vets Centers. So the issue of trust is vital to the success of these centers. Many outreach counselors have left the centers for a variety of reasons. Mr. President, my legislation would assure that counselors in Vets Centers have the ability to counsel, screen, and test Vietnam veterans and any other veterans who may suffer from PTSD and provide them effective therapy, readjustment, and rehabilitation for their unique medical and psychosocial readjustment problems. Costs of the legislation will be absorbed within existing VA appropriations.

It was not until the dedication of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial at Constitution Gardens in Washington, DC, that these veterans finally began to come home. I urge our distinguished colleagues to join with me in providing veterans yet another step forward in their long awaited return home.

By Mr. CHAFEE:

S. 2360. A bill to temporarily suspend the duty on 4-chloro-2,5-dimethoxyaniline; to the Committee on Finance.

S. 2361. A bill to temporarily suspend the duty on 3-nitro phenyl-4-beta-hydroxysulfone; to the Committee on Finance.

SUSPENSION OF DUTY ON CERTAIN TEXTILE CHEMICALS

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, today I am introducing 2 bills to suspend the duty on the importation of two chemicals that are precursors used in the production of printing ink and dyes for textiles. These particular chemicals are not produced in the United States. The suspension of the duty will act to lower the overall cost of producing textiles in this country.

As we are all aware, the textile industry has been hit especially hard by imports. I want to do all I can to keep this American industry on a fair competitive footing with its foreign competition. Because our foreign competitors can print and dye their textiles without the added costs that this duty imposes, that obviously means that this duty places our domestic industry at a competitive disadvantage.

Since there is no domestic production of these chemicals to be adversely affected by a suspension of this duty, it is senseless to continue it. My bills suspend the duties on these two chemicals, 3-nitro phenyl-4-beta-hydroxysulfone—(also known as nitro sufon B)—and 4-chloro-2,5-dimethoxyaniline)—also known as chlor amino base, through December 31, 1990. This will give us time to study the effect of the duty suspension on the chemical industry to determine if we should then repeal the duty outright or continue the suspension for another period.●

S. 2362. A bill to provide that Bell operating companies may provide information services and manufacture telecommunications equipment, subject to regulation by the Federal Communications Commission; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS EQUITY ACT

● Mr. GORE. Mr. President, during the 27 months following the breakup of AT&T, we have witnessed widespread customer confusion, rate hikes, federally mandated consumer access charges, major inefficiencies created by court-ordered restrictions on the regional telephone companies—all producing a serious threat to our national commitment to affordable, universally available telephone service.

Today I am introducing legislation to address many of the problems created since divestiture, especially those which have placed rural telephone customers in jeopardy.

Theoretically, the Justice Department consent decree, through the modified final judgment [MFJ], and the Federal Communications Commission, are in a position to responsibly manage the transition from a national monopoly telephone system to one with many competitive players. Theoretically, all telephone customers would benefit from new competition from new technologies and the many new businesses created by divestiture.

Instead, we have a very few winners—the surviving competitors to AT&T and major corporations with extra cash to invest in new equipment to bypass local telephone companies—and many, many losers. Those include almost all rural telephone customers and the small companies who serve them, as well as small businesses and residential telephone users who make few long distance calls.

This shift in the burden of supporting telephone service from large users to local customers has taken the form of federally mandated customer access charges. The theory is that local customers, whether or not they make long distance calls, should pay an increasing share of the cost of providing long distance service access to the competing long distance companies.

The FCC access charges, now $1 per month for residential users, are scheduled to double, to $2 per month on June 1. The original FCC proposal pegged these charges at $4 per month, per line, increasing annually to $7 per month, so it is not unrealistic to expect further federally mandated telephone rate hikes in future years.

Business customers already pay a $4-$6 per-month per-line charge.

Supporters of these charges claim that local customers must pay a greater and greater share of providing long distance service in order that the threat of "bypass" can be reduced. Bypass of local telephone systems has been, legitimately, cited as the No. 1 threat to universal service, as large business users abandon traditional delivery systems for cheaper options.

However, there is no evidence that the federally mandated access charges have reduced bypass at all. In fact, large business users will continue to purchase equipment and services to reduce their telecommunications costs, and small businesses and residential customers will bear the burden.

Another justification for forcing local customers to pay these access charges was that long distance charges would drop dramatically, largely because they would be able to take advantage of competitive long distance services. The problem with that view is that most rural customers do not have direct access to these competitive services. The FCC access charges are simply adding insult to injury.

My bill, the Telecommunications Equity Act of 1986, would overturn these unjustified access charges, and return the cost of providing long distance service to those who use it. The bill requires the FCC to study the effectiveness of access charges in preventing bypass and report to Congress and receive approval before imposing any further charges.

The restrictions which preclude the regional telephone companies from engaging in competitive manufacturing and information services have kept significant revenues from flowing into the local rate base, thus keeping local telephone rates artifically high. Moreover, these court-ordered restrictions have created inefficiencies which prevent customers from receiving lowest cost services which could be easily added to the local system. In addition, the regional companies have been unable to participate in efforts to reduce the growing deficit we suffer in telecommunications equipment trade.

My bill would remove those restrictions, while preserving reasonable protections against cross-subsidies and ensuring that companies competing with the regional companies will be given fair and reasonable access to the local networks to offer their services.

Rural telephone service has been hardest hit by divestitures. To preserve universal service in these areas, three important practices have been in effect—first, the averaging of all long-distance tolls; second, the pooling of common carrier contributions to local service for "non-traffic sensitive" [NTS] costs; and third, a universal service fund to ensure that small, rural telephone companies are able to recover enough of their costs to stay in business. While the FCC and AT&T have claimed that they "have no plans" to seek the dismantling of toll-rate averaging, testimony at recent hearings has indicated that toll-rate averaging could be abandoned to "meet market place demands." Of more immediate concern, several regional telephone companies have filed proposed plans with the FCC to effectively withdraw from the common carrier line pool agreements. And, with the possibility of movement away from averaged charges nationwide, the universal service fund now in place would be in jeopardy.

My bill preserves these three efficient, fair systems—toll rate averaging, common carrier line pooling, and a strong universal service fund for small, rural companies—all vital to preserving affordable rural telephone service.

This bill will not significantly reverse the national trend toward deregulation of our expanding telecommunications economy. The bill eases regulations that are mostly counterproductive, while restoring some strength to our commitment to universal telephone service for all customers, especially those in rural areas.

This legislation has the strong support of the National Telephone Cooperative Association. I encourage my colleages to cosponsor this effort to correct many of the problems that face our constituents since the breakup of AT&T.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2362

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Telecommunications Equity Act of 1986".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) the public interest is served by a national telecommunications system which provides efficient, affordable local telephone service and emerging telecommunications opportunities for all residential and business users;

(2) the transition from a monopoly telephone system to a fully competitive environment has produced customer confusion, fears about rapidly increasing telephone rates, and uncertainty for all sectors of the telephone industry;

(3) the continued availability of affordable universal telephone service requires that all exchange carriers be viable businesses in order to fulfill the commitment to such service;

(4) such economic viability is threatened by Federal policies and other restrictions which place Bell operating companies and small and rural carriers at a disadvantage in providing customers with affordable telephone services and new telecommunications technologies;

(5) economic growth and international competitiveness of the United States telecommunications industry are important and vital to—

(A) the long-term research and development projects and programs of the United States telecommunications industry;

(B) the rapid development and introduction into the marketplace of new and innovative telecommunications equipment and services for United States residential and business telecommunications users;

(C) the development of efficient, reliable, and state-of-the-art telecommunications networks to serve the needs of United States telecommunications consumers; and

(D) the maximizing of employment opportunities for United States workers in the telecommunications industry.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. For purposes of this Act—

(1) the term "Bell operating companies" has the same meaning as such term has in the Modification Final Judgment entered August 24, 1982, the United States v. Western Electric, Civil Action No. 82-0192 (United States District Court, District of Columbia), except that such term does not include any centralized organization for the provision of engineering, research, and administrative services, the cost of which are shared by such operating companies or the affiliates of such companies;

(2) the term "information services" has the same meaning as such term has in such Modification;

(3) the term "electronic publishing" has the same meaning as such term has in such Modification;

(4) the term "telecommunications equipment" has the same meaning as such term has in such Modification, except that such term includes customer premises equipment (as defined in such Modification); and

(5) the term "Commission" means the Federal Communications Commission.

AUTHORITY TO PROVIDE INFORMATION SERVICES AND TO MANUFACTURE TELECOMMUNICATIONS EQUIPMENT

SEC. 4. A Bell operating company may engage in the provision of information services or in the manufacture of telecommunications equipment, or both, in accordance with the provisions of this Act.

AUTHORITY TO REGULATE

SEC. 5. (a)(1) No later than ninety days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Commission shall promulgate such rules and regulations with regard to charges, practices, and classifications of information services and the manufacture of telecommunications equipment as the Commission determines necessary.

(2) For the purposes of this subsection the term "information services" shall not include electronic publishing.

(b) Rules and regulations promulgated under subsection (a) shall apply to a Bell operating company only after the Commission determines, after consultation with the Secretary of Commerce and the United States Attorney General, that there is not a substantial possibility that any Bell operating company could impede competition in the information services or telecommunications equipment manufacturing business.

(c) A Bell operating company may engage in the provision of information services pursuant to the authority granted in section 4, if the Commission determines, after notice to and opportunity for comment by interested parties, that the provision of the information service in question shall not harm competition and is required by the public interest. In determining whether a Bell operating company application for the provision of an information service should be granted, the Commission shall consider—

(1) the impact on competition;

(2) the appropriate safeguards to prevent competitive injury;

(3) the conduct of the applicant in providing equal access and reasonably requested interconnection to other providers of telecommunications services;

(4) the interests of monopoly ratepayers and competitors in preventing the cross subsidization of the proposed information services; and

(5) the benefits that would result from provision by the applicant of such information service.

REPORT ON EMPLOYMENT IMPACT

SEC. 6. (a) The Commission shall annually assess the impact of this Act on employment in the telecommunications equipment manufacturing and information services industries. The Commission shall include in its annual report to Congress pursuant to section 5(g) of the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. 155(g) a summary of the results of the assessment which shall contain—

(1) a description of negotiations and other actions taken by the Bell operating companies to—

(A) increase employment in the United States within the telecommunications industry as a result of this act;

(B) reduce direct and indirect adverse effects on employment in the telecommunications industry that may result from engaging in new business operations as a result of this Act; and

(2) an estimate, developed in consultation with the Department of Labor, of net changes in employment as a result of this Act, together with a breakdown of the data used in developing such estimate.

(b) The Commission shall, in conducting the assessment required by subsection (a), provide interested persons the opportunity to present written and oral comment on matters to be included in the report required by such subsection.

ACCESS CHARGES

SEC. 7. (a) The Commission shall suspend the order on subscriber line charges No. 97-F.C.C. 2d 834 (1984) until—

(1) the Commission reports to Congress regarding consumer benefits derived from existing end-user allocations; and

(2) Congress approves such order by joint resolution. (b) Such report shall include—the degree to which bypass of local exchange carrier services is caused by the allocation of nontraffic sensitive costs of connecting interexchange carriers to local exchange customers; the economic harm caused to local exchange carrier operations as a result of such bypass;

the degree to which interexchange carriers have reduced and can be expected to further reduce customer long distance charges as a result of current and proposed end-user charges;

the effectiveness of existing and proposed charges in assisting exchange carriers reduce economically harmful instances of bypass by preserving primary use of the local exchange by large-volume business customers;

net benefits derived from current and proposed end-user charges for residential and business customers—

(A) served by both dominant and other competing interexchange carrier; and

(B) served only by a dominant interexchange carrier; and

(C) which make few or no interexchange toll calls; and

(6) the potential reduction in the aggregate number of local telephone customers resulting from federally-mandated end-user charges and any other charges occuring because of Federal end-user charges.

PROHIBITION ON TOLL RATE DE-AVERAGING

SEC. 8. The Commission may not approve any tariff or petition, issue any ruling or promulgate any regulation which directly or indirectly results in de-averaging of interexchange tolls.

BYPASS

SEC. 9. The Commission may not approve any tariff request or other petition, issue any ruling, or promulgate any regulation which increases the bypass of local exchange services by any user, unless—

(1) the Commission documents that such bypass results in net benefits for all customers; and

(2) no local rate increases will occur.

CARRIER COMMON LINE POOLING

SEC. 10. The Commission may not approve any plan which permits any exchange carrier to withdraw from—

(1) the carrier common line pooling agreement administered by the National Exchange Carrier Association; or

(2) any other carrier common line pooling agreement in effect on the date of enactment of this Act.

UNIVERSAL SERVICE FUND

SEC. 11. The federal access charge plan should include adequate support for small, rural telephone systems through a universal service fund which is targeted to ensure that rural telephone rates remain reasonable and affordable.

ALTERNATIVE INTEREXCHANGE SERVICES

SEC. 12. (a) No later than one hundred and eighty days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Commission shall report to Congress on the economic benefits of permitting local exchange carriers to provide interexchange service in areas where equal access has been provided in accordance with the modified final judgment cited in section 3(1).

(b) Such study shall include the —

(1) effect on competition and economic viability of dominant and other interexchange carriers; and

(2) potential benefits for local customers not served by other interexchange carriers.●

Mr. DOMENICI (for Mr. DOLE, for himself and Mr. BYRD and Mr. ABDONR) submitted the following resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

S. RES. 387

Whereas, a Fedeal grand jury in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia is currently investigating possible violations of 18 U.S.C. § 1001;

Whereas, counsel for the United States has served a subpoena for the taking of testimony upon David F. Zorensky, a member of the staff of the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation;

Whereas, pursuant to sections 703(a) and 704(a) of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, 2 U.S.C. §§ 288b(a) and 288c(a) (1982), the Senate may direct its counsel to represent employees of the Senate with respect to any subpoena or order relating to their official responsibilities;

Whereas, by the privileges of the Senate of the United States and Rule XI of the Standing Rules of the Seante, no evidence under the control or in the possession of the Senate can, by the judicial process, be taken from such control or possession but by permission of the Senate;

Whereas, when it appears that testimony of employees of the Senate concerning information acquired in the course of their official duties is needful for use in any court for the promotion of justice, the Senate will take such action thereon as will promote the ends of justice consistent with the privileges and rights of the Senate: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate Legal Counsel is directed to represent David F. Zorensky in connection with his testimony in In Re Possible Violations of 18 U.S.C. § 1001.

SEC. 2. That David F. Zorensky is authorized to testify before the grand jury and in any subsequent proceedings in In Re Possible Violations of 18 U.S.C. § 1001 (D.D.C.), except concerning matters for which a privilege from testifying should be asserted.

SENSE OF THE CONGRESS

SEC. 4. TERMINATION AND REDUCTION OF PROGRAMS.—It is the sense of the Congress that $4,343,000,000 of the spending (outlay) reductions in fiscal year 1987 assumed in this concurrent resolution should be achieved through program terminations and significant program reductions in 43 areas, as proposed by the President's budget request for fiscal year 1987, affecting the following programs: Export-Import Bank direct loans; OPIC insurance programs; advanced communications technology satellite; Rural Electrification Administration subsidies; weatherization assistance programs; EPA sewage treatment grants; soil conservation programs; LANDSAT; sea grant and coastal zone management; Department of Agriculture extension service; temporary emergency food and shelter; Federal crop insurance program; trade adjustment assistance to firms; U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration; postal subsidy; rural housing loans; Small Business Administration; Section 202 housing; Amtrak; Interstate Commerce Commission; Washington Metro; Maritime Cargo Preference Expansion; Appalachian Regional Commission; Economic Development Administration; Urban Development Action Grants; rental housing development grants (HODAG-RRG); Section 312 rehabilitation loan fund; Section 108 loan guarantee program; Rural development program; SBA disaster loans; Community service block grant; Impact aid (Part B); Library programs; Small higher education programs; State student incentive grants; College housing loans; Public health service (health profession subsidies); FEMA supplemental food and shelter; Section 8 moderate rehabilitation; Rural housing grants; Legal Services Corporation; Justice grants; Public debt reimbursement to Federal Reserve Banks.

RECOGNITION OF THE VITAL ROLE OF THE NATIONAL GUARD AND THE RESERVE

WILSON (AND GOLDWATER) AMENDMENT NO. 1799

Mr. WILSON (for himself and Mr. GOLDWATER) proposed an amendment to the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 220) to reaffirm Congress' support and recognition of the vital role played by members of the National Guard and Reserve in the national defense; as follows:

At the end of the joint resolution, add the following new section:

"SEC. 2. Extension of Deadline Relating to Obligation of Funds from Military Personnel Accounts of the Department of Defense

"Notwithstanding any other provision of law, until, but not after, June 1, 1986, obligations from the Department of Defense military personnel accounts may exceed a rate in excess of the rate required to limit total obligations to the obligation ceilings established by law for such accounts for fiscal year 1986.".

FIRST CONCURRENT RESOLUTION ON THE BUDGET

MOYNIHAN (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 1800

Mr. MOYNIHAN (for himself, Mr. SASSER, Mr. BYRD, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. FORD, Mr. HART, Mr. GORE, Mr. KERRY, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. DIXON, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. INOUYE, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. BURDICK, and Mr. DECONCINI) proposed and amendment to the concurrent resolution, Senate Concurrent Resolution 120, supra; as follows:

On page 44, strike out line 9 through line 21 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

GENERAL REVENUE SHARING

SEC. 3. Upon the enactment of—

(1) legislation authorizing budget authority of up to $4,600,000,000 annually for the General Revenue Sharing program for any or all of the fiscal years 1987, 1988, and 1989, and

(2) legislation increasing revenues for any fiscal year for which outlays are to be made under such budget authority by an amount that is—

(A) not less than the amount of the outlays to be made for such fiscal year under such budget authority, and

(B) in addition to the amounts of increased revenues required to be reported pursuant to section 2 of this concurrent resolution for such fiscal year, the authorized amounts of budget authority and outlays for such program shall be allocated to the Senate Committees on Appropriations and Finance, as appropriate for such fiscal year, and such amounts shall be added to the total amounts of budget authority and outlays provided for in the applicable concurrent resolution.

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, I would like to announce that the Senate Small Business Committee has rescheduled its hearing on the implementation of title XVIII of Public Law 99-272, the Reconciliation Act, for Monday, April 28, 1986. The hearing will commence at 11 a.m., and will be held in room 428A of the Russell Senate Office Building. For further information, please call Bob Wilson, chief counsel for the committee at 224-5175.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I would like to announce for the information of the public that the Select Committee on Indian Affairs will be holding a hearing on the following bills:

On Wednesday, May 7, 1986, in Senate Dirksen 124, at 2 p.m., on S. 2260, to settle certain claims arising out of activities on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, and S. 2243, a bill to improve the health status of native Hawaiians, and for other purposes. Those wishing additional information on these bills should contact Patricia Zell of the committee at 224-2251.

Fletcher, to be Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

SDI DISCLOSURE

● Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, on March 19, three other Senators and I wrote Senator DURENBERGER, chairman of the Select Committee on Intelligence, and asked him to investigate two reports concerning the Strategic Defense Initiative Organization. The first report, based on a statement by an SDI officer, was that the SDIO may have given the Soviet Union a classified briefing on the SDI program. The second report from the March 17 issue of Aviation Week and Space Technology was that the SDIO may have used Congress and the media as part of a disinformation campaign to provide the Soviets with false or misleading data about U.S. strategic defense research.

On April 9, Senators DURENBERGER and LEAHY, the chairman and vice chairman of the Select Committee on Intelligence, provided us a copy of General Abrahamson's answers to the questions we raised in our letter to the select committee. These answers coupled with General Abrahamson's remarks in a recent closed hearing afford what I think is a reasonable explanation of what happened in Geneva and satisfy me that there is no cause for concern about what was divulged to the Soviets about the SDI program. Moreover, General Abrahamson's unequivocal denial of SDI involvement in any deliberate disinformation program with respect to the Congress or the media satisfies my concerns in this regard.

Even the suspicion of such a disinformation program that misleads elected officials and the free press is a serious matter that deserves immediate investigation. The article in Aviation Week and Space Technology certainly calls the issue into question with respect to SDI and other programs as well. General Abrahamson's answers, because they are so forthright and unequivocal, have settled questions I had of an SDI disinformation program aimed at the Soviets via the Congress and the media. My colleagues should read General Abrahamson's responses and decide for themselves.

Mr. President, I ask that the letter of April 9, 1986, from Senator DURENBERGER and Senator LEAHY to me; a letter dated March 31, 1986, from Lieutenant General Abrahamson to Senator DURENBERGER; and a statement by General Abrahamson to the Select Committee on Intelligence including his responses to several questions all be included in the RECORD.

The material follows:

U.S. SENATE,
SELECT COMMITTEE ON INTELLIGENCE,
Washington, DC, April 9, 1986.

Hon. J. BENNETT JOHNSTON,
Committee on Appropriations,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR BENNETT: We are pleased to forward to you a copy of General Abrahamson's responses to questions raised in your letters of March 19 and 24 on the subject of the Strategic Defense Initiative Organization. Please let us know if we can be of further help to you.

Sincerely,

DAVE DURENBERGER,
Chairman.
PATRICK LEAHY,
Vice Chairman.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE, STRATEGIC DEFENSE INITIATIVE ORGANIZATION,
Washington, DC, March 31, 1986.

Hon. DAVE DURENBERGER,
Chairman, Select Committee on Intelligence, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Thank you for your letters of 20 and 26 March requesting a response to questions from the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence. I appreciate the opportunity to address the Committee's concerns for the record.

I would like to take the occasion of your request to respectfully respond to allegations that the Strategic Defense Initiative Organization (SDIO) has been involved in a disinformation campaign. I have enclosed for the Committee's record my formal statement to these charges. I would like to assure you and the members of your committee that I have never engaged in, nor has anyone in the Strategic Defense Initiative Organization engaged in, any purposeful attempt to misinform the U.S. Congress, the American people, or the news media.

Two years ago when the Strategic Defense Initiative Organization was formed, we made an organizational commitment to present the nation with a forthright assessment of the present strategic situation and the ability of the SDI program to affect a positive return to stability. We have kept our program open to close public scrutiny at home and abroad for the simple reason that we believe that the facts will make the case for strategic defense. My enclosed statement should leave you with little doubt that I fully intend to continue to present the SDI program as candidly as is appropriate within the constraints of security consideration.

Again, thank you for your letters and for the opportunity to respond to your requests.

Sincerely,

JAMES A. ABRAHAMSON,
Lieutenant General, USAF, Director, Strategic Defense Initiative Organization.

STATEMENT BY LT. GEN. JAMES A. ABRAHAMSON TO SELECT COMMITTEE ON INTELLIGENCE, U.S. SENATE

I would like to formally respond to allegations that SDIO is involved in a disinformation program. I must emphatically state that SDIO is not engaged in any program to misinform the U.S. Congress, the American public, or the U.S. news media. I would personally reject any suggestion to conduct such activity and I am deeply concerned that there have been allegations to the contrary.

As you well know, SDIO has various compartmented programs that have valid noncompartmented aspects and that are identified by those noncompartmented aspects. Accordingly, the full scope of these programs is not publicly disclosed. These security procedures serve to protect highly sensitive national security information. My reporting of these SDI activities, which require congressional oversight, has been conducted with all candor and accuracy. My public statements and statements to the news media have been made in the same spirit. I and my entire organization, as members of the U.S. Government, place the highest value on an open and free press—free from both control and manipulation by the Government. Although properly classified information is of course withheld from the public, we are scrupulous to ensure that the information which is released is entirely accurate and as complete as possible.

Question. Did SDIO officials in fact give Soviet officials a classified briefing on the Strategic Defense Initiative?

Answer. On June 27, 1985, the U.S. Defense and Space Negotiating Group held an official post-plenary meeting with their Soviet counterparts. At that meeting a technical overview of the SDI program, at an unclassified level, was formally presented. In attendance was Lt. General Abrahamson, Director, SDIO. His briefing was delivered by Rodney P. Liesveld, Major, USAF, who is both a member of the U.S. NST Delegation and a member of General Abrahamson's staff. General Abrahamson answered the Soviet negotiators' questions following the briefing. The briefing was officially sanctioned by the U.S. Government for this event and received interagency approval prior to its delivery. The USG places a high value on a frank and candid dialogue in these negotiations and seeks such reciprocity from the Soviet Union. It was in this spirit that the SDI briefing was given. A few days after the briefing the "Senate Observers Group" was in Geneva and were fully informed of the briefing. Because the briefing was held during an official post-plenary meeting, the transcript of that proceeding was classified, as are all such official deliberations to ensure the US-USSR agreed rules of confidentiality.

The classification of the arms control proceedings is based upon an agreement of the parties that discussions will be kept secret to promote a frank and open exchange. Such classification is therefore derived from the setting, as opposed to the contents of information exchanged. Specifically, the classification is based upon a determination that public disclosure of the negotiating record contrary to our agreement with the Soviet Union would cause damage to the foreign relations of the United States as provided in Executive Order 12356. When removed from the context of the negotiating record, the same information may be entirely unclassified.

Question. Was this classified briefing the same one given to Members of Congress?

Answer. During many open hearings before Congress in 1984-1985, similar briefings were given by Lt. General Abrahamson. However, no SDI classified technical information that has been presented to Congressional closed hearings has ever been given to the Soviet Union.

Question. If classified information was given to the Soviets, what was the scope of that information and how much detail of SDI research was provided?

Answer. No SDI classified information was given to the Soviets.

Question. If this information was provided to the Soviets, why can't it be provided to the American people?

Answer. All SDI information provided to the Soviets has been, or is, available to the American people.

Question. If the classified briefing for the Soviets was the same one given to Congress, should the briefing given Congress have been answered in the first place.

Answer. No SDI classified information has been provided to the Soviets.

Question. On February 14, 1986, SDIO classified a report by the General Accounting Office on the Strategic Defense Initiative Organization, its financial structure, and its programs. The GAO report, however, was compiled entirely from unclassified sources. If the Soviets, in fact, have already received a classified briefing on the SDI program, was this GAO report improperly classified?

Answer. The GAO report has not been improperly classified. Those areas in the GAO report that are classified are not related to the information in the SDI briefing to the Soviet negotiators.

Question. Has Congress and the press served as a conduct for disinformation on SDI research? If so, what kind of false or misleading data have been provided to the Congress?

Answer.

(a) No!

(b) No false nor misleading data has been provided to the Congress. Furthermore, under no circumstances would the SDIO intentionally misinform the U.S. Congress, the American people, or the U.S. news media.

Question. Has Congress been misled on the true progress of SDI research as a result of attempts to mislead the Soviet Union? Have "channels on the Hill" been used, as the Aviation Week article indicates, to correct the disinformation? (Aviation Week, March 17, 1986)

Answer. Congress has not been misled, and the SDI briefing to the Soviet negotiations was not an attempt to mislead the Soviet Union? (See answer to Question #1.)

Question. Under what circumstances have the Soviets been given or would they be given valid classified information kept from the American people, particularly on the Strategic Defense Initiative?

Answer. SDIO has not provided valid classified information to the Soviet Union. Any decision as to the types and substance of information on the SDI which might be given to the Soviet Union is not my responsibility, and I have no authority to ever approve such activity.

Question. If such information is passed to the Soviets, is it thereafter declassified? If not, why not?

Answer. The decision on what SDI information can be openly released always depends on the impact on U.S. security. At this time it is impossible for me to know what the circumstances may be surrounding Soviet access to SDI data. If SDI classified information were to be provided to the Soviet Union, it would not automatically be declassified if it could be used by other inimical governments to the detriment of U.S. national security.●

THE SERVICE CONTRACT REFORM ACT OF 1986

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on March 27, 1986, I introduced the Service Contract Reform Act of 1986, along with my colleagues, Senators HECHT, THURMOND, and EAST. This reform bill, S. 2261, would correct many problems that currently plague the Service Contract Act. The purpose of the act, when it was adopted by Congress in 1965, was to prevent exploitation of workers by unscrupulous employers seeking Government service contracts. But unfortunately, over the years, the law was misapplied and misinterpreted. The calculations and paperwork it requires have become overwhelming. S. 2261 would create greater competition among service contract bidders, effect substantial cost savings in light of our current budget deficit, and let service employee wages reflect the true prevailing wages in the marketplace. I would urge my colleagues to join in sponsoring this measure which makes realistic reforms to the Service Contract Act.

The Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America has illustrated its great commitment to free enterprise and competition in the work place through its support of S. 2261. Last week, I received a letter from Mr. Richard L. Lesher, president of the chamber of commerce, fully endorsing the reform measures of S. 2261. I ask that the letter of support from Mr. Lesher be printed in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Washington, DC, April 11, 1986.

Hon. GORDON J. HUMPHREY,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR GORDON: I would like to commend you for introducing S. 2261, the "Service Contract Reform Act of 1986." Your leadership on this issue will focus attention on an area where significant cost savings can be achieved without sacrificing vital government programs or services.

The Service Contract Act, like the Davis-Bacon Act, requires employers providing services to the federal government to pay "prevailing wages." As you have noted so eloquently, this Act has proven to be both inefficient and inflationary. It restricts competitive bidding and small business participation, unduly increases costs to the federal government and taxpayers, and impedes the hiring of youth, minorities and women. Numerous public and private sector studies have urged the outright repeal of this antiquated statute.

Barring outright repeal of the Service Contract Act, the Chamber supports your efforts to make common sense modifications to the law, as are contained in S. 2261. Please know that you can count on our support with your legislation.

As you may know, our preference would be to repeal the Service Contract Act. Nevertheless, we strongly support S. 2261 as a reasonable compromise.

Sincerely,

RICHARD L. LESHER.●

TAIWAN'S INDIGENOUS DESIGN FIGHTER

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, there is a rather encouraging report in the current issue of Aviation Week & Space Technology of plans for development by the Republic of China of an indigenous high performance fighter. I use the word "encouraging" because the self defense of Taiwan is so important to the deterrent capability of all non-Communist nations in Northeast Asia.

The report also indicates, however, that there is no U.S. Government involvement in the program and that administration officials continue their refusal to provide the ROC with aircraft more advanced than the F-5E.

Two days ago Peking voted in the United Nations for a resolution to condemn United States air strikes against terrorist related targets in Libya. Communist China would have labeled the United States as a terrorist nation. In gratitude for this typical show of hostility by Red China, the administration is pushing for an illusory strategic alliance with Peking founded on the supply of modern United States technology and weapons, the latest proposal being the sale of advanced avionics for installation in the F-8 fighter.

Mr. President, I cannot understand this kowtowing to Communist China. Why does the United States shun its true friends and turn to totalitarian societies who regularly condemn us, even to the point of condemning the United States as a terrorist state. Instead of trying to build a defense alliance where no basis for one exists, it would be far more fitting for the United States to care for the safety and freedom of its friends, who have always proved ready to support us in every way possible.

The correct response to the dramatic increase of Soviet air and naval activities in the Pacific Ocean is for the United States to approve sales to the ROC of the F-20 and other modern equipment for the effective patrol and defense of the sealanes guarded by Taiwan. As retired Gen. T.R. Milton has observed:

It must be a continuing source of frustration for Soviet military planners to be reminded that Taiwan guards the U.S.S.R.'s route to Vietnam and beyond.

Surely our Government's strategists must recognize that the island, in Peking's hands, would almost certainly be off limits to United States forces. Even a neutral government on Taiwan would offer nightmares for United States military planners.

Yet our Government does not show an adequate understanding of Taiwan's military importance. Instead, we continue pursuing a will-of-the-wisp in the form of a military and strategic relationship with Red China. At least the 19 million free citizens of the Republic of China on Taiwan care for their own security and are doing something about it. I truly hope that their indigenous fighter program is successful, but it would seem better if the United States would also provide the ROC directly with first line replacements for its aging fleet of F-5E's and F-104's.

Mr. President, I ask that the news report may appear in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From Aviation Week & Space Technology, Apr. 21, 1986]

TAIWAN STRESSES DEVELOPMENT OF NEW DOMESTIC FIGHTER

WASHINGTON.—Development of an indigenous-design high-performance fighter has been accorded a high priority by the Taiwanese government as a means of maintaining stability in the region and developing Taiwan's aeronautical industry.

Taiwanese engineers are applying conventional design and low-risk technologies in the single-seat fighter, which will have moderately swept wings, flaperons and long leading-edge strakes blending the wing and the elliptical fuselage. The aircraft will have a single vertical stabilizer and a fuselage-mounted all-moving horizontal tail plane.

Preliminary design is nearing completion, pending further wind tunnel tests in Taiwan and in the U.S.

Budget for the fighter program is not fixed, but is tightly controlled by the government.

High priority allows Taiwan's Aero Industry Development Center (AIDC) to obtain personnel resources, although finding experienced engineers and technicians remains a problem.

Use of forward canard or delta wing configurations for the new fighter was rejected because they would provide insufficient stability over the expected mission envelope.

Use of advanced composite materials will be considered after completion of full-scale development with metal components and assemblies.

Twin turbofan engines producing about 8,350 lb. thrust each with afterburner will allow the fighter to exceed Mach 1.2. Intakes will have fixed semicircular inlets.

Engine development is being conducted under a joint venture begun in 1982 by Garrett Corp. and the Aero Industry Development Center.

The new engine is based on the Garrett 3,500-lb.-thrust TFE731-2L originally licensed for export and coproduction in Taiwan and used in Taiwan's AT-3 two-place trainer.

Garrett and its Taiwanese counterparts have assembled and tested as many as four prototypes of a new version based on the TFE731-5 engine with dry thrust increased to over 5,000 lb.

Range and payload will be similar to those of the Northrop F-5E now in service with the Taiwanese air force.

The cockpit will be equipped with a head-up display and modern electronic displays and fight controls, reclined seat for high-g flight and a bubble canopy. Eventual production of a two-seat trainer version is planned.

Line-replaceable avionics units will be procured off the shelf in most cases, but a new radar system is being planned that will use off-the-shelf components wherever possible.

The new fighter will replace Taiwan's Lockheed F-104s in the air defense mission to deal with the threat posed by a new generation of advanced fighters flown by the People's Republic of China air force.

U.S. political conservatives and supporters of Taiwan have proposed that the Reagan Administration sell Taiwan advanced U.S. fighters, but Administration officials are unwilling to break commitments made to the PRC not to provide aircraft more advanced than the F-5E.

Administration officials underline the absence of any U.S. government involvement in the program.

U.S. CONTRACTS

Aero Industry Development Center, as the prime contractor, has contracted with a number of U.S. aerospace firms for consultation on aerodynamics, static structural testing and for the use of facilities including wind tunnels.

Program directors expect subcontract management will be the biggest factor affecting project managers' ability to meet the 1989 prototype first flight deadline and budget targets.

"The schedule will be tough to hold," an engineer familiar with the program said.●

BRING HOME THE HOSTAGES

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, last week we were again reminded of the Lebanon hostages. We join the families of Peter Kilburn, Leigh Douglas, and Philip Padfield in mourning their deaths.

Their murders are claimed to be in retaliation for the attack on Libya by the United States with the cooperation of Great Britain. We must condemn the Libyan faction responsible for their deaths.

The kidnapings were clearly in violation of international human rights law. Article 3 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights states that every person has the right to life, liberty, and security of the person. Clearly the hostages in Lebanon have been deprived of these basic human rights.

The families of the hostages have suffered greatly throughout the hostage crisis. We extend our deepest consolation and sympathy to the families although we recognize that consolation and sympathy cannot allay their grief and their pain.

What can we do?

We can stand by these families and support their courageous struggle to turn unbearable loss into bearable sorrow.

We can condemn violence and brutality against innocent civilians whether it is practiced by individuals or governments.

We can work together to develop productive common approaches to combat terrorism and isolate terrorists.

We can work for the cause of peace, and the day when, in the words of Isaiah, "One nation shall not raise the sword against another, nor shall they train for war again."

Most of all we can remember that there are still hostages being held in Lebanon. And we can redouble our efforts to secure their safe release.

Terry Waite's efforts continue. And he has urged the families to retain hope, despite the rising tensions in the region.

Let us renew our efforts. Let us each commit ourselves and our resources to securing the safe release of Father Lawrence Martin Jenco, Terry Anderson, David Jacobsen, Thomas Sutherland, and William Buckley.

I urge my colleagues to continue to denounce terrorism and to concentrate efforts toward the release of these men. Let us work toward the day when we can once again travel safely to foreign countries and establish peaceful relations with our foreign neighbors.

Mr. President, I am enclosing a copy of a guest editorial which appeared in today's USA Today. It is written by Eric Jacobsen, son of hostage David Jacobsen and discusses the tragedy of Peter Kilburn's death. I ask that it be inserted into the RECORD.

The article follows:

PETER KILBURN SHOULD NOT BE DEAD TODAY

(By Eric D. Jacobsen)

HUNTINGTON BEACH, CALIF.—Peter Kilburn is dead. We had 16 months to prevent his death, and we failed.

The families of the hostages held in Lebanon failed. The people of the USA failed. President Reagan failed. The men responsible for Peter's abduction and execution failed. But only Peter Kilburn pays the ultimate price for our failure.

At this very moment, somewhere in Lebanon, a similar threat of failure literally points a gun to the heads of Father Martin Jenco, Terry Anderson, David Jacobsen, Thomas Sutherland, and Alec Collett. Do we do what is necessary to prevent another tragedy of this magnitude, or do we turn our heads and put our fingers in our ears?

We had 16 months to save Peter's life. Longer than the time needed to bring home the hostages from Iran, TWA, and Achille Lauro combined.

My father wrote Nov. 8: "Quiet diplomacy has not resulted in the release of a single hostage in two years. William Buckley is presumed dead. He could and should be alive if there had been a reasonable effort made on his behalf."

Peter Kilburn and William Buckley were not just names on a list of hostages. None of the innocent men still held deserve to be treated as such. It's too easy to sacrifice a list of names. Imagine the roles reversed. It's the only way to get the proper perspective.

If President Reagan was chained to a wall in a small, windowless room, he would call for negotiations. If the captors became the captives, they would pray for immediate release. If any of us were seized and held hostage, we would all beg not to be forgotten. These men deserve nothing more than what any of us would expect to be done on our behalf.

All of us fear—justifiably—that we may become the next innocent victim of an act of terrorism. Now is the time to set the precedent that could save our lives should that happen. First save the present hostages, then save future hostages.

Otherwise, God forbid, should another of us fall victim to a fate similar to that of my father and the others, we will receive the same treatment they have received. Some of us will receive the same treatment Peter Kilburn received.

Raise your voice amongst yourselves and say, "Peter Kilburn and William Buckley should not be dead today!"

Raise your voice to President Reagan and say, "These men are our fellow Americans. Don't sacrifice them."

Raise your voice to the captors and say, "In the compassionate mercy of our God, release these innocent men!"

Raise your voice to God almighty and say, "Father, if it be your will, send these innocent men home safely to their families, friends, and country."●

AMERICAN AGRICULTURE AND THE EEC

● Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, in 1981 American agriculture exports climbed to a record level of $44 billion. Since that time the American farmer has been put through an economic wringer of high interest rates, an overvalued domestic currency, excess production, and falling land values. According to current USDA estimates, this year's farm exports are projected to total no more than $28 billion, and falling. Mismanaged American foreign policies, most particularly the grain embargo, combined with European agricultural subsidies have resulted in the loss of some of our farm export markets, both in Europe and within the developing world.

For the last 10 years American agricultural policy has revolved around maintaining high commodity prices and reducing acreage production. And while we have been providing our competitors with a de facto price umbrella, the European Community has responded by subsidizing their exports and attempting to displace our goods in foreign markets. Because of the dramatic decline in farm exports, the Food and Security Act of 1985 was written with the intent of changing the course of the Government's farm policies. Better financing, export subsidies, and lower loan rates were all measures designed to improve the competitive position of American agricultural products in world markets. In response to the anticipated effectiveness of these policies, the Europeans have already had to raise their value added tax, supplementing their export war chest by an additional billion dollars.

The European Community has used since the signing of the Treaty of Rome a combination of farm support policies which included high domestic prices, export subsidies and import tariffs in order to keep a significant portion of their population on the land. While we have attempted to implement responsible policies, the Europeans have consistently bowed to domestic politics, sometimes at the expense of undercutting our export markets. I am convinced, Mr. President, that the high debt-to-asset rations, falling land values and low incomes that plague the American farmer can be directly traced to the unfair trade practices of the European Economic Community. And compounding the problem, the entry of Portugal and Spain into the Community threatens to deny the American farmer yet an additional billion dollars in farm export sales.

I have not come here today to engage in what has become the popular practice of ally bashing, nor did I come here today to threaten Europe with trade wars. In many I am a little envious of the support European politicians give to their rural communities. However, I would like to remind the members of the Community that they cannot continue to have it both ways. They cannot continue to protect domestic markets yet expanded through direct subsidies their export markets. This double standard can only in the long run be harmful to both their agricultural community and to ours.●

HIGHER EDUCATION

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, we will soon consider a bill reauthorizing the Higher Education Act of 1965. This bill—reported by the Committee on Labor and Human Resources—has been the subject of extensive hearings by the Subcommittee on Education, Arts and Humanities and subjected to intense review during both the subcommittee and full committee markups. I am especially pleased to serve on the committee with my colleagues, the distinguished senior Senators from Vermont, Mr. STAFFORD, and from Rhode Island, Mr. PELL. Together, during the past 17 years, they have shared the chairmanship of the Senate Education Subcommittee. They have also shared the mantel of Senate leadership in the field of higher education.

S. 1965, the Higher Education Act Amendments of 1985, represents a strong, bipartisan attempt to address some of higher education's basic problems, while continuing the Federal Government's commitment to access, choice, and equal opportunity in higher education. The bill addresses the following issues:

REFOCUSING STUDENT AID ON THE NEEDY

New requirements affecting the Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grant program will require that SEOG's be awarded to "exceptionally needy" students and that priority in awarding those grants be given to Pell grant recipients. Pell grants will be limited to families with incomes of $30,000 or less.

ENHANCING QUALITY

The bill retains the "ability to benefit" provision for students without a high school diploma or GED certificate, but strengthens the current "satisfactory academic progress" requirement by mandating that any student receiving title IV assistance be making progress toward a degree or certificate, and that he or she obtain at least a C average or a grade-point level consistent with the institution's own requirements for graduation. The bill also contains new provisions to assist colleges and universities improve their libraries, rehabilitate and construct new academic facilities, and acquire new instrumentation for research and instruction.

ESTABLISHING A MORE EQUITABLE BALANCE BETWEEN LOAN AND GRANT ASSISTANCE

The bill places a renewed emphasis on making grant assistance available to low- and middle-income students by increasing the maximum Pell grant award to $2,400—or 60 percent of the cost of attendance—and increasing that amount by $200 each year. The maximum SEOG would also be increased from the current $2,000 to $3,000. College work study funding would emphasize career relevant and community service work opportunities.

IMPROVING THE APPLICATION AND AWARD OF TITLE IV AID

The master calendar, recommended by the National Commission on Student Financial Assistance, is included in S. 1965, along with a statutory "need analysis" for Pell grants. A second need analysis for the campus-base programs and the Guaranteed Student Loan Program would be established by the Secretary of Education, working with a National Advisory Committee on Student Financial Assistance, within statutory parameters included in the bill. The bill also permits families with income of $15,000 and less to use a short form, with five data elements, to apply for title IV assistance.

While our access mission is within reach, and we have made progress toward achieving some measure of choice—our equal opportunity objective has eluded our grasp. The fourth annual status report on "Minorities in Higher Education" by the American Council on Education's Office of Minority Concerns provides adequate evidence of how far we have come, and how far we must still go to establish equity and full equality of opportunity in American higher education.

Some have questioned our resolve in pursuing the goal of bringing minorities and women into higher education, at all levels, including the professorate. An article in the Philadelphia Inquirer on November 12, 1985, makes clear the critical nature of the problem we face.

I am pleased that two institutions of higher education in my State have led the way in providing access to careers in the health area, including medical doctors, and in engineering. The University of Illinois at Chicago and the Illinois Institute of Technology have been pioneers in expanding opportunities for minorities in the health professions and in engineering.

I hope my colleagues will take the time to familiarize themselves with the quality, program effectiveness, and financing issues which permeate this reauthorization. It is also my sincere hope that each of you will also concern yourself with fulfilling our mutual commitment to equal opportunity in higher education.

Mr. President, I ask that the November 12, 1985, article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

FOR SOME, COLLEGE DREAM ENDED

(By H. Patrick Swygert)

The report on the declining number of black students in medical schools across the nation is one more piece of evidence that the tide is going out on the important gains made by blacks in higher education over the last decade.

According to the U.S. Census Bureau, the proportion of black high school graduates enrolling in colleges and universities has dropped from 34 percent in 1976 to 27 percent in 1983—even while the percentage of college-age blacks has been at an all-time high.

Translated into raw numbers, the statistics mean that 8,000 fewer blacks were enrolled in colleges in 1983, although there were a half-million more black high school graduates that year than in 1976.

At the graduate level, the situation is even grimmer. In 1983, the 325 institutions that award doctorates in the United States granted a total of 31,190 doctorates, but only 1,000 of these advanced degrees—less than 3 percent—went to black students. This discouraging statistic should be viewed against the stark backdrop of a precipitous 10 percent drop in the number of blacks receiving doctorate degrees in the three-year period from 1981 to 1983.

The reasons for these gloomy trends in higher education are not difficult to identify. Many colleges have cut back recruitment and remediation programs. The cost of attending colleges and graduate and professional schools has increased much more than the general rate of inflation, and government funds for financial aid have not kept pace.

At the same time, Washington continues to threaten less, not more, financial aid. Only five years ago, Temple University was able to meet almost 100 percent of the demonstrated need of all its students through a mix of federal and state funds and Temple grants. This year, only 56 percent of that need can be met, even though Temple has substantially increased its grants.

Although the financial aid problem affects all disadvantaged students, it falls more heavily on the black population because of the large gap between average black and white family incomes.

The decline in black access to higher learning could not come at a worse time. The nation's economy is being transformed rapidly. Almost all economic growth is in the service and high-tech areas. The number of jobs available to those without a college education—no matter how motivated—shrinks each year. The American dream is quickly becoming beyond the reach of most young people who do not graduate from college or receive some form of specialized training beyond high school.

That is the bad news. Closer to home, there are a few rays of hope.

Some local colleges and universities are trying to reverse the decline. At Temple, for example, we launched a program that turned around the steady decline in the number of blacks attending our medical school. Because the School of Medicine has always had an effective recuitment program, the number of qualified blacks accepted by the school has remained high. However, the number of blacks actually enrolling in the medical school has steadily declined, due in large measure to the lack of financial resources.

The medical school responded by offering, on a racially nondiscriminatory basis, scholarships to the 25 most needy students accepted for admission. This program helped financially disadvantaged students of all races, but it also helped make possible an entering class this year with the most black students in a decade.

The commonwealth instituted a similar program following suggestions made by Temple in 1983. On the initiative of the state's secretary of education, the legislature this year is providing $360,000 in scholarship funds for graduates of Lincoln and Cheyney Universities who attend graduate or professional school at Temple, the University of Pittsburgh or Pennsylvania State University. This money serves the dual purpose of enhancing Lincoln and Cheyney and assisting qualified graduates in pursuing professional and graduate education.

These praiseworthy efforts are unfortunately too few in number. Twenty years ago, the Kerner Commission warned that we could become two nations, "one black and one white, separate and unequal." Despite the enormous advances of the last two decades much remains to be done if our country is to avoid that ill-fated destiny.

The demography of higher education—particularly graduate and professional education—demands our attention now. Scholars receiving doctorate degrees in the near future will form the college faculties of the 1990s and into the 21st century. As a nation, we must move forcefuly and fairly to ensure that America's great dream of educational opportunity will not be extinguished.

ADVANCE NOTIFICATION PROPOSED ARMS SALES

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress receive advance notification of proposed arms sales under that act in excess of $50 million or, in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the act, those in excess of $14 million. Upon receipt of such notification, the Congress has 30 calendar days during which the sale may be reviewed. The provision stipulates that, in the Senate, the notification of proposed sales shall be sent to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Pursuant to an informal understanding, the Department of Defense has agreed to provide the committee with a preliminary notification 20 days before transmittal of the official notification. I ask that the official notification will be printed in the RECORD in accordance with previous practice.

I wish to inform Members of the Senate that such a notification has been received.

Interested Senators may inquire as to the details of this advance notification at the office of the Committee on Foreign Relations, room SD-423.

The material follows:

DEFENSE SECURITY ASSISTANCE AGENCY,
Washington, DC, April 22, 1986.

[In reply refer to: I-01866/86ct]

Dr. M. GRAEME BANNERMAN,
Staff Director, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR DR. BANNERMAN: By letter dated 18 February 1976, the Director, Defense Security Assistance Agency, indicated that you would be advised of possible transmittals to Congress of information as required by Section 36(b)(1) of the Arms Export Control Act. At the instruction of the Department of State, I wish to provide the following advance notification.

The Department of State is considering an offer to a Middle Eastern country for major defense equipment tentatively estimated to cost $14 million or more.

Sincerely,

PHILIP C. GAST,
Director.●

BILINGUAL EDUCATION ESSAY AWARDS

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I would like to bring three award winning essays to the attention of my colleagues. The essays were written by young people who have all participated in bilingual education programs. The winning essays were announced at the annual convention of the National Association for Bilingual Education [NABE] in Chicago on April 3, 1986. The three young students all wrote on the topic "Being Bilingual in America: What Will the Future Hold for Me?" Each essay is an eloquent testament to the pride of the bilingual student, both in their native language and culture, and in their ability to communicate and live in an English-speaking culture. They represent the successes of bilingual education, successes of intercultural understanding, and are hopeful representatives of the dreams we all hold for the next generation. They are young people to be proud of, and they are proud of themselves, their heritage and their country—our country.

I ask that the three NABE essays be included in the RECORD at this point.

The essays follow:

SONIA A. ZELEDON, GRADE 5, DUVAL ELEMENTARY SCHOOL, GAINESVILLE, FL

I came to the U.S.A. with my family in search of a new life. For me the most important thing so far has been to learn English, the language of the country where I now live.

My first day of school was very exciting. I didn't know any English but I was ready to learn. One year later, I can talk and write English and Spanish. I have a lot of American friends.

For me speaking, reading and writing two languages is like I was two people at the same time. Now I can call and write to my country in Spanish and also I can talk and write to my friends in America in English. I feel proud of myself and for my good luck.

In the future as a bilingual I would like to be a lawyer, study hard to get a good job and with the learning of the two languages help the English and the Spanish speaking people with their problems and help make America a better country for all. I think the future will be very good for me in America as a bilingual person.

NELLY VALVERDE, GRADE 6, INTERMEDIATE SCHOOL 151, BRONX, NY

I have great expectations for what the future holds for me and for my generation as a bilingual human being.

The Bilingual Program is helping me to widen my knowledge to gain the necessary skills to live comfortably in the future. Learning two languages and two cultures is helping me to better understand my family, my teachers, my peers and my Spanish culture as well as the American culture around me.

Being bilingual is like being two different people sharing one body and one soul at the same time. Knowing more than one language and one culture makes me more sensitive and unique. I can feel, talk, love, laugh, understand and react to two different cultures and languages as well. It makes me feel good and happy about myself.

The knowledge of two languages cushions my steps from one culture to the other. It helps soften my growing pains. I wish that all the children could have the same opportunity as I have. To be able to talk, to read and write in two different languages is a wounderful experience. I also wish that they learn as many languages as they can. To see, feel, love and understand other cultures with the eyes of a child is a great experience.

I am grateful to my bilingual teachers and the government for giving me the opportunity to keep and observe my language and culture while learning a second language and culture as well. This is my best inheritance. Living in a multilingual and multicultural city like New York provides me with greater opportunities to advance in the future.

I am eleven years old now. By the year 2000 I will be 25. I wish to be a decent member of our society. I want to be a bilingual teacher. I expect to get a good job and to be able to help the next generation as I have been helped. I have faith in the intelligent judgment of our government. I pray to God that there will always be bilingual programs.

DEBORAH REED, GRADE 10, OAKS MISSION SCHOOL, OAKS, OKLAHOMA

Being able to speak in my native tongue is an important part of my heritage, but being able to speak English is just as important.

An Indian lives in two worlds. In school, work, and sometimes play, an Indian is in a white world. At home and with relatives an Indian is in his own world. A world of a different language, different ideas, and often different beliefs.

The Indian people should not shun ideas just because they were thought of by a white person. Neither should a white person shut out an Indian's thoughts. They are two different people; therefore, they are supposed to have different thoughts.

My mother once told me that she had spoken Cherokee all her life until she went to school. There, she was forced to learn a new language. My mother is not bilingual. She is not sorry that she had to learn English; in fact, she is glad she had to. It makes me sad to learn that today, my mother also thinks in English, to me it is something she has lost.

As time passes, it seems that there are fewer and fewer people speaking their native language. Children are now taught English first; a native language is taught in schools as a second language instead of being taught at home as it used to be. We are losing something. Many do not see it because it is happening gradually from generation to generation.

I do not know what the future holds for me or for the generations to come, but I will try my hardest not to lose this gift of knowing my Indian language.

There are other people at my school who speak their native language. Some might look down on them, but I feel a deep respect for their parents. Parents who know the value of pride in oneself, have pride in themselves. This will help them many times in the future. Pride is an important thing to have, not only in yourself, but in your parents and lineage. Indians have a fierce pride in themselves. Their forefathers were the true Americans. They are the ones who truly belong in America, but they welcomed people to their land. Now they are losing it.

We will always be unsure of the future, but we do know one thing; no matter who you are the future does have something in store for you. Not always good, but rarely terrible. Hold onto what you have; you may gain more tomorrow.●

NAUM AND INNA MEIMAN: ISOLATED IN MOSCOW

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, Naum and Inna Meiman are a lovely couple who want desperately to leave their native Soviet Union. Naum applied to emigrate over 10 years ago and has been harassed ever since. He married Inna in 1981. Together, they have bravely lived under troubling conditions.

Inna is critically ill with cancer. Naum is getting older. He is 74. The Meimans have little time left to enjoy the land of their ancestors but they must be given the chance to breathe the air of Israel. Inna must be given the basic right to the best and most modern medical treatment available. Since the Soviet doctors have told her there is nothing further that they can do, it is time to allow doctors in the West who have the technology to treat her.

I strongly encourage the Soviet authorities to grant permission to the Meimans to emigrate to Israel.●

ORDERS FOR TOMORROW

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent on behalf of the majority leader, that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until 10 a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF CERTAIN SENATORS

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that following the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, there be special orders in favor of the following Senators for not to exceed 5 minutes each: HAWKINS, CRANSTON, PROXMIRE, and MOYNIHAN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, following the special orders, there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 10:30 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for not more than 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. DOMENICI. Following routine morning business, the Senate will return to consideration of Senate Resolution 120, the budget resolution.

There will be votes on Thursday. It will be the intention of the majority leader to ask that the Senate not be in on Friday this week if an agreement can be reached to reduce the statutory time limitation alloted to the budget resolution by 12 hours.

Mr. BYRD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 4 p.m. having arrived, it will take unanimous consent to continue.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we proceed for 30 seconds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I say to the distinguished acting majority leader that I hope we can reach an agreement with respect to Friday. I doubt that we can reach an agreement with respect to 12 hours, however. I certainly want to help if I can in making an arrangement. I doubt that, if no agreement is entered into, the Senate would be on this subject for 12 hours on Friday. Whatever a reasonable amount of hours may be, I hope we can reach an agreement on that by tomorrow.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the distinguished minority leader. Certainly the majority leader will take his statements into account and I shall remind him, having been here when it was stated.

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate stands in recess until 10 a.m. tomorrow.

Thereupon, at 4:01 p.m., the Senate recessed until Thursday, April 24, 1986, at 10 a.m.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate April 23, 1986:

THE JUDICIARY

Kenneth L. Ryskamp, of Florida, to be U.S. district judge for the southern district of Florida.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Joe D. Whitley, of Georgia to be U.S. attorney for the middle district of Georgia for the term of 4 years.

FOREIGN SERVICE

Foreign Service nominations beginning Marshall D. Brown, and ending Robert A. Riccio, which nominations were received by the Senate and appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on March 12, 1986.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO THE 1986 HIGH SCHOOL STUDENT RECIPIENTS, CERTIFICATES OF EXCELLENCE IN LEADERSHIP AWARDS, RORY SPARROW FOUNDATION, INC., OF PATERSON, NJ

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, April 26, the people of the city of Paterson, my congressional district and State of New Jersey will assemble at a highly unique "Salute to Leaders" convention in testimony to an outstanding group of high school students who have completed their internship in the "Tomorrow's Leaders Development Program" of the Rory Sparrow Foundation, Inc., of Paterson, NJ. I know that you and our colleagues here in the Congress will want to join with me in saluting these young people, as follows:

Nelton Barrett, Bernadette Bracey, Eric Bryant, Sherane Bunting, Andrew Cameron, Coretta Capers, A. Bryant Crockett, Rodney Crowell, Jody Farr, and Winifred Henry.

Felicia Martin, Jeannie Moore, Navlette Morgan, Winsome Owens, Monique Reed, Katrina Smith, Carol Thompson, Tammy Williams, and Antoinette Young.

Mr. Speaker, these students include juniors and seniors of Passaic High School, John F. Kennedy High School, Eastside High School, Ridgewood High School and Mary Help of Christian Academy. They all share one basic common element of quality in life's beginning with Rory D. Sparrow, the most esteemed basketball star now with the New York Knicks, who founded the educational development training and service youth program for leadership encompassed in the establishment of the Rory Sparrow Foundation: They are all from the inner city.

Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, we will honor the graduates of this program as well as the educational concept and learning experience provided by the Rory Sparrow Foundation. When you reflect upon the fact that the cultural, historical, and economic achievements—even the basic health, well being, and longevity of a State and Nation—depend in large measure upon how well we educate each generation charged with the trust of carrying out its responsibilities and traditions, we can indeed be proud of the Rory Sparrow Foundation's outstanding contribution to the quality of life and way of life for all of our people.

With you permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert at this point in our historic Journal of Congress a biographical essay on Rory Sparrow and his foundation as furnished me by the distinguished coordinator of Tomorrow's Leaders Development Program, William D. Croix of Rory Sparrow Foundation, Inc., which most eloquently portrays the goals and purposes of this most prestigious organization as follows:

PROFILE OF RORY SPARROW FOUNDATION, INC.

INTRODUCTION

The Rory Sparrow Foundation Inc. is a non-profit, charitable organization serving the Greater Metropolitan New Jersey/New York area. The Foundation was formed in 1984 by Rory D. Sparrow, a star basketball player for the New York Knickerbockers (The Knicks) and is based in Paterson, New Jersey, Rory's home town.

The purpose of the Foundation is to develop positive self-esteem, positive self-motivation and positive self-awareness in a segment of our youth which has a severe shortage of these necessary catalysts to personal success. It is the philosophy of the Foundation that if a person is endowed with a strong, well-developed sense of positive self-esteem, awareness and motivation, he or she can realize their highest potential.

To accomplish its goal, the Foundation provides service programs in the areas of education, health, sports and recreation and economic development. Special emphasis is placed on educational support services. A permanent education, recreation and administration facility is being planned to house these programs. By reinforcing self-confidence through these services, area youngsters will get a second chance to develop the positive self-esteem, self-motivation and self-awareness they need to be competitive and productive in our society.

RORY D. SPARROW

There is no doubt that Rory D. Sparrow has become a success in life. He is now a starting guard for the New York Knicks. His arrival to success, however, was not easy nor are all his goals in life completed. Rory was born June 12, 1958 in Suffolk, Virginia, the second of five children born to John and Claudia Sparrow. In 1962, the Sparrow family moved to Paterson, New Jersey, which has become their home.

Rory grew up in the Alexander Hamilton Projects, a housing development for low-income families, where the problems of crime, drugs and unemployment cast a heavy shadow on daily life. Rory was aware of these problems at an early age and was determined to avoid these pitfalls of life and do more than the expected. He was very fortunate during his youth to have the love and support of his family, as well as the support of community leaders and teachers, all of whom stressed the importance of a good education. Rory attended public school in Paterson where he earned excellent grades, played basketball and participated in student government. Basketball taught him the importance of good health and teamwork, while his participation in student government taught him good organizational skills.

Rory's excellent grades and ability to play basketball were the key to his early success. In 1976, he was awarded a scholarship to attend Villanova University in Pennsylvania, where he maintained high academic standards while further developing his basketball skills. In 1980, Rory's hard work paid off with two achievements: He graduated from Villanova University with a degree in electrical engineering, the first black to do so, and then was drafted by the New Jersey Nets Basketball Team.

With his successes in hand, Rory returned home to Paterson, New Jersey, and became very active in community programs geared towards youth. This involvement made Rory acutely aware of the lack of self-worth and motivation portrayed by so many young people in the area. It prompted him to formulate programs that could positively impact youth in this area. Positive role models and images were what was needed to reinforce self-esteem and self-awareness.

In 1981, Rory was traded to the Atlanta Hawks, participated in the community activities in Atlanta and was traded again to the New York Knicks in 1982. He chose to return to Paterson to live and continue his community involvement.

Rory views himself as someone who beat the odds with the positive influence of people who care and, thus, feels that the ideal of providing community service should not be lost. Rory has spent countless hours donating his time and energy to youth programs. Not only does he see the need for grassroot community programs, but he finds great pleasure and a sense of accomplishment in becoming personally involved. With this commitment in mind, he formed the Rory Sparrow Foundation Inc.

Despite all of the awards and honors he has received, Rory cherishes the opportunity to help young people become productive citizens in their communities. These ideals are reflected in the motto Rory has selected for the Foundation, "Growing Together in a Community Effort."

FOUNDATION COMPONENTS

Tutorial service

The Foundation is using innovative approaches in tutorial services. Working with the Boards of Education in Paterson, Newark and New York City, the service will help in the areas of mathematics and reading in very small classes and one-to-one environments. Both education professionals and college seniors majoring in education are tutors in this program.

Leadership development

An extracurricular program designed to expose the excelling high school student to the workings of government and the corporate system. The program runs the entire school year and students will meet government and corporate leaders, attend council meetings, board meetings and work sites as they become introduced to the workings and interrelationships of our American system and the greater world economic order.

Student exchange

Selected students will visit other parts of America and other nations to study and experience other cultures. This experience will broaden a young person's perspective on sharing and understanding other viewpoints as we all attempt to live together on this planet.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by a Member of the Senate on the floor.

Matter set in this typeface indicates words inserted or appended, rather than spoken, by a Member of the House on the floor.

Motivational and instructional videotape library

A library of videotapes designed to instruct young people on career choices and health issues will be produced. Also, a series designed to motivate and guide youngsters by using professional athletes as role models will be developed. Both series will be distributed to libraries, schools and youth organizations.

Computer school

Teach uses and applications of the computer. Attention given to the exceptional student as well as the student needing extra help to grasp computer concepts.

Education information bank

The bank will have information on all types of schools, majors, scholarships and grants to help match objectives of inquiring students with desired study areas and financial aid possibilities.

Health program

Health fairs, seminars and special programs designed to make young people aware of health needs, nutrition requirements, sex related information and personal grooming.

Summer athletic leagues

Summer leagues established in basketball, tennis, golf and soccer. Each league will feature clinics and appearances by professionals from each sport.

VOLUNTEER COMMITTEES

Professionals in residence

Professionals from every industry and profession plan and implement career workshops and seminars for schools and youth organizations. A major annual Career Fair is planned to bring together all of the resources of the volunteers, i.e., corporate sponsors and employers.

Athletes in residence

Professional athletes from all sports areas join the Rory Sparrow Foundation and donate time and resources to sponsor various programs and events of the Foundation.

To house these programs it is a further objective of the Foundation to build a permanent education, recreation and administration center. The center will include classrooms, a gymnasium, swimming pool, offices and recreation facilities.

Through the components of the Foundation, the result of developing enlightened young adults will be accomplished. Impacted youth will develop positive self-esteem, motivation and awareness. With these tools firmly imbedded, these young people will possess competitive skills and become capable, productive individuals who will be an asset to their families, communities and society as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to present some of the highlights of this splendid youth service program for tomorrow's leaders and call your attention to this year's recipient of their student certificates of excellence in leadership awards. I know you will want to join with me in extending our heartiest congratulations and best wishes tc Rory Sparrow, William Croix, the student interns, their families, the administrators and faculty of the Rory Sparrow Foundation, Inc., of Paterson, NJ.

SATELLITE DISH OWNERS PROTECTION ACT

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, an informed electorate is vital to democracy. And to keep people informed, they must have access to as much information as possible.

I'm sure you'll agree that the information explosion we've experienced in the United States in the past decade has been important to our free society.

But I am disturbed at what is becoming a serious problem in rural America. Many people have bought home satellite dishes so they can receive television signals they wouldn't otherwise have access to in rural areas of the country.

Now they are faced with losing access to those channels. Many channels have already begun scrambling their signals and others plan to start scrambling in the near future.

There are thousands of satellite dish owners in my State of North Dakota. They're not asking for a free ride. They are willing to pay a fair price for the signals they receive, but they are threatened with being denied those signals unless Congress acts.

Congress has an opportunity to put some sanity into this chaos.

That's why I am urging other Members of Congress to join me in cosponsoring the Rural Satellite Dish Owners Protection Act, H.R. 3989. The legislation, introduced by Congressman MAC SWEENEY of Texas, is a sensible approach.

The legislation would place a moratorium on the scrambling of the signals until several important protections are available to satellite dish owners.

First, the Federal Communications Commission would set uniform standards before any signals could be scrambled.

This means a single type of decoder would have to be available to descramble all programs. This would ensure that satellite dish owners are not forced to buy 3, 4 or even 10 decorders to receive all the programs they want.

Asking the FCC to set technical standards so that a dish owner would only have to buy one type of decoder is the fair approach.

Back in the 1960's, the FCC was faced with a similar task. It set standards for television sets, for example, so that consumers didn't have to buy two television sets to receive all broadcast programs.

Second, a decoder must be available for sale or lease to any person within 60 days of an order. This will prevent dish owners from waiting months and months for decoders.

Third, decoders should be reasonably priced in relation to the cost of manufacture and distribution. This is an attempt to prevent price gouging.

Fourth, this legislation aims at providing a fair marketing approach to allow dish owners to buy program subscriptions at reasonable prices. There are modifications being proposed to this legislation so cable companies would not have a monopoly on marketing programs to dish owners.

Right now, satellite dish owners are faced with confusing choices. The rules of the game are being changed. They are being told that more and more channels will soon be scrambled and will be faced with buying several decoders—which cost hundreds of dollars each—to unscramble signals.

At this point, we can't depend on the marketplace to straighten out this mess.

I urge other Members of the House to cosponsor this legislation.

AMBASSADORS TO THE SOVIET UNION

HON. BILL CHAPPELL, JR.

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. CHAPPELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to acknowledge with pride the accomplishments of the Seabreeze High School Band of Ormond Beach, FL.

The 100 members of the band and 24 chaperones recently spent 11 days in the Soviet Union, visiting cities such as Leningrad, Tallinn, and Moscow on a good will tour. During their stay, the band performed admirably and represented both their school and their country with great distinction.

Mr. Speaker, the enthusiasm and individual effort of these students illustrates to us all what can be accomplished when people try to understand each other. I applaud these young ambassadors of good will.

1986 CONGRESSIONAL CALL TO CONSCIENCE VIGIL

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to take advantage of an opportunity arranged by my colleague, Congressman KINDNESS, to express my continuing support and concern about the courageous Jewish community in the Soviet Union. I want to point out that as the preeminent moral force in the world today, the United States is obligated to vocally support Soviet Jews—a community confronted by rampant anti-Semitism and subjected to mass humiliation.

The fact that pressure has been successfully brought to bear on the Soviets in an effort to gain the freedom of Russian Jews, tells us that the U.S.S.R. is not impervious to international opinion. It is precisely for this reason that we must not let up on our rhetorical, diplomatic, and economic support at this time. We can be certain that the Soviet authorities would love to have our support die a quiet death by effectively ignoring the issue. However, to do this would be to condemn Soviet Jewry to a future of immobilizing despair and would encourage the KGB to continue completely undeterred in their objectives of cultural genocide. Mr. Speaker, we cannot allow this to happen. If we do not continue to remember these individuals, fight for them and rally for them, who will?

With this in mind I would like to mention the plight of three prominent refusniks whose plight should be made know to the American public.

Josif Berenshtein—applied for permission to emigrate to Israel because he is Jewish but has been repeatedly harassed and intimidated by the KGB authorities. In fact Josif's family was warned that his family may face criminal charges if they continue their efforts to emigrate. More recently Mr. Berenshtein was arrested and sentenced to 4 years in prison. His eye has been damaged in the process and now faces the loss of his eyesight if he does not get proper treatment.

Yuli Edelstein—a Hebrew teacher was arrested in 1985 for supposedly using narcotics as part of a Jewish religious ritual. (A totally trumped up charge by the Soviet authorities.) While in prison Yuli was subjected to severe beatings. To protest this situation he has undertaken a hunger strike. I do not know his condition at present but fear that the situation is not hopeful.

Kim Fridman—arrested several times for teaching Hebrew and leading Jewish cultural seminars. Mr. Fridman now wishes to emigrate so that he can freely practice his religion—a crime in the Soviet Union.

Mr. Speaker, I submit these names, which are not at all inclusive in their nature, for public attention and scrutiny in hopes that all advocates of human rights in this country will become more active in helping to relieve the Soviet Jewish community of the insidious, systematic abuse by the authorities of the Soviet police state.

THE COLORADO RIVER BASIN SALINITY CONTROL ACT OF 1974

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, in recognition of the critical importance of the problem of salinity in the Colorado River, Congress enacted the Colorado River Basin Salinity Control Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-320), which calls for a cooperative effort between the basin States and the Federal Government to control Colorado River salinity. In 1984, Congress amended this law by enacting Public Law 98-569, which authorized additional salinity control activities for the Departments of the Interior and Agriculture. Among the provisions of the 1984 amendment is a cooperative onfarm salinity control program that requires a combined State and local cost share of 51 percent. The continued technical support of the Department of Agriculture is vital to achieving the goals of this program.

The administration's 1987 budget proposal for funding of the Department of the Interior's program of construction and planning for Colorado River salinity control is not at a level sufficient to maintain the planned implementation schedule. Recognizing, however, that Federal funding priorities have been established to assist in reducing the budget deficit, the seven basin States have agreed to support these lower funding levels and accept some program delays. The agreement was with the understanding that sufficient funding for Agriculture's portion of the program would be forthcoming.

Unfortunately, the administration's budget for 1987 eliminates all Department of Agriculture funding for the Colorado River Salinity Control Program. Of particular concern is the lack of funding for the onfarm program authorized by Public Law 98-569. In past years, many elements of this program have been carried out under the Agricultural Conservation Program [ACP], and it has been demonstrated that such onfarm efforts are a very effective way to implement salinity control measures. The Administration is not only declining to fund the Public Law 98-569 program, which would consolidate the efforts carried out previously under ACP, but is also eliminating all funding of the ACP as well. The onfarm programs should be continued as intended by Congress in Public Law 98-569. The funding required for 1987 is $4 million for the Federal cost share, plus $2 million for technical and program support.

Other congressional mandated obligations to be carried out jointly by the States and Federal Government are contained in the Clean Water Act. Much progress has been made toward achieving the purposes of the Clean Water Act as they affect the Colorado River. Delays in meeting the implementation schedules of the salinity control programs, due to insufficient funding for the Federal commitments will only result in failure to meet the water quality goals. This will likely mean further degradation of the quality of the Colorado River.

Congressional support is necessary for adequate funding for the Department of Agriculture in the 1987 budget to permit the continued progress of the Colorado River Salinity Control Program. Reduction of damages from excessive salinity will have benefits not only for California, but for the Nation as a whole.

ALABAMA SCHOOLS RECOGNIZED FOR EXCELLENCE

HON. BEN ERDREICH

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. ERDREICH. Mr. Speaker, for the past 3 years, the U.S. Department of Education has conducted a Secondary School Recognition Program to focus national attention on schools that are doing an exceptional job of educating their students. This year marks the first time, however, that the Department has established a recognition program for elementary schools. Some 509 elementary schools from across the country were nominated by chief State school officers in 49 States, the District of Columbia and the Department of Defense Overseas Dependents' Schools. With so many outstanding schools being considered for the overall educational program, you can understand if I take just a few moments to boast about the fact that not one, but three elementary schools from Alabama were selected for final consideration in the 1985-86 Elementary School Recognition Program. Valley Elementary School in Pelham, AL, and Cahaba Heights Community School and Vestavia Hills Elementary School-West, which both happen to be located in Jefferson County, AL, in my congressional district.

Both Cahaba Heights and Vestavia Hills have a number of special features which set them apart from many elementary schools and certainly more than qualify them to receive special recognition from the Department of Education. Cahaba Heights, for example, has strong participation by and interaction among its administrators, teachers, and parents. It has a strong and effective volunteer program, as well as a number of extracurricular activities for students, including its math teams, chess and computer clubs, olympics of the mind teams, school newspaper, "The Chatterbox," and its student-operated store.

The curriculum and staff at Vestavia Hills focuses its efforts on enhancing the self-concept and feelings of success of each child. In addition to its well-rounded staff and faculty, the school has teachers who are specially trained for various areas of exceptional children, including educably mentally retarded, multiple handicapped, speech therapy, and talented and gifted. It also has a dedicated parent-volunteer group, and ranked first in the State of Alabama in 1983 and second in 1984 and 1985 in overall performance in the Alabama State testing program.

I cannot stress enough the importance of providing our children, tomorrow's future leaders, with the educational skills they must possess if the United States is to retain its place among the world's technologically advanced nations. I commend Cahaba Heights Community School, Vestavia Hills Elementary School-West, and Valley Elementary School on being nationally recognized for their development of solid curriculums focusing on building basic skills, knowledge, character, values, and self-discipline for the students they serve. I wish them all the best as they now await final notification of those schools that will be invited to the Nation's Capital in the fall to participate in a national recognition ceremony and receive a specially designed flag symbolizing outstanding educational achievement.

KILDEE PAYS TRIBUTE TO MR. MARSHALL MOSSMAN

HON. DALE E. KILDEE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues and the Nation a retirement ceremony that will be held Saturday, April 26, in Flint, MI, honoring Mr. Marshall L. Mossman. Mr. Mossman is retiring from teaching after 33 years of outstanding service to the community.

During his career, Mr. Mossman served in and around the Flint area, constantly developing his skills and increasing his teaching responsibilities. He has spent the last 11 years at Swartz Creek High School where his conscientious and dedicated efforts have earned him the profound respect of his students, peers, and superiors alike. Mr. Mossman's rich and varied career as a teacher has benefitted countless students in their preparation for life. His many years of hard work and perseverance have served as an inspiration and a fine example for young teachers to follow. Marshall Mossman has continually placed excellence in education above all other priorities. As a result, he has succeeded in elevating the quality of education to a plateau heretofore unattained. Through his benevolent actions and interests in his fellow man, Marshall Mossman has made this community a better place to live.

Mr. Speaker, Marshall Mossman's highly successful career as a teacher is in keeping with the highest traditions of community service. As a former teacher, I am honored to have had the opportunity to know this man who so greatly distinguished himself through helping others.

THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE MUHLENBERG DEMOCRATIC CLUB

HON. GUS YATRON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, May 2, 1986, the Muhlenberg Democratic Club of Berks County will celebrate their 50th anniversary with a banquet and a dance. On this occasion, it is certainly fitting that we take time to pay tribute to the club's membership for their enormous contributions to the Berks County area.

The Muhlenberg Democratic Club had its origins in a small garage when a handful of ardent Democrats banded together to support the candidacy of Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1932. The club was not formally incorporated until October 5, 1936, and its bylaws and constitution were approved on February 11, 1937.

The club grew in size and popularity and eventually moved to the Goodwill Beneficial Association. The club, like any political organization, had its ups and downs, but through the dedicated efforts of its leadership, the club overcame adversity and was able to grow and flourish. The club continued to serve its important function as a forum and meeting place for Democrats in the area.

Under the present leadership of President Ed Cammarota, the club has been strengthened. The membership has grown and monthly meetings have been well attended. These meetings provide an excellent opportunity for the membership to discuss important issues facing the Nation and the Berks County area.

Mr. Speaker, the Muhlenberg Democratic Club of Berks County is a shining example of the many benefits of grassroots political action and organization. For 50 years, the club has served an invaluable function as a home base for Democrats in our area. I commend the membership on their 50th anniversary and I wish them continued success and good fortune in the future.

HONORING THE REVEREND CALVIN COOLIDGE BROWN

HON. JOE KOLTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. KOLTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House of Representatives today to honor a man who has served God by touching countless lives in his ministry. The Reverend Calvin Coolidge Brown, pastor of the Tabernacle Baptish Church of Beaver Falls, has a long and illustrious record of service to the Greater Beaver Falls community.

Aside from his dutes as a pastor, he serves as a commissioner on the Housing Authority of Beaver County in the position of vice chairman. He is also the chaplain for the city of Beaver Falls and its city council, a member of the Beaver Falls Kiwanis Club and a board member of the U.S. Department of Agriculture Service Extension. In addition, he has worked with the Red Cross in Beaver County and won the Outstanding Achievement Award presented by the Beaver Valley Service Club in 1978. The Reverend Brown has also worked with the American Cancer Society and was president of the organization's local chapter.

But through all these activities, he has also helped his church and its beliefs grow and prosper. Since coming to Tabernacle Baptist in 1960, he has lead the church in constructing a new building, which recently has a new addition.

Coming from a humble background, born in Mintur City, MS, he grew up on a 20-acre farm with four brothers and three sisters. During World War II, he was drafted into the Air Force at age 18. After the war, he bacame a butcher and barber through Government training and moved to Cleveland, OH, to find work. In Cleveland, he attended the Open Door Baptist Church and met his future wife Eva M. Johnson through their work and service in every department of the church.

Today, he continues to serve God by his service to the Beaver Falls community, spreading the gospel. He has always been and continues to be available to help and listen to his congregation and the community at large. Ever since he had the call to preach in 1955 while in Ohio, he has shown himself to be a man with a commitment to God. He continues that commitment. For example, in May and June of 1984 he went overseas to bring the word of God to America's servicemen and servicewomen in Germany.

So I now stand before my colleagues in the House of Representatives and honor this man, the Reverend Calvin Collidge Brown. He has done much for the Beaver Falls community through his involvement in worthwhile and productive projects; he has served his country in the Armed Forces. But most of all, he has brought the word of God—the compassion and understanding of christianity—to his fellow human beings.

LOCAL HEALTH CARE FOR VETERANS

HON. TOM LEWIS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. LEWIS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation to require the Veterans' Administration to enter into health care contracts with non-VA medical facilities where current VA hospitals and clinics are inadequate. My bill would amend existing law allowing the Administrator to enter into private contracts for veterans health care by specifying that contracts be initiated in areas of the United States where the number of veterans is substantially increasing.

In my home State of Florida, 15,000 veterans move in each year from other parts of the country. Forty-one percent of these veterans are over the age of 65. However, despite these numbers, Florida has only three VA hospitals. In Palm Beach County, where a fourth hospital to serve 160,000 veterans is scheduled for completion in 1993, veterans must make a round trip of nearly 200 miles to the nearest VA facility in Miami. The same situation also exists in more remote areas of the State.

My legislation gives immediate relief to veterans by providing them with accessible health care until a local VA facility is available. We must not forget that the United States would not be where it is today if it were not for our veterans. Enactment of this legislation will ensure that the special health care needs of our veterans are not ignored.

SAN JOSE MERCURY NEWS

HON. NORMAN Y. MINETA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, this has been a week to raise a toast in San Jose, my hometown, in celebration of the Pulitzer Prize awarded to the San Jose Mercury News for its masterful series investigating the surreptitious exodus of capital from the Philippines.

I don't believe the impact of this series could have been imagined when the editors of the Mercury News first conceived the idea, or even at the time the articles were published, in June 1985.

But the series "Hidden Billions" helped trigger the massive demonstrations in the Philippines, the recent elections in that nation, and, ultimately, one of the most exciting spectacles of the triumph of democracy in our memory.

The Mercury's decision to rigorously and professionally investigate the rumors of the siphoning of wealth out of the Philippines resulted not only in an outstanding piece of journalism; not only in factual, well-researched articles of service to the international community; but resulted, we can say without exaggeration, in changing the course of history.

This series was reprinted widely in the Philippines, and the reaction included a call for the impeachment of President Marcos by some members of Parliament. Ultimately, Mr. Marcos called for new elections; we all are well aware of the outcome of these elections.

Mr. Speaker, I am certain my colleagues would join me in congratulating reporters Lewis M. Simons, Katherine Ellison, and Peter Carey, editor Jonathan Krim, and all the people of the Mercury News who proved their professionalism, dedication and, commitment in producing this award-winning series.

I am proud, but knowing of the excellent work and high standards of the Mercury News, I am not surprised. My congratulations to all involved.

TRIBUTE TO JOHN DRIGGS

HON. JOHN McCAIN

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to a fellow Arizonan, Mr. John Driggs, who today testified before the House Select Committee on Aging. Mr. Driggs' testimony concerned the tragic problem of hunger among our senior citizens. His eloquent and incisive remarks contributed to our understanding of the problem, and moved many members of the committee to greater efforts on behalf of senior citizens who go hungry.

Mr. Driggs' testimony was only the latest deed in a lifetime of public service. A graduate of North Phoenix High School, he earned an A.B. and an M.B.A. at Stanford University. He was mayor of Phoenix from 1970 until 1974, and a member of two Presidential Commissions, including the President's Task Force on Food Assistance. Mr. Driggs is currently the chairman of Western Savings and Loan in Phoenix. Not satisfied to rest on previous good works, he also serves as chairman of the board of Second Harvest Food Bank. Mr. Driggs has now begun a campaign to help end hunger by informing America's hungry of food stamp benefits.

While Mr. Driggs does not work for acclaim, his altruism has earned him numerous awards, including Phoenix Man of the Year. He is the best of Arizona: A beloved father and husband, a successful career man, a selfless citizen. We have not seen the last of John Driggs—his benevolence, thankfully, seems boundless.

A DAY TO RECOGNIZE ALL PUBLIC EMPLOYEES

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a resolution which designates the week of May 5 to 11, 1986, as "Public Service Recognition Week."

Public employees at the local, State, and Federal levels provide invaluable services to all Americans. Public employees at the Federal level protect our borders, ensure that our Social Security checks are processed on a timely basis, deliver our mail, conduct essential medical research, and expand the frontiers of space. At the local and State levels, public employees teach our children, protect our neighborhoods, enforce building and safety codes, plan our roads and highways, and provide a clean and healthy environment.

Public employees have made immense contributions to this country in technological research, health care, education, crime prevention, fire protection, national defense, and conservation. These men and women have risked, and some have given, their lives while serving in their professional capacities.

Too often the importance of their public services and their contribution to the security and progress of our Nation is forgotten, taken for granted, or ignored. Rather than receiving the praise and appreciation they deserve, public workers are too often the victims of unfair criticism and harsh comments.

My resolution seeks to provide public workers and volunteers with the recognition they deserve. It is a simple "thank you" for the scarifices public employees have made and the dedication which millions of them have demonstrated in seeking to make our country a better place to live. The resolution also encourages our Governors and public officials to observe this week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

I ask all my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this resolution. Let us focus our praise and appreciation on public employees and volunteers whose dedication and commitment to their jobs has benefited every American.

Thank you.

ISSUE: POSSE COMITATUS

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, syndicated columnist William Safire wrote an essary which appeared in the New York Times of February 28, 1986, entitled, "Issue: Posse Comitatus," which draws attention to the serious threat drug trafficking poses to our country, particularly along our common border with Mexico.

In 1981, the posse comitatus law was amended to allow greater participation by the military in America's drug interdiction effort. The Secretary of Defense may, in accordance with other applicable law, make available any equipment, base, facility, or research facility of the Army, Navy, Air Force, or Marine Corps to any Federal, State, or local civilian law enforcement official for law enforcement purposes. The assistance rendered by the military must not detract from military readiness, and the military has the right to seek reimbursement for the services it provides. The Department of Defense Task Force on Drug Enforcement has an exemplary record of cooperating with civilian police agencies to curtail drug traffic. Nevertheless, the flow of narcotics to America from South America, Asia, and Mexico continues.

The Select Committee on Narcotics, which I have the privilege to chair, estimates that in 1986, 150 tons of cocaine, 12 tons of heroin, and 30,000 tons of marijuana will enter the United States. Approximately 30 percent of the cocaine, 33 percent of the heroin, and 33 percent of the marijuana consumed in the United States enter this country from Mexico. The Drug Enforcement Administration has just revealed the existence of a more deadly and cheaper form of heroin being consumed in America called black tar.This new form of heroin could greatly increase the annual number of heroin fatalities in America.

Commissioner of Customs William von Raab recently testified before the Select Committee on Narcotics, "Mr. Chairman, I can put more officers at our ports of entry, and I can put more pilots in the skies, but I cannot put men and women along our border in the number we need to make a difference. I would need to hire thousands and thousands of officers, just to police this heroin highway, this cocaine causeway, this marijuana mainstreet that our border with Mexico is beginning."

Mr. Speaker, the problem of narcotics trafficking is complex, and there is no one easy answer to the problem. All aspects of the problem must be attacked simultaneously. Because the profits from trafficking in drugs are so enormous, smugglers can afford to buy the most sophisticated equipment to facilitate and protect their operations. As the recent murder by a suspected Colombian hit squad of former cocaine smuggler turned Government informant Barry Seals indicates, professional drug smugglers will use any and all means including murder to protect their profits.

The American military can provide a unique counterforce to these drug traffickers. The military possesses fast aircraft and boats with state-of-the-art communications equipment which have already made a significant contribution in identifying and tracking suspected drug smugglers. But, as Mr. Safire's essay points out, the ease with which drug smugglers penetrate our southern border demonstrates how vulnerable our country is to a terrorist attack.

Drug traffickers and narcoterrorists cooperate with each other when it is in their mutual interest to do so. I would hope the military could find still more ways to be of assistance in curtailing drug smuggling and protecting our country against the potential of terrorist aggression.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that Mr. Safire's essay "Issue: Posse Comitatus," be inserted into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point for the information of Members and the public.

The article follows:

[From the New York Times, Feb. 28, 1986]

ISSUE: POSSE COMITATUS

(By William Safire)

WASHINGTON.—If you think the United States border is any barrier to the smuggling of drugs, you're blowing dope.

Every narcotics racketeer and cop knows the most efficient way to transport drugs, particularly cocaine, across our boundaries: fly it through the Windward Passage between Cuba and Haiti into the Bahamas and then by boat or plane into Florida. Or, if you really want to play it safe, fly it into Mexico and "trampoline"—take advantage of the many dry lake beds south of El Paso that serve as landing fields for the world's most profitable air service.

Almost two-thirds of the cocaine snorted in the U.S. comes across that southwest border in small planes, according to Representative Glenn English, chairman of the House Operations subcommittee overseeing our flagging "war on drugs." On a single remote stretch, a recent three-day test surveillance spotted eight smuggler aircraft plying their trade; multiply that by a hundred other favored crossing points to get some idea of the undisturbed air armada doing its booming business.

The most glaring difficulty in our war on drugs is that we have all but abandoned the front line: the border is relatively undefeated. The classic bureaucratic battle between the Justice Department, which believes in tips by informants and criminal prosecutions, and the Customs Service of the Treasury Department, which tries to interdict drugs at our borders, has been won by Justice.

"We have decided essentially to stabilize the investment in Customs drug interdiction," Treasury's Richard Darman told Congress, which means that Customs will not be able to use new surveillance aircraft equipped with radar built for F-15 fighters to nail the trampolining smugglers. He knows better than to do battle with Attorney General Meese, who prefers to use the money to chase the drugs in the U.S.

The apparent helplessness of law enforcement in interdicting the flow of drugs across our borders raises the issue of posse comitatus. The phrase is Latin for "force of the county" and is familiar to fans of Western movies in which the sheriff deputizes a band to follow the men who went that away; in this context, it means the use of the nation's military forces for the purpose of law enforcement.

My libertarian knee jerks away from legislation, such as that passed in 1981, that permits the armed services to be employed in the search for international drug peddlers. The Department of Defense has properly resisted this "while you're at it" law, holding that it might distract the armed forces from their first mission; in addition, it is dangerous to turn an army into any sort of national police force. As a result, Defense lends a hand in drug interdiction only when it is part of other training and no shootouts are involved.

But the porous border is worrisome in a way that arrests my knee-jerk. Defense is in business to protect us from armed aggression, and will ultimately be able to detect and destroy incoming missiles. Greater than the possibility of a superpower first strike is the chance of a terrorist state smuggling a nuclear device into one of our cities.

The Defense Department, if it is not to find itself fighting the next war with the strategy of a war that may never be fought, must be prepared to defend the nation from a suitcase with a hydrogen warhead. Granting "Star Wars" a perfect execution of a defense against thousands of incoming Soviet missiles, it will still leave us naked to an attack from a Khomeini or Qaddafi unconcerned with launch-phase shootdowns or massive retaliation.

The day can easily be foreseen when one of our cities is held hostage by a terrorist group or a terrorist state; the stuff of novels can quickly become reality. At that point, we would be asking: how did they get the bomb into our country? Whose job was it to stop the incoming weapon at our border? Why have we spent trillions on defense when any maniac can fly in a bomb that can destroy a city?

We do have a Special Operations Force, run jointly by the Army and Air Force, putatively in charge of counterterrorism. When the drug smugglers' trampoline bounces a bomb or two with practiced ease across our southwest border, we can expect a blue-ribbon panel to be appointed to inquire into the lapse in our decision-making process that rendered interdiction impossible.

The fighter pilots of the Pentagon want no part of missions looking down for smugglers; the Customs Service doesn't have the money for gunships or juniors Awacs; the Justice Department derides interdiction but is thinking only of drugs, not bombs.

Who is there to organize a posse comitatus to defend our borders?

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO THE HONORABLE EDWIN SKAWINSKI OF NEW JERSEY, 1986 RECIPIENT, MAN-BOY AWARD, BOYS CLUB OF GARFIELD

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, April 26, the residents of the cities of Clifton and Garfield, my congressional district and State of New Jersey will join together in testimony to an outstanding community and business leader, distinguished citizen and good friend, the Honorable Edwin Skawinski of Clifton, NJ, whose standards of excellence thoughout his lifetime have earned him the highly coveted award of the Boys Club of Garfield, NJ—The Man-Boy Award. I know that you and our colleagues here in the Congress will want to join with me in extending our warmest greetings and felicitations to him, his good wife Nina and their children: Catherine and Mark as we celebrate this milestone of achievement in their family endeavors.

The Boys Club of Garfield is one of our Nation's most prestigious affiliates of the Boys Club of America. We are all familiar with the noble traditions of the Boys Clubs of America and their outstanding public service to the people of our Nation in helping our young men to achieve leadership qualities of self-reliance, character building, sportsmanship, fair play, and eagerness to serve others. Their deeply committed endeavors in exercising measures to keep America beautiful, and attain greater communion and understanding in friendship and goodwill among all mankind are a significant investment in the enrichment and excellence of the quality of our way of life here in America.

Edwin Skawinski has by his example and lifetime of dedication to these same true American ideals personified exemplary leadership in his outstanding responsible service to our people which has truly enriched our community, State, and Nation.

There is much that can be said of our honoree, "Skeets," as Edwin Skawinski is affectionately nicknamed, and his lifetime of achievements in service to people. He resides with his family in Clifton, NJ, and is an esteemed businessman in Garfield, NJ, the community of his earlier years where he attended elementary and secondary schools. He has served both communities and our country with distinction. He is a veteran of the U.S. Navy having served on the destroyer, USS Allen M. Sumner DD692, and received his honorable discharge in 1958.

The pleasure of great personal dedication and always working to the peak of one's ability with sincerity of purpose and determination to fulfill a life's dream—that's the success of the opportunity of America—and the mark of distinction in our society of "the selfmade man." Mr. Skawinski is the owner of Garfield Paint Co. and we are especially proud of his compassion, dedication, and untiring efforts on behalf of our young people. Under the Garfield Paint Co.'s insignia he sponsors a Little League baseball team who are presently the citywide Little League champions. The Boys Club of Garfield is honoring him in tribute to the unusual dedicated service he has rendered to the Boys Club over a considerable length of time. He is a longstanding active participant and strong supporter of the activities of the Boys Club of Garfield and is strong supporter of the activities of the Boys Club of Garfield and is currently a member of the Boys Club's Board of Directors.

Some of his additional affiliations with professional and civic organizations and in public service to our people include: The Holy Rosary Young Men's Club, Passaic's St. Al's Club, Rosol-Dul Memorial Post No. 359 of the American Legion, and the Clifton Hockey Parents Association. He is an honorary member of the New Jersey State Pulaski Association of Police and Firemen of New Jersey and New York and the Garfield PBA Local No. 46. He is an active member of St. Stan's Pulaski parade committee and General Pulaski Memorial parade committee of New York. Among the many citations and awards he has received, we point with pride to his appointment as 1974 Grand Marshal to the Pulaski Day parade in New York, 1975 New Jersey State Pulaski Association's "Outstanding Citizen Award," and 1976 Garfield PBA's highest award, Lifetime Silver Membership Card.

The fulfillment of the purpose, goals and aims of the Boy's Clubs of America could not be achieved without the leadership of people like Skeets Skawinski and the strong team effort of volunteer and professional leaders of our communities who participate unselfishly and willingly of their busy schedules in passing these sterling traditions along to our youth of America.

It is indeed appropriate that we reflect upon the deeds and achievements of our people who have contributed to the quality of our way of life here in America. Skeets has truly inspired and enriched the lives of many of our citizens in his service to our young people. We do indeed salute a good friend and great American—1986 recipient of the Man-Boy Award of the Boys Club of Garfield: the Honorable Edwin Skawinski of New Jersey.

HANDS ACROSS AMERICA

HON. MARTY RUSSO

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. RUSSO. Mr. Speaker, we have all seen the gaunt face of starvation from East Africa. We know that millions of people are being displaced from their homes as a result of violent upheavals from the Middle East to Central America. It was these images that encouraged Ken Kragan to establish USA for Africa. In its yearlong effort, his organization has raised and disbursed millions of dollars toward relieving the suffering in Ethiopia.

Several months ago, USA for Africa turned its attention toward America. They found that millions of our fellow citizens, especially children, go hungry sometime each month. A Harvard study estimates that up to 2.5 million Americans are homeless and the number is climbing, particularly in families with children. As a result, Hands Across America was born.

Hands Across America will take place on May 25, when Americans from Los Angeles to Chicago to New York will link hands in a collective demonstration of fellowship aimed at solving the chronic problems of hunger and homelessness in our Nation. The historic line will come through the Third District of Illinois and my family and I, along with a number of my constituents, will be a part of it.

In addition to lending a hand, I have pledged the proceeds of my next honorarium to Hands Across America. I urge my colleagues to follow suit.

This 4,000-mile, coast-to-coast human chain will be the result of the efforts of so many people. I would like to take this opportunity to thank at least one of them. Mr. Robert Prosky, a fine actor, has, along with his fellow performers, brought this project to America's attention.

Let's all join hands and make May 25 the beginning of the end for hunger and homelessness for our fellow Americans.

SEVENTY-FIVE YEARS OF AIDING THE ILL AND SUFFERING

HON. BILL SCHUETTE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. SCHUETTE. Mr. Speaker, on May 17, Mercy Hospital in Grayling, MI, will celebrate its 75th year of service to the people of Grayling and the surrounding communities.

Those 75 years have been a remarkable time for the hospital. When the hospital first opened its doors, it had 14 beds. Today, it is the community's largest employer. Seventy-five years after the hospital first began to serve the people of Michigan, it offers the community a whole range of health care services: internal medicine, ophthalmology, orthopedic surgery, obstetrics, neurology, and many others.

But those 75 years have witnessed something even more important than the hospital's physical growth and expansion. They have witnessed the ongoing commitment and dedication by the Sisters of Mercy to serve the sick and ailing throughout the community. All of us familiar with their work in running Mercy Hospital are at once proud and humbled by their selfless dedication to alleviating the pain and suffering of others.

Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to recommend to the attention of my colleagues in Congress and to the American people Mercy Hospital's 75 years of service, and the inspiring example of the Sisters of Mercy whose selflessness have made those 75 years of service possible.

CONGRESSIONAL AWARDS CEREMONY

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 22, 1986

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, this past Sunday I had the pleasure of addressing the first Fourth Congressional District Congressional Award ceremony in Sedalia, MO. Being honored were two Gold Award recipients: Tom McMullin of LaMonte, MO, and Norman Dexter of Blue Springs, MO, both of whom had received their medals previously in Washington, DC; five Silver Award recipients: Sarah Elsea of Buckner, MO, Dianne Peelen of Hume, MO, Page Skelton of Lexington, MO, Bruce Rasa of Higginsville, MO, and Rose Mary McMullin of LaMonte, MO; and four Bronze Award recipients: John Garton of Nevada, MO, Randy Thurman of Rockville, MO, Stacey Werths of Concordia, MO, and Stephanie Wilks of Rich Hill, MO. Each of these recipients complied with the requirements of voluntary public service, personal development, and physical fitness. With young people such as these, our future is in capable hands.

Also, I wish to commend the members of the Congressional Award Council, which is chaired by Dr. Gale Bartow of Blue Springs. Each member of the council has devoted untold hours toward this program and is helping to make it a tradition in our district.

I take this opportunity to include herewith my remarks to the recipients, which is entitled, "Doing Your Best":

CONGRESSIONAL AWARD SPEECH; DOING YOUR BEST

First, I would like to tell you how pleased I am to have the opportunity to speak to you this afternoon, and I would like to congratulate those of you who are being honored today. Your achievements are outstanding, and I commend you for them.

I look around at all of you, the hope of America's future, and I also see the loving families and friends who have come to share this special occasion with you. As your speaker, I find myself torn in two directions: On one hand, I want to give some lasting words of advice to you, but, on the other hand, as a member of Congress, I know what lengthy speeches can be like. Thus, my one and one-half hour speech . . . will be delivered in less than 15 minutes!

Adults will always tell you how those special times of their youth "seem like yesterday," and I am no exception. For instance, I can picture clearly almost every moment of my high school graduation. My commencement speaker delivered profound words of wisdom, and I think it worthwhile to tell you everything that I remember from his speech to us, and I quote . . . End quote. Well, perhaps it wasn't so memorable after all.

Those of you who are being honored this afternoon do not face an easy future. There is an ancient Chinese curse that has come true for your world with a vengeance—"May you live in interesting times." You could not ask to live in a more challenging or more difficult era. Those of you whose achievements we are here to acknowledge will be confronting a complex world that will continually test your mettle, asking you to prove your worth as a man or woman. This will be true no matter what future road you choose to follow.

As I considered this difficult path you face, I had to ask myself a tough question: What clear and simple words could I share with you that might cling to your hearts and minds as you reach this important crossroad in your life's pilgrimage? The answer came when I remembered the saying that Harry Truman kept above his desk—"He done his damndest." Without endorsing the grammar or the profanity. I certainly commend the sentiment.

This saying came from an epitaph Truman once saw in Tombstone, Arizona, that commemorated one Jack Williams. Truman said he hoped people would remember him that same way.

This idea of doing your "damndest" takes my thoughts back to the classmates who graduated with me in May 1949. I think of them and all they have done during the 37 years since that day. We had a congenial group of 63—not particularly outstanding. At best, you could have called us average. When we were compared with the class that followed ours, we didn't even fare that well: Their class was called the cream of the crop; my class was just a bunch of nice kids.

Yet time has been kinder to my class. Many success stories have been written from that script of average kids: Successfull marriages and families, successful military careers, successful leaders in agriculture and business. Our class produced church leaders, a major insurance executive, a bank president, county office holders and a doctor. How could a not-so-successful beginning produce such a prosperous end?

We were a group who gave it our all, and the best was all that we knew. The word "second-rate" was not a part of our vocabulary, just as it apparently isn't in yours: None of you would be here today if you were willing to settle for less than the best.

In the end, perhaps that bit of wisdom—doing the best you can with your God-given talents—is the most useful advice anyone can give or receive. James Russel Lowell, an American poet, wrote this:

Life is a leaf of paper white
Whereon each one of us may write
His word or two, and then comes night.
Greatly begin! Though thou have time
But for a line, be that sublime,—
Not failure, but low aim, is crime.

To do the best you can with what you have, and to leave the rest to God. That is the essence of my message to you today, for I believe it is the ultimate wisdom I can teach you.

I am by no means the originator of this idea. You can hear the same sentiment echoed from the childhood motto of the Cub Scouts—"Do your best."—to the sophisticated insight of high religion. Sometimes the simplest thoughts truly can be the best.

In the Gospel of Matthew, Jesus told the Parable of the Talents to his followers who had gathered to listen. Since you are the talent of our nation's future, I thought it would be appropriate to retell it today:

In this parable, a man distributes talents among his servants—five to one, two to another, and one to the last—to each according to his own ability. When these servants came back to see their master, the first two had managed to double their talents, while the man with one talent had hidden his in the ground. The master took that one talent from the servant and gave it to the man who had doubled his lot.

So it is in life: We all receive the gift of life in equal measure, but our talents and abilities vary. Life is the process of discovering and developing the special gifts that are uniquely your own, for the best lies not in what you are given, but in what you do with what you are given. Your attitude is what will shape the future, not your gifts alone. It was your determination and perseverence that brought you here today to receive this award. Be true to your own highest convictions!

Isn't it strange
That princes and kings,
And clowns that caper
In sawdust rings,
And common people
Like you and me
Are builders for eternity?
Each is given a bag of tools,
A shapeless mass,
A book of rules;
And each must make,
Ere life is flown,
A stumbling-block
Or a stepping-stone.

Your job is to take the award you receive today and make it a stepping-stone, not a stumbling block. Look to that strength within and do your best by your own lights.

As I thought about what I would tell you today, I faced the most difficult question of all: I could talk to you about doing your best, but how could I light that fire that burns within each of you? How could I help you turn the embers into a flame?

In truth, I know it cannot be me who does this. It is only you yourselves who can find the joy in doing your best. The most I can hope for is that my talk today will be a match that helps to light your fire.

I realize, too, that sometimes the problem is knowing when you are doing the best and making the most of your abilities, yet not losing sight of your human limitations.

Part of the solution lies in looking to the traditions of the past. We dare not cut ourselves loose from the heritage of ideals and beliefs that have shaped our lives because we can use the best of yesterday to answer the questions of today.

The author Lewis Mumford has said that the world changed as much between 1930 and 1940 as it had in a thousand years of medieval history. Think of the staggering changes in today's world—in technology and scientific enterprise alone. Each day we hear of new advances made in the field of medicine.

Yet some things do not change: The values and ideals on which we base our lives; the aspirations of our people and our nation; the faith that sustains and enriches our lives with truth, hope, and charity. These things do not change, and it is through these foundations that we must examine ourselves to unearth the fears, the old habits, the dusty routines, that may be holding us back. The story known as "A Message to Garcia" most clearly illustrates a man who has broken through these self-made barriers.

During the early days of the Spanish-American War, it became necessary for President McKinley to communicate with General Garcia, the insurgent guerilla in Cuba, to enlist his aid against the Spaniards. Getting a message to Garcia was a difficult, nearly impossible task. How were they to do it?

The Chief of the Bureau of Military Intelligence suggested the name of one Lieutenant Andrew Rowan, and the President asked Rowan to deliver the message to the insurgent general. The Lieutenant took the letter from President McKinley without comment and went straight to his task. He didn't ask: "How do I find him?" or "Can someone else do it better?" or "Isn't this a dangerous mission?"

Rowan went alone and unguarded, landing on the island of Cuba in secret. Despite obstacles, he made his way through the jungle and delivered the message to General Garcia. Sheer courage and indomitable spirit were at the heart of Rowan's mission. Upon his successful return to Washington, the young lieutenant was decorated by the commander of the United States Army, who termed his achievement as "one of the most hazardous and herioc deeds in military warfare." How did Lieutenant Andrew Rowan accomplish this arduous task?
